The distinction between the use of the "Amen" at the end of the Lord's Prayer, as also of the general Confession, and at the end of the other Prayers, or Collects, is this. In the former they repeat the Amen as a part: in the Collects they add it as an answer. In these the Amen is said by the minister himself, as one joining with the congregation (and that it ought to be so said, must be evident to any one, who will inspect the "general Confession," and consider by what authority the minister is to stop before he has completed the whole form, prescribed for the joint use of himself and the congregation; and by what authority, if he stops, the congregation, who are to say the Confession "after him," are to proceed. Edit.). In the Collects the Amen is said only by the congregation, as separate from, and replying to, the minister. In the former it is said by way of repetition; in the latter, of response. Wherefore in the Collects the minister would err, if he subjoined "Amen;" as much as the people, if they repeated the form: both mistaking and mutually invading each other's part, appointed severally in the rubrick.

To prevent this irregularity, the Church hath observed even a literal distinction in the print. In the Confession and Lord's Prayer, as also in the Creeds and Doxology, whereof the Amen is a part, to be said therefore both by priest and people, it is printed in the same letter with the form. But in the Collects, whereto it is subjoined only as an answer, to be made only by the people, it is printed in a different character. But why do not men even of themselves in these obvious cases judge what is right? Why not with their own eyes discern, what the church hath so visibly distinguished?

As to the Confession, necessary it was that every worshipper should repeat the whole form, confessing his own sins with his own mouth: otherwise were this performed by the lips of the minister alone, it would not be in a proper sense confession, but consent. The same may be said of the confessions of faith in the Creeds.

As to the Lord's Prayer, why it is appointed to be said by the whole congregation, is stated at the beginning of this note. Dr. Bisse.

[a] The Collect.] This short and devout Collect is both a very fit introduction to the Communion Service, and a proper preface to the repeating of the Ten Commandments. The Western church of old used this very form in this office, and the Eastern prayed before the Sacrament, "O Lord, purify our souls and bodies from all pollutions of flesh and spirit;" for the pure body of Christ must be received into a pure heart. And as the people were to be purified before the first publication of the law, Exod. xix. 14; so must we have clean hearts before we are fit to hear it; lest, if our minds be impure, sin take occasion by the Commandment to stir up concupiscence in us, Rom. vii. 8. Dean Comber.

In this very old and excellent Collect, we proceed to beg of Him, "unto whom all hearts be open," "so to cleanse the thoughts of our hearts, by the inspiration of are hid; Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love thee[c], and worthily magnify thy holy Name; through Christ our Lord. Amen. Ps. xxxiv. 3; cxix. 7; ciii. 1. Prov. xv. 8. Acts x. 46.

his holy Spirit," by breathing into us with lasting efficacy good inclinations and purposes, "that we may," as "perfectly" as our present state admits, "love" Him in our souls and "magnify" Him in our words and lives. Purity of intention is both in general requisite for approaching God's altar, and more especially for going through the next part of the office aright; in which, after hearing the Ten Commandments rehearsed to us, we pray God to "have mercy upon us," and pardon us, so far as we have transgressed either the letter or the spirit of them, as explained by our blessed Redeemer, "and incline our hearts to keep" each of them better for the future. It doth not appear that this form of devotion was ever used in any Liturgy before our own. But surely, taking the Commandments with the Gospel interpretation of them, it is a very instructive and edifying one. And they, who think the Confession in the morning prayer not particular enough, have sufficient room here to supply that imagined defect. Abp. Secker.

[b] Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be open, &c.] Of all the divine attributes there are none so likely to make us afraid, in this our nearest approach to God, of coming with an unclean heart, as his omnipotence and omniscience. These two therefore are in Scripture phrase here set before us, to remind us that we come before an almighty and all-seeing Majesty: so that if any wickedness be but imagined in the heart, desired by the will, or acted by the hand, in the darkest night, or most secret corner, it is apparent to Him; and He will condemn us for it, unless we first condemn ourselves. Dean Comber.

[c] — that we may perfectly love thee, &c.] We cannot love God so much as He deserves; but, if we love Him sincerely, that is accounted "perfectly." And although we cannot sufficiently set forth all the praise, of which He is worthy, yet when we value Him in our hearts above all things, we are accounted to "magnify him worthily," that is, suitably in some measure to his goodness. Dean Comber.

[d] Then shall the priest, turning to the people,] The priest, in rehearsing the Commandments, speaks as from God; and therefore is ordered to "turn himself to the people:" whilst they receive them "kneeling;" the posture of reverence and submission to what God commands, and of humiliation for the breach thereof. Dr. Bisse.

[e] — rehearse distinctly all the Ten Commandments,] "Distinctly;" that is, slowly and deliberately: in a manner suitable to the importance of the subject, and the dignity of Him whose commands they are. Waldo. With pauses between them. I do not find in any Liturgy, old or new, before this of the fifth of Edward VI. here continued, that the Jews' decalogue was used in the service of the Christian church. But it seems, that the rehearsal of it in the beginning of the Communion was appointed with the people's answers and craving pardon and grace to observe them, instead of confession of sins, always set in this place. It serves to actuate our repentance by calling to mind our offences by retail. Bp. Cosin.

These divine precepts of the moral law were not appropriated to the Jewish synagogue, but do as much concern and oblige us, as they did them: we vowed to keep them in our baptism, and we renew that vow at every Communion, and therefore it is very fit we should hear them often, and have them repeated now, when we are going to make a fresh engagement to observe them. God hath told us, that "his prayer shall be abomination who turns away his ear from hearing the law," Prov. xxviii. 9. And our diligent attention to his will, will incline Him to hear our desires; so that our obedient and humble hearing of the Commandments makes way for the success of our prayers. And where could the Law be placed in our service more conveniently, than immediately before the Gospel, to make that more welcome to us, when the Law hath humbled us by its terrors? And since we are to confess all our sins before we come to this blessed sacrament of pardon, the Church holds out this glass unto us by which we may discover all our offences. Dean Comber.

These Ten Commandments contain all the things requisite in reference to all moral actions, as being the summary and general heads, under which are comprehended all the duties we are to do in particular, and all the sins we are to avoid. But there are other positive precepts, to which our obedience is required. God Himself first divided this law into two tables: the first four containing our duty to God, and the last six our duty to our neighbour. Clutterbuck.

The benefit of the priest's here reading the Commandments may be considered with a double respect: 1. with a particular regard to the holy Communion; or, 2. with a general regard to their standing and intrinsick use.

First, with regard to the Communion, this rehearsal of the Commandments, with the supplications of the people subjoined to each, is an excellent preparative for receiving those holy mysteries: for it contains those penitential acts, which the Church requires. For in its exhortation for the worthy participation of the Lord's supper it thus directs: "The way and means thereto is; first, to examine your lives and conversations by the rule of God's commandments: and whereinsoever ye shall perceive yourselves to have offended, either by will, word, or deed, there to bewail your own sinfulness, and to confess yourselves to Almighty God, with full purpose of amendment of life." Now, whilst each Commandment is reading, every communicant ought by a secret recollection, at least of his grosser sins, to examine his own conscience; and being conscious wherein he hath offended, for, alas! who is there that liveth and sinneth not? he then may "bewail his own sinfulness" with the rest, crying out, "Lord, have mercy upon us;" and also strengthen his purpose of amendment, adding, "and incline our hearts to keep this law." The keeping of the Commandments is one of the three things, which we did "promise and vow in our baptism:" and the hearing of them distinctly rehearsed to us must be of peculiar use, when we are going to renew that vow in the Lord's supper.

Not but without this relative use of the Commandments, secondly, the rehearsal of them, in the manner prescribed, is of general and standing advantage to Christians. For I would ask, what can be of greater advantage to them, than the familiar knowledge of those things, the performance whereof is the condition of salvation? Now our Saviour hath said, "If thou wouldest enter into life, keep the commandments."

[f] COMMANDMENTS, and the people still kneeling shall[f], after every Commandment, ask God mercy for their transgression thereof for the time past, and grace to keep the same for the time to come, as followeth.

Minister.

GOD spake these words[g], and said; I am the Lord thy God:

Moses, to enforce the keeping of them, saith, "They shall be in thine heart: and thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes." Doubtless this recital of them in the hearing of the people has all these effects; for it regularly reprints them upon their memories, which otherwise would regularly be worn out and effaced by the impressions of their weekly affairs. And the people themselves, being obliged after every Commandment to "ask God mercy for their transgression thereof for the time past, and grace to keep the same for the time to come," what do they at each rehearsal, but, as by a new tie, "bind them for a sign upon their hands and as frontlets between their eyes?" Dr. Bisse.

These laws never any man did or can observe, without God's preventing and assisting grace: and therefore we are directed by the Church to invoke God's grace for the performance of his will: to every precept we are taught to apply St. Augustine's petition, "Grant me to do what thou commandest." The sum of this petitionary response is derived from Deut. v. 29: "O that there were such an heart in them, that they would keep all my commandments!" And, as we crave such an heart from God, so we implore his mercy for our violation of them. L'Estrange.

[f] — and the people still kneeling shall &c.] When we hear these holy Commandments read in the church, we must receive them with equal reverence and humility as if God Himself spake them from mount Sinai: and, because we have offended against them all, we must kneel down as criminals ought to do, and diligently consider, as the priest reads them, what sins we have done against each Commandment; and when we have found out the particular transgressions, we must at the close of every command, most earnestly beg pardon for them, saying, "Lord, have mercy upon us," and forgive us for these great offences; and, that we may never commit the like again, O do thou "incline our hearts to keep these laws." And thus the law of God may be a daily means of our repentance and reformation. Dean Comber.

Though I cannot say, this prayer for mercy after every one of the Commandments was very ancient, yet surely it cannot be denied to be very useful and pious. And if there be any, that think this might be spared, as fitter for poor publicans than saints, let them turn to the parable of the publican and Pharisee going up to the temple to pray, Luke xviii, and there they shall receive an answer. Bp. Sparrow.

It were well that the people should consider attentively the seriousness of this part of the office. The words of God Himself are read unto them by God's ambassador; and they are to be received with the utmost reverence, and a mind sincerely resolved to obey them. Now the congregation must not even mentally repeat them together with the minister: much less must they mutter them over aloud, and thereby disturb those who are placed near them: but attend to them as spoken by the minister, with an awful silence; and at the end of each Commandment fervently say, "Lord, have mercy upon us," &c.

It is much to be desired also that the clergy should, 1. not hurry the Commandments, but utter them with due deliberation, and give the people sufficient time to repeat, "Lord, have mercy upon us," &c.; that, in the use of that excellent petition, their minds may leisurely go along with the words, and accompany them with intense devotion. 2. That they should pronounce the Commandments, not in the same tone of voice with the other parts of the service, much less after the same manner with the prayers. But let such a difference be made, that the people may perceive and be sensible, that the minister is speaking to them in the name of God, and delivering to them a summary of that duty, upon the performance of which their eternal salvation does depend. Dr. Bennet.

The Ten Commandments were not appointed to be read in the first English Liturgy of 1549. They made no part of any ancient Liturgy: nor, if my information be correct, are they read in the Communion office of any of the reformed churches, except our own: and in ours they were first inserted at the review of Edward's Liturgy in 1552. The order for the rehearsal of them however requires neither vindication nor apology. At the same time the place, which they occupy, is more proper than any other that could easily be found. They stand in that part of the office, which is more generally preparatory to the holy Communion, immediately after the Collect for purity, and before the Epistle and Gospel. And when there is a Communion, they are consequently heard by all, by the younger as well as the older part of the congregation; by those, who do not communicate, as well as those who do. Shepherd.

[g] God spoke these words, &c.] Paraphrase on the Ten Commandments.

1. These are the precepts which God Almighty has commanded us, saying, first, Thou shalt have me for thy God, paying me all the duties which are owing to me as an eternal Creator, and an almighty Governour. "Believing" in me, Heb. xi. 6. "Trusting" in me, Prov. iii. 5. "Hoping" in me, 1 Tim. i. 1. "Loving" me, 1 John iv. 19. "Obeying" me, 1 John v. 3. "Fearing" me, Ps. cxi. 10. Secondly, Thou shalt worship no God together with me, or exclusively of me, by avoiding "polytheism," Deut. vi. 14; "idolatry," Jer. v. 19; "sorcery," Deut. xviii. 10, 11; and the "idolizing of riches," Job xxxi. 24; Col. iii. 5.

2. Thou shalt not worship me after the pagan way of images, Deut. iv. 12. 15; either of celestial bodies, as sun, moon, or stars, Job xxxi. 26; or of the inhabitants of the earth, as of men and beasts, &c., Dan. iii. 5; or of the fishes in the water. No manner of religious worship shalt thou pay to them, either by bowing to them, or kneeling, or by shewing any other token of religious regard; for I am very jealous of my honour in this respect, assuring you, that any that shall be guilty of this fault, I shall not only punish him in his own person, but in his family likewise for several generations. But, secondly, Thou shalt pay me my worship in the way which I shall direct, Deut. xii. 31, by "praying" to me, Luke xxi. 36; by "praising" me, Deut. x. 21; Acts xvi. 25; by "hearing" my holy word, Deut. iv. 10; Matt. iv. 4; by "frequenting the publick" congregations assembled for my worship, Ps. xxii. 22; Heb. x. 25.

3. First, Thou shalt not make use of my name in an oath to attest a false matter, Lev. xix. 12; Numb. xxx. 2; nor upon any trivial occasion, Matt. v. 34; James v. 12; nor speak of my attributes, Ps. lxxviii.

Thou shalt have none other gods but me.

Ps. xli. 4. 1 Kings viii. 57, 58.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, and visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and shew mercy unto thousands in them that love me, and keep my commandments.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not take the Name of the Lord thy God in vain:

19; Exod. v. 2; or my holy word, irreverently, 1 Tim. i. 13; nor shalt thou yet make a vow, which is an inferior kind of oath, rashly, Eccl. v. 2; insincerely, Ps. lxxviii. 36; nor without sufficient authority, Numb. xxx. 5; nor upon any but a very weighty occasion, Gen. xxviii. 20; Numb. xxx. 14; and when made, thou shalt carefully and readily perform it, Numb. xxx. 3; Acts v. 4. But, contrariwise, thou shalt honour me, by swearing truly and reverently by my name, Deut. vi. 13; x. 20; especially if it be for a charitable design, in deciding differences, Gen. xxvi. 28; Heb. vi. 16; if thou shalt at any time speak of me, it shall be with reverence, and an awful admiration of my being, Rom. ix. 5; 2 Cor. xi. 13; and if thou reason out of my revealed words, it must be not out of wantonness, but for edification, Acts xvii. 11; Ps. cxix. 172; if thou shalt make a vow upon any good and laudable account, Gen. xxviii. 20, thou shalt perform it conscientiously, Ps. cxxxii. 2. Now for a man to be faulty in any of these particulars, is to commit a great sin against God, for which He will most severely punish him.

4. Take great care to observe religiously the Sabbath-day, one day in the week, which I have especially set aside for my worship in remembrance of my creation of the universe: that day thou shalt keep holy, by thy own abstaining, and of all that belongs to thee, from work and ordinary calling: not to buy or sell, Neh. xiii. 15, or carry burdens, Jer. xvii. 22, or make journeys, Exod. xvi. 29, excepting works of necessity, as provision of food, and looking after cattle, Matt. xii. 11; fighting for defence of our country, 1 Mac. ii. 41; and works of charity, as healing the sick, and assisting women in their travail, Matt. xii. 7. 12; Hos. vi. 6; labour of ministers in the exercise of their calling, Matt. xii 5; and the travelling of people to the places of public worship, 2 Kings iv. 23. But the better part of the sanctification of this day does consist in performing the spiritual exercises, which all devout persons ought to spend their time in upon that day; joining in the publick devotion, and hearing the word preached, Lev. xxiii. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 2, and meditating upon it afterwards at home: in private devotions with their families, and in a more retired one by themselves in their own closets; by reading the holy Scriptures, and other good books; by visiting the poor, and relieving the needy; and by making up unhappy differences among neighbours.

5. Take care to perform thy duties as well to thy political parent the prince, who governs thee; to thy domestick parent thy master, who feeds and clothes thee; to thy ecclesiastical parent, who instructs thee; as to thy natural father and mother, who begat thee. 1. If thou art a subject, thou must honour the prince whom God has set over thee, 1 Pet. ii. 17; stand in awe of him, and obey him in all things not forbid by God, and contrary to national constitutions, and the liberties of a free people. Rom. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 13. Submit to his correction and punishment, 1 Pet. ii. 19, 20, and assist him with thy person, or thy money, in his just wars, or maintenance of the royal dignity, Matt. xxii. 17; Rom. xiii. 6, 7. And, on the other side, I will require of him to govern thee according to the rules of justice and piety, 1 Tim. ii. 2; that he shall seek thine and all his people's good, Rom. xiii 4. 2. If thou beest a servant, "reverence" and honour thy master, 1 Tim. vi. 1; "fear" to displease him, Mal. i. 6; "obey" his commands, Eph. vi. 5; be "patient" under his corrections, 1 Pet. ii. 18; and be "diligent" in thy business, Col. iii. 22, 23; studying in all things to "please" him, Tit. ii. 9. As, on the other side, I will for thy sake require of thy master, that he should not behave himself peevishly and perversely towards thee, 1 Pet. ii. 18; Deut. xxiv. 14, 15; but that he be "gentle and kind," as he shall expect to find favour from me, Col. iv. 1, and provide for thee in thy old age, if thou spendest thy whole time in his service, Prov. xvii. 2. 3. If thou art a lay person, thou must love thy pastor who has the care over thee, 1 Thess. v. 13; thou must pay him just reverence and respect, Phil. ii. 29; 1 Tim. v. 17; thou must submit thyself to his direction in spiritual matters, Heb. xiii. 17; thou must contribute to make him up a handsome and liberal maintenance, 1 Tim. v. 17, 18; Gal. vi. 6, 7; 1 Cor. ix. 7, &c. And, on the other side, I will require of him, that he shall look upon thee, and the rest of his flock, as his children, Gal. iv. 19; Phil. ii. 20; that by his holy life and conversation he shall set an example for thee to copy by, Tit. ii. 7; 1 Tim. iv. 12; that he shall be diligent in preaching the word in season, and out of season, 2 Tim. iv. 2; and, lastly, that he shall be meek, peaceable, and courteous, 2 Tim. ii. 22. 24. 4. As thou art a son or daughter, reverence and respect thy parents, though they happen to be in a mean condition, Mal. i 6; Matt. xxi. 31; obey them in all lawful things which they command thee, Eph. vi. 1; Col. iii. 20; relieve them when in want, Matt. xv. 4, 5; 1 Tim. v. 4; submit thyself to their instruction. Prov. i. 8, and, when thou art young, to their correction, Heb. xii. 7; and when thou art grown up thou shalt take their advice in any important affair of life, Gen. xxiv. 1, 2; xxvii. 46. Now, to answer this, I expect on thy parents' side, that they should nourish and bring thee up in thy childhood, 1 Tim. v. 10, provide necessaries for thee in that state, raiment, &c., Prov. xxxi. 15; 1 Tim. v. 8; instruct thee in religion, Deut. vi. 6, 7; 2 Tim. iii. 15; shew thee a good example, Job i. 5; Josh. xxiv. 15; keep thee in obedience by a just awe, avoiding fondness and rigour, 1 Tim. iii. 4, and laying up for thee, to put thee out into the world, according to thy birth and quality, 2 Cor. xii. 14. Now if thou dost discharge these duties, I will reward thee not only with temporal but with spiritual blessings.

6. Thou shalt not only avoid the barbarous crime of murder upon the body of thy neighbour, Gen. ix. 5, 6; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless, that taketh his Name in vain.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath-day. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all that thou hast to do: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no manner of work, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, thy cattle, and the stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Honour thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long in the land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt do no murder.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not commit adultery.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not steal.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

People. Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law.

Minister. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his servant, nor his maid, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is his.

People. Lord, have mercy upon

Numb. xxxv. 16; but the laying of violent hands upon thyself, as some discontented wicked men have done, 1 Sam. xxxi. 4; Acts i. 18; as also the careless meddling with such instruments of death, as may destroy those that are near us, especially the striking with them in rage, Numb. xxxv. 16, 17, &c. Thou shalt avoid likewise the occasions of murder, immoderate "anger," Matt. v. 21, 22; "hatred," 1 John iii. 15; "malice," and bitterness of speech, Eph. iv. 31. But on the contrary, thou shalt practise the virtues of peaceableness, Rom. xii. 18; meekness, Rom. xii. 17; and charity, Rom. xii. 20.

7. Thou shalt not defile thyself with the foul sin of "adultery," by unlawful familiarity with the husband or wife of another, Lev. xx. 10; Heb. xiii. 4; Ezek. xxii. 11; or, which is worse, to cover it under pretence of marriage, which is called "polygamy," Lev. xviii. 18; Mal. ii. 14, 15; 1 Cor. vii. 2; and, which is still more criminal, have unlawful commixtures with those of the "same blood," Lev. xviii. 6; 1 Cor. v. 1; or with those of the "same sex," Rom. i. 26, 27; Lev. xviii. 22; or with those of a "different kind," Lev. xviii. 23; xx. 15. Thou shalt likewise avoid "fornication," or uncleanness committed between single persons, 1 Cor. vi. 9; and the incitements thereunto, "drunkenness," 1 Pet. iv. 3; Prov. xxiii. 31. 33; "wanton behaviour," 2 Pet. ii. 7; 2 Cor. xii. 21; "attire," Prov. vii. 10; Zeph. i. 8; "idleness," Ezek. xvi. 49. But contrary to all these foul vices, thou must be chaste in thy "thoughts," Matt. xv. 19; "words," 1 Cor. v. 6; Col. iii. 8; and "behaviour," Tit. ii. 3.

8. Thou shalt not commit the outrageous act of robbery, or forcibly taking away from thy neighbour, Lev. xix. 11. 13; nor be guilty of private "stealing," Eph. iv. 28; nor of extortion or unjust gain, Prov. xxviii. 8; Hab. ii. 9; 1 Cor. v. 11: nor of fraud in dealing, Prov. xx. 10; xxix. 5; nor of gripingness and hardship towards the poor, Prov. xxii. 16; Isa. iii. 15. But on the other side thou shouldest be honest in all thy dealings, Prov. xvi. 11; if thou hast done any wrong, thou shalt make restitution for it, Ezek. xxxiii. 15; Exod. xxii. 1; thou shalt be merciful and charitable to the poor, Lev. xix. 9; Prov. xix. 17; and thou shalt be diligent in thy calling, 2 Thess. iii. 11, 12; Matt. xxv. 30; Prov. xviii. 9.

9. Thou must take care not to commit that horrid villany, of giving a false testimony in a judicial matter, to the prejudice of thy neighbour, 1 Kings xxi. 13; or by glossing, with artificial words or circumstances, a true one, Matt. xxvi. 60, 61; or suborn wicked men to give a false testimony, 1 Kings xxi. 10. Thou shalt not slander thy neighbour by uttering a malicious lie, in prejudice of his reputation or interest, James i. 26; iv. 11; Eph. iv. 25; nor report abroad his secret faults, unless irreclaimable, Prov. x. 18; nor willingly hear or repeat ill stories of thy neighbour, Prov. xvii. 4; Exod. xxiii. 1; Gen. xxxix. 19; 2 Sam. xvi. 3, 4; nor rashly censure his actions, 1 Sam. i. 13; Acts ii. 13; Luke vii. 39. But, on the contrary, thou oughtest to vindicate him when he is wronged, John vii. 50, 51; and in every thing which will bear it, judge charitably of him, 1 Cor. xiii. 5.

10. Thou shalt not allow thyself in any unlawful hankering after thy neighbour's estate, Deut. v. 21; 1 Kings xxi; or wife, 2 Sam. xi; or any other of his goods and possessions, 1 Sam. xii. 3; or in any evil fancies or thoughts, which may incline thee to evil, Prov. xxiv. 9; Zech. viii. 17; Deut. xv. 9; Isa. lv. 7; Acts viii. 22; but shall be content with thy present state, Heb. xiii. 5; and be diligent in thy own calling, 2 Thess. iii. 10. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 20; and shalt mortify the lusts of the flesh, Gal. v. 24. Dr. Nicholls.

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, we are taught by thy holy Word, that the hearts of Kings are Prov. xxi. 1.

[h] Then shall follow one of these two Collects for the Queen,] St. Paul commands us to pray first of all for kings, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2; and therefore in the beginning of this office we place these prayers; and though we had prayed for them before, yet the king's prosperity is so great and universal a blessing, we cannot ask it too often. This of old was a distinct office used some hours after Morning Prayer, and in the primitive church they did especially pray for the king in the Communion office, where, by virtue of the sacrifice of Christ's death commemorated, these great requests might be most likely to prevail. And in our Liturgy these prayers do not (as in the Roman missal) disturb the prayer of consecration, but are more conveniently placed; for we pray for the king immediately after the Commandments, because he is the defender of both tables; and just before the daily Collect, that when we have prayed for outward prosperity to the church, the consequent of the king's welfare, we may in the Collect pray for inward grace, to make it completely happy. Dean Comber.

The primitive Christians, in every publick office, presented a supplication for their sovereign. Now, in this office, unless it were put in the beginning, few in proportion would join in it when the sacrament is administered, considering how many return home without receiving: and therefore it was placed here, just after the Ten Commandments, of which the authority of the magistrate is one main support, as they are of that in return: and we pray the Almighty, that, in "mercy to his Church, he will so rule the king's heart," whom in the course of his providence He hath "chosen" to reign over us, and to be his "servant" and "minister" to us for good, Rom. xiii. 4, "that he may above all things seek his honour and glory," by maintaining his laws above mentioned; and will so rule our "hearts" likewise, and those of "all his subjects, that we may faithfully and humbly obey him: in God," that is, in the strength of his grace, and in subordination, not contradiction to his supreme will; and "for God," not only "for" fear of "man's wrath," "but for conscience sake also," Rom. xiii. 5. Abp. Secker.

[i] The Priest standing as before,] Not standing, as he rehearsed the Commandments: for, if that were designed, nothing would have been said here. But "standing as before," namely, as he stood at the north side of the table, "before" he was ordered to "turn to the people." When the Commandments are read by him, he directs himself to the people: when he comes to the Collect, he directs himself to the Almighty by prayer. Collis.

[k] Have mercy upon the whole Church; and so rule the heart &c.] The blessings which are bestowed upon the single members of a church, are the comfort and advantage only of a few: but if it may please God to direct the king always to seek his glory, herein he shews mercy to the whole church, and blesseth all the nation at once. For the prince's piety doth put such discouragement upon vice, and cast so great reputation and lustre upon religion, that good men out of love will follow, and evil men for fear will pretend to comply with, so excellent an example. And thus virtue becomes publick, is encouraged, and prevails; but wickedness become infamous and obscure, and loseth many of its followers. Dean Comber.

[l] And that we, and all her subjects &c.] We must not only look at the king's duty, but also be mindful of our own; for the happiness of a nation consisteth, not only in a religious prince, but also in obedient people. And therefore we are here taught to pray, that not only we, but all that are under his majesty's dominion, may be loyal and faithful, humble and obedient, revering his authority, observing his laws, and opposing all his and our enemies: that we may serve him with our estates and persons, if need be; and never desert his interest, either for cost or peril. Which prayer we must not only make with respect to our temporal felicity: but as "duly considering," that the Almighty and invisible Governour of the world doth not rule us immediately by Himself; but by kings, to whom He hath delegated his authority; so that they bear his name, and act by his power, Exod. xxii. 28; Ps. lxxxii. 1. 6. And such as rebel do fight against God, Acts v. 39, oppose his word, and resist his ordinance, Rom. xiii. 2. Wherefore we desire grace to obey, not only for fear of wrath, but "for the Lord's sake," 1 Pet. ii. 13; that is, "for conscience sake," Rom. xiii. 5. And this will produce the firmest and readiest obedience to all the commands of our governours; when we observe them as subordinate to the laws of God; "in the Lord," Eph. vi. 1; as far as they do not contradict the plain will of the Almighty; and "for the Lord," Rom. xiii. 1, that is, because of his authority vested in them. And thus the best Christian will be the best subject. Dean Comber.

[m] —in thee, and for thee,] St. Paul says, "Children, obey your parents in the Lord," Eph. vi. 1, that is, in all such particulars, as are agreeable to, and consistent with, the laws of the Lord. In this sense we pray, that we may obey the king "in the Lord," namely, as far as we can with a safe conscience: and we also pray that we may obey him "for the Lord," that is, for his sake, out of a principle of duty, as he has God's authority, and is his vicegerent. Dr. Bennet.

[n] Or, &c.] This prayer is only added to help our in thy rule and governance, and that thou dost dispose and turn them as it seemeth best to thy godly wisdom; We humbly beseech thee so to dispose and govern the heart of VICTORIA thy Servant, our Queen and Governour, that, in all her thoughts, words, and works, she may ever seek thy honour and glory, and study to preserve thy people committed to her charge, in wealth, peace, and godliness: Grant this, O merciful Father, for thy dear Son's sake, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

devotion with a greater variety: but being as to the main so little different from the former, it shall suffice to remark, that the petitions are here grounded on a never-failing foundation, the word of God, Prov. xx. 1. Although "the king's heart be unsearchable" to men, Prov. xxv. 3, and his purposes seldom to be altered by his inferiors; yet Almighty God hath shewn many instances that He can change the decrees of the greatest monarchs; and direct their counsels to his own glory, and the prosperity of his Church. See Ezra i. 1; vii. 28; ix. 9; Neh. i. 11; Dan. iii. 28. Dean Comber.

Both of these prayers are very excellent: but the former certainly the more complete; as it includes a petition for the Church, and for the discharge of the duty of subjects towards their sovereign, of which the other prayer takes no notice. It may perhaps be objected, on the other hand, that the former is silent about the duty of kings in promoting "the wealth, peace, and godliness" of their subjects. But this, though not mentioned so explicitly as in the other, is evidently implied in that clause, where we pray that the king, "knowing whose minister he is, may above all things seek the honour and glory of God;" which he cannot do, without seeking the welfare and happiness of his people; imitating Him in his goodness, whom he represents in his office. The remaining part of the prayer, which concerns our duty, is most happily expressed: "that we, and all his subjects, duly considering whose authority he hath," a consideration we should ever seriously attend to, "may faithfully serve, honour, and humbly obey him, in thee and for thee," from a principal of conscience, and a thorough conviction of our duty, "according to thy blessed word and ordinance;" which prescribes nothing more fully and clearly than our indispensable obligation to "honour and obey the king." Waldo.

The petitions in the latter Collect particularly are grounded upon the assurance of the word of God, that "the heart of the king is in the hand of the Lord, and that as the rivers of water he turneth it whithersoever he will." To preserve internal tranquillity, to protect us from foreign enemies, and to defend us in the exercise of true religion, is the object of the royal prerogative, for the stability and due regulation of which, it is the duty and interest of every good subject devoutly to pray. Shepherd.

[o] Then shall be said the Collect of the Day, &c.] After these prayers for the outward prosperity of the Church, follows "the Collect of the Day," for inward grace, (of which we have spoken before,) and to this is immediately subjoined "the Epistle and Gospel;" the Jews read the history of their deliverance from Egypt before the passover, and all the ancient fathers and liturgies declare that the Christians did read select portions of the New Testament, before they received the Eucharist; they did not eat their common meals without reading some part of Scripture, because St. Paul had said, the creatures "were sanctified by the word of God and prayer," 1 Tim. iv. 5; much less would they eat this spiritual food, without reading first some of God's word. As for the particular places, they are the most choice and practical parts of all the New Testament; and have been fixed to those very Sundays, on which we now use them, above 1200 (1300) years, as could be proved by divers passages in the homilies of the ancient fathers. And there is an old tractate, called "The Lectionary of St. Hierome," which being compared with our Epistles and Gospels, they are generally the same now as they were then. The council of Valentia, in the year 524, ordered them to be read before the Creed, that the Catechumens might hear them. The Epistle is read first, as being the word of the servants: the Gospel follows, as being the word of our great Master: and of old, when the minister was about to read this, "all the people stood up, and said, Glory be to thee, O Lord," as St. Crysostom relates; and, after it was finished, they sang Hallelujah, or said, "Thanks be to God for his holy Gospel." Dean Comber.

[p] And immediately after the Collect] Hitherto the minister, who officiates, is injoined to "stand," and the people to "kneel:" because the posture of standing is in him very becoming in eucharistical or thanksgiving offices; and it is especially proper, when he delivers the Commandments from God, as Moses from Mount Sinai, that he should do it in a gesture intimating his authority, and that he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts. And kneeling is as proper for the congregation, whilst they humbly implore grace and pardon of God, and beg a blessing for those, whom He hath set over them. And this is the rather taken notice of, because several, for want of observing the directions of the rubrick, though they kneel during the other parts of the service, are, whilst the Communion office is reading, wanting in the decent and humble posture here required of them. Whereas the very nature of this solemn office demands of us as much penitential humility and lowly reverence in our gestures, as any other part of the Liturgy. Archdeacon Yardley.

[q] — the Priest shall read the Epistle, saying, &c.] We call it "the Epistle," because it is usually taken out of one of the Epistles. But, if at any time a portion of other Scripture is read instead of one taken out of some of the Epistles, then we say, "The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle:" so that our Church, when she makes so manifest a difference at the time of reading, ought not to be blamed, though the word Epistle be sometimes given to such portions of Scripture as are taken elsewhere. The Gospel is always taken out of one of the Gospels, and has its name accordingly. Dr. Bennet.

The words between brackets [or, The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle] were added at the last review, to satisfy the dissenters, who charged the minister with telling a lie, when the portion of Scripture was taken not out of an Epistle. Dr. Bisse, Dr. Nicholls. They are to be said, when either a portion of the Old Testament, Acts of the Apostles, or Revelation is appointed in the place of a passage from an apostolick Epistle. Otherwise the words "The Epistle is written"

Epistle [or, The portion of Scripture appointed for the Epistle] is written in the —— Chapter of —— beginning at the —— Verse. And the Epistle ended, he shall say, Here endeth the Epistle. Then shall he read the Gospel (the people all standing up[r]) saying, The holy Gospel is written in the —— Chapter of —— beginning at the —— Verse. And the Gospel ended[s], shall be sung or said the Creed[t] following[u], the people still standing as before[x].

That a portion out of one of the Epistles, written by the holy apostles, was read constantly, when the Communion was celebrated in the primitive church, may be proved from many passages out of ancient writers. These readings indeed out of the Epistles were larger portions than the Epistles now read. But however these are of so long standing, that a writer who flourished near a thousand years ago, could not assign the time of their original. The reading of the Gospel, as well as of the Epistle, in the Communion service, was a practice in the church, at the latest in the sixth century; for in the council of Valentia, which was a provincial council, held in Spain, about 520, the following order was made: "We think it fit to be observed, that in that part of the Communion service, which the Catechumens are to be present at, before the offertory, the Gospels be read according to the order prescribed, after the Epistle." But, that the custom prevailed long before this council, is plain, because the council, in its preface, says, "they did only gather together ancient canons."

It may be here noted, that the former part of the service was called "Missa Catechumenorum;" because the Catechumens were obliged to go out before the consecration, when the deacon made proclamation, "Let none of the Catechumens stay: Ite, missa est: Go, Catechumens, your part of the service is over." Hence St. Augustin says, "Ecce, post sermonem fit missa Catechumenis: After sermon the Catechumens are dismissed." Hence, towards the latter end of the third century, the Communion service came to be called "missa" or "mass." Dr. Nicholls.

[r] — (the people all standing up)] At the reading of the Gospels two peculiar marks of honour were shewn in the ancient church, which continue in our Church at this day.

The first is, that all the congregation stand up at the reading of them, as being the word of the Master; whereas at the reading of the Epistles they are indulged the posture of sitting, as being the words of the servants. This reverence the catholic church, throughout the East and West, hath always paid to the Son of God, above all other messengers. And our Church hath continued the practice of the same, as directed in her rubrick; so that this is not only recommended by antiquity, but also injoined by authority: a reverential custom, surely very meet to be kept up every where in honour to the Son of God, but especially in this Church and nation; since no less is paid to our king himself, at the reading of whose commissions the highest court among us, even of our nobles, stand up and uncover the head.

Secondly, the other honour, paid to the Gospel, was, that after the naming of it all the people standing up said, "Glory be to thee, O Lord." This usage, borrowed from ancient liturgies, our reformers continued in ours; and, though afterwards discontinued in the rubrick, yet custom still continues the use of it in most cathedral and in many parochial churches: and the voice of custom is in many cases the voice of law. Dr. Bisse.

The antiquity and piety of these rites, used both by us and the ancient church about the reading of the Gospel, deserve notice. As first, when the Gospel is named, the clergy and the people present say or sing, "Glory be to thee, O Lord:" so it is in St. Chrysostom's Liturgy, "glorifying God that hath sent to them also the word of salvation:" as it is in the Acts of the Apostles, chap. xi. 18, "When they heard these things they glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." 2. While the Gospel is reading, all that are present "stand." So Gratian says. And Sozomen in his history tells us, it was a new fashion in Alexandria, that the Bishop did not rise up when the Gospel was read: which, says he, "I never observed nor heard amongst any others whatsoever." The reason was this: anciently, whensoever the holy lessons were read, the people stood to express their reverence to the holy word; Neh. viii. 5. But because this was counted too great a burthen, it was thought fit to shew our reverence especially at the reading of the Gospel, which historically declares somewhat which our Saviour spake, did, or suffered, in his own person; by this gesture shewing a reverend regard to the Son of God above other messengers, although speaking as from God. And against Arians, Jews, Infidels, who derogate from the honour of our Lord, such ceremonies are most profitable; as judicious Mr. Hooker notes. 3. After the Gospel is ended, the use was to praise God, saying, "Thanks be to God for this Gospel." So was it of old ordained, by the Council of Toledo, that the lauds or praises should be said, not after the Epistle, but immediately after the Gospel, for the glory of Christ, which is preached in the Gospel. Bp. Sparrow.

The custom of saying "Glory be to thee, O Lord," when the minister is about to read the holy Gospel, has no authority for it in our present Liturgy. It was injoined indeed by King Edward the Sixth's first Common Prayer Book; and so the custom has continued ever since. And I do not know how it came to be left out of the rubrick afterwards. It certainly could have nothing objected to it: and therefore it is restored in the Scotch Liturgy. Wheatly. It seems to have been left out by the printer's negligence. Bp. Overall.

[s] And the Gospel ended,] At the end of the Epistle the minister is directed to say "Here endeth the Epistle." But at the ending of the Gospel he is left without direction, and so must proceed on in course to the Nicene Creed. They, who undertake to account for every thing, tell us, that the reason of this is, that the Gospel is supposed to be continued in the Creed, and endeth not properly till we conclude with "life of the world to come. Amen." But, whether this be thought a satisfactory reason or not, yet the silence of the rubrick is a sufficient argument, that we ought not to put in any words of our own at the end of the Gospel; the want of an order in this case amounting to a prohibition. Archdeacon Sharp. See p. 22, note r.

[t] — shall be sung or said the Creed] The Church for three hundred years had been content to profess in her Creed that Christ was the Lord; comprehending under this title the highest appellations given to Him in Scripture, without stating minutely, or scrutinizing too narrowly, a doctrine proposed rather to us as an object of faith, than of understanding. Happy had it been for

See the other Creeds, Te Deum, &c.

I Believe[y] in one God[z] the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, And of all things visible and invisible:

the Christian world, if this moderation of the church had been suffered to continue; but Arius, a discontented priest of Alexandria in Egypt, either having conceived a different opinion, or wishing to bring himself into notice by the assertion of a novelty, took upon him to maintain, that Christ was not a divine person, in the highest sense, but a creature superior indeed to human nature, but not partaker of the supreme Godhead.

The publishing of this opinion raised a violent ferment and schism in the church. Constantine the Roman emperor summoned a Council at Nice in Bithynia, to settle this dispute; and there, in the year 325, Arius's doctrine was condemned in an assembly of 300 bishops, and that Creed framed, which from the name of the city was called the Nicene Creed. And here it is necessary to observe, that the meaning of the three Creeds of our Church, and all Creeds that can be composed on Gospel principles, is nothing more than a declaration of the sense, in which we accept the profession made in our baptism. By baptism we are admitted into the church of Christ; by the command of Christ we are baptized "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This is the condition, by which alone we can partake of the Christian covenant; this is the mark, by which alone we are distinguished from the professors of every other religion upon earth.

When we repeat a Creed, therefore, we do no more than declare our repeated assent to the conditions of the baptismal covenant; and it would be sufficient to do this in the very words that Christ enjoins, "I believe in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," if explanations had not been demanded, to shew what we mean by this declaration. Creeds then do not, properly speaking, contain articles of faith, but an explanation of the sense in which we understand the primary position of our religion. And this view of the matter will shew us the reason, why no creed is prescribed in Scripture; why all creeds ever have been, and ever must be, the composition of men. Dean Vincent.

The three Creeds, which are the three barriers of the faith of our Church, extracted from the holy Scripture in the purer ages of Christianity, though variously expressed, are yet the same in substance; agreeable to each other; and all agreeable to the word of God, and approved all along by the Catholick church. In these forms she calls upon her members to declare their belief to be consonant to that of the church universal. The Apostles' Creed, as the plainest and shortest form, is appointed for common and daily use. The Athanasian for festivals, which relate more immediately to our Saviour; or which are placed at such convenient distances from each other, as that none may be wholly ignorant of the mysteries therein contained. And the Nicene Creed is to be repeated on every festival; and, as a creed was used in the Communion office of the primitive church, whenever the Eucharist is administered according to the institution of our Lord: whose eternal generation, Godhead, incarnation, sufferings, and exaltation, are therein summarily contained and acknowledged. Archdeacon Yardley.

[y] —the Creed following.] Called "the Nicene Creed," because it was for the most part framed at the great Council of Nice. But because the great Council of Constantinople added the latter part, and brought it to the frame which we now use, therefore it is called also "the Constantinopolitan Creed." This creed began to be used in churches at the Communion service immediately after the Gospel, in the year of our Lord 339. Afterwards it was established in the churches of Spain and France, after the custom of the Eastern church, by the Council of Toledo, and continued down to our times. The reason why this Creed follows immediately after the Epistle and Gospel, is the same that was given for the Apostles' Creed following next after the Lessons at Morning and Evening Prayer. See page 27, note g. To which the Canon of Toledo hath added another reason for saying it here, before the people draw near to the holy communion: namely, that the breasts of those, who approach to those dreadful mysteries, may be purified by a true and right faith. Bp. Sparrow.

The Creed is a summary of the doctrine of the Gospel, and here is placed next to it, because it is grounded upon it. In the Gospel we "believe with our heart unto righteousness:" in the Creed we "confess with our mouth unto salvation," Rom. x. 10; for all the people ought to repeat the Creed after the minister. It doth more largely condemn all heresies than the Apostles' Creed: wherefore it is fitly enjoined to be recited by all before the Sacrament, to shew that all the communicants are free from heresy, and in the strictest league of union with the catholick church; as also to prepare themselves for worthy receiving, by exercising that faith, of which they have so much use at the Lord's table, as the Council of Toledo ordained in the year 600. So that every one must openly profess and firmly embrace all these articles, before he can be fit to receive; yea, and while he repeats them with his lips, he must resolve to shew forth in his life, that he doth sincerely believe them, by strictly living according to them. Dean Comber.

As in the Morning Prayer, so in the Communion service, for the same reason, after reading the Scripture, we recite the Creed: only then we have that of the ancient Latin church; here that of the ancient Greek: made in the first General Council, held at Nice, above 1400 years ago, and thence called Nicene: excepting that some small additions were inserted since; all of them, but one, consisting of the words "and the Son," about 50 years after. Abp. Secker.

Besides the general reasons for repeating the Creed, the rehearsal of our faith before the receiving of the holy communion is founded on these two special grounds. 1. It is meet that all should first profess the same faith, who partake of the same mysteries; for surely, if "no stranger nor uncircumcised person" could eat of the passover, that typical sacrament, Exod. xii. 43. 48; much more no stranger to the Christian faith, nor unbeliever, should partake of the real sacrament of the Lord's supper. 2. As the acknowledgment of the articles of our Christian faith is part of the vow made at our baptism, so ought the same acknowledgment to be repeated at the Lord's supper, wherein we renew that vow. Dr. Bisse.

Add to this, that every solemn confession of our faith must be looked upon as giving glory and honour to God, in recognising his essence and attributes, and the blessings which flow from those sources on mankind: and hence it, in a peculiar manner, befits this holy service of thanks and praise. In this we imitate the most ancient Liturgies of the Church; which, when this holy sacrament was celebrated, had an eucharistical form, wherein God's power and goodness were acknowledged in the creation, preservation, and redemption of the world. Thus we, though in a shorter form of undoubted authority, confess to the holy and undivided Trinity, and distinctly own the divinity of each person. We commemorate the creation of the world by "God the Father Almighty." We acknowledge Jesus Christ to be our "Lord;" to have been "begotten" from all eternity, to be "of one substance with the Father," and with Him Creator of all things: that "for our salvation he came down from heaven, was made man, suffered, and died" for us. We commemorate his resurrection, ascension, and sitting at God's right hand: express our expectation of his second coming; and declare that "his kingdom shall have no end." We confess to God, that He hath inspired the prophets; that He hath built a church on the foundation of the apostles; that He hath appointed baptism for the remission of sins; and given us leave to "look for the resurrection of the dead," and an happy eternity.

What more glorious hymn, than this, can we sing to the honour of God? Is it possible to mention any thing else that can so much redound to his glory? May not this our service be well styled the Eucharist, when we thus give praise and glory to Almighty God for the wonderful manifestation of his attributes, and the inestimable blessings He hath bestowed upon us? Let not any one therefore think, that repeating the Creed is barely a declaration of his faith to the rest of the congregation: for, besides that, it is a most solemn act of worship, in which we honour and magnify God, both for what He is in Himself, and for what He hath done for us. And let us all, sensible of this, repeat it with reverential voice and gesture; and lift up our hearts with faith, thankfulness, and humble devotion, whenever we say, "I believe, &c." Archdeacon Yardley.

[x] — the people still standing as before.] For reasons assigned in the note before the Apostles' Creed. See page 29. note i.

To what is there said about the custom of turning to the east, and bowing at the name of Jesus, when we make confession of our faith, the following remarks, explaining and recommending those customs, may be here added.

As to the first, it was the custom of the ancient church to turn to the altar or east, not only at the confessions of faith, but in all the publick prayers. And therefore Epiphanius, speaking of the madness of the impostor Elzæus, counts this as one instance of it among other things, that he forbade praying towards the east. Now this is the most honourable place in the house of God, and is therefore separated from the lower and inferior parts of the church, answering to the holy of holies in the Jewish tabernacle, which was severed by a veil from the sanctuary: and the holy table or altar in the one answers to the mercy-seat in the other. As then the Jews worshipped, "lifting up their hands towards the mercy-seat," Ps. xxviii. 2, and even the Cherubim were formed with their faces looking towards it, Exod. xxv. 19; so the primitive Christians did in their worship look towards the altar, of which the mercy-seat was a type. And therefore the altar was usually called "the tabernacle of God's glory," his "chair of state," "the throne of God," "the type of heaven," "heaven itself:" for these reasons did they always in praying look towards it. But in rehearsing our Creeds this custom is still more proper and significant: for we are appointed to perform it "standing," by this posture declaring our resolution to stand by, or defend, that faith, which we have professed: so that at these times we resemble not so much an assembly, as an army: as then, in every well-marshalled army all look and move one way, so should we always do in a regular assembly; but especially at the confessions of faith all "Christ's faithful soldiers" should shew by this uniformity of gesture, that they hold the unity of faith.

The other usage, of bowing at the name of Jesus, seems founded on that Scripture, where it is declared, that "God hath given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father," Isa. xlv. 23; Phil. ii. 9, &c. Now though the rubrick be silent herein, yet the Canon of our Church thus enjoins: "that when in time of divine service, &c." see p. 30, note m. Now if such reverence be due to that great and ever-blessed name, when it is mentioned in the lesson or sermon, how much more in the Creeds, when we mention it with our own lips, making confession of our faith in it, adding the very reason given in the Canon, that we believe in Him, as "the only Son," or "only-begotten Son of God," the Saviour of the world; and when too we do this "standing," which is the proper posture for doing reverence? Dr. Bisse.

Because the Gospels, which are weekly read, do all historically declare something, which our Lord Jesus Christ Himself either spake, did, or suffered in his own person, it hath been the custom of Christian men then especially in token of the greater reverence to stand, to utter certain words of acclamation, and at the name of Jesus to bow. Which harmless ceremonies, as there is no man constrained to use; so we know no reason wherefore any man should yet imagine it an unsufferable evil. It sheweth a reverend regard to the Son of God above other messengers, although speaking as from God also. And against Infidels, Jews, Arians, who derogate from the honour of Jesus Christ, such ceremonies are thus profitable. As for any erroneous estimation, advancing the Son above the Father and the Holy Ghost, seeing that the truth of his equality with them is a mystery so hard for the wits of mortal men to rise unto, of all heresies that which may give Him superiority above them is least to be feared. Hooker.

[y] I believe &c.] Paraphrase on the Creed. "I" confess with my mouth, and "believe" with my heart "in one God," a pure and infinite Spirit, distinguished into three Persons, the first of which is God "the Father Almighty," who is the Creator and "Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things" contained in either of them, both "visible" and bodily substances on earth, "and invisible" or spiritual substances which are in heaven.

"And" I also believe "in one Lord Jesus Christ," the second Person of the glorious Trinity, not the adopted, but "the only-begotten Son of God," not created in time, but "begotten of his Father" from eternity "before all worlds;" of the same nature with the Father, "God" begotten "of God," after a wonderful manner, as "light" is kindled "of light," not diminishing his Father's substance, yet being "very God of very God:" He was "begotten" by eternal generation, "not made" as the creatures were, "being of one" nature and "substance with the Father," and equal to Him in dignity and power; for He is that eternal Word "by whom all things were made" out of nothing; yea, I believe it is He "who for us men, and for our salvation," when we

Very God of very God[b], Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made[c]: Who for us men, and were fallen into a deplorable estate of sin and misery, "came down from heaven" to this earth; left his glory "and was incarnate," assuming a body of flesh like ours, only it had no sin, because it was conceived "by the" power of the "Holy Ghost" in the womb "of the Virgin Mary:" so that though he remained very God still, yet He took on Him our nature, "and was made man," being both God and man in one person: He taught us by his precepts, and led us by his example while He lived, and at last He suffered "and was crucified also," enduring that painful and shameful death, to satisfy God's justice "for us," who were liable to suffer eternal death: and though as to Himself He was innocent, yet he was condemned unjustly to this "under Pontius Pilate," the Roman president of Judea, and "he suffered" it with admirable patience, till he died in those torments, "and was buried;" yet when He had paid the full price for our sins, upon "the third day" after his crucifixion "he rose again" to life, "according to" what was prophesied in "the Scriptures" of the Old Testament, and declared to be fulfilled in the New: after this He conversed forty days with his disciples, "and" then "ascended" in their sight "into heaven," where He is restored to all his glory, "and sitteth at the right hand of the Father" interceding for us: "and he shall come again" from thence at the end of the world "with glory" and great majesty, "to judge" all mankind "both the quick and the dead" according to their works, condemning the wicked to endless torments, and advancing the righteous to reign in glory with this their Saviour, "whose kingdom shall have no end."

"And I believe" also "in the Holy Ghost," the third Person of the glorious Trinity, who is very God, "the Lord and Giver of" spiritual "life" and sanctifying grace, "who" is not begotten as the Son, but "proceedeth from the Father and the Son," yet is not less in dignity; for it is He "who with the Father and the Son together" in all offices of the Church "is worshipped and glorified," and "who spake by the prophets" in the Old Testament, and by the apostles in the New. "And" finally "I believe" the whole body of Christians, holding the right faith, do make "one Catholick," universal, true, "and Apostolick Church." In which blessed society "I acknowledge" there are many privileges, namely, "one baptism" instituted by Christ "for the remission of" all the "sins" we are guilty of when we enter into this covenant. "And I," as a member of this society, "look for" and expect my body, though corrupted in the grave, shall be restored to life in "the resurrection of the dead," and I hope then for a portion in the glory "and the life" everlasting which Christ hath promised to all his servants, in his kingdom "of the world to come." And oh that it may be unto me according to my faith! "Amen." Dean Comber.

[z] I believe in one God,] The word "one" is not in the Apostles' Creed, but it is properly inserted here, not only in opposition to the error of the Gentiles, who held that there were more than one God; but also to meet the calumny of hereticks, who called the Catholicks worshippers not of one God, but of three Gods. The consubstantiality of the three Persons constitutes the unity of the Godhead. Bp. Cosin.

[a] And in one Lord Jesus Christ, &c.] We make this profession of our belief, because some had spoken of the human and divine nature of our Saviour, which they called Jesus and Christ, as two Persons not united. The words "light of light," intimating that his divine nature is from the Father, as light is from the sun, or as one light without diminution of itself kindles another, were intended for some imperfect illustration, and doubtless a very imperfect one it is, and any other must be, of his mysterious generation. Abp. Secker.

This Creed is somewhat more full and explicit than that of the Apostles. That grand article of our faith, the divinity of our blessed Saviour, is here strongly asserted: that He is "God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God," really, truly, and properly God; "begotten, not made," or created: "being of the same substance," that is, of the same nature, or essence, "with the Father;" and that "by Him," namely, by the Son, (see below, note c,) "all things were made." After speaking of his incarnation, birth, suffering, resurrection, and coming to judgment "with glory," which are noticed in the other Creeds, these words follow, "of whose kingdom there shall be no end;" which are part of the angel's address to the Virgin Mary, Luke i. 33. For though his mediatorial kingdom shall cease, and be delivered up to the Father, yet, as God, He shall reign with Him and the Holy Spirit, for ever and ever. Waldo. See below, note d.

The articles, in which this Creed particularly differs from the Apostles', were introduced into it, not because the Church believed more in the year 300 than in the year 50, but because the Arians believed less. Particular attention is due to this point, because the enlargement of the Creed seems to present an appearance, as if the Church had enlarged her faith: and great stress has been laid upon this, without the least shadow of truth, in modern publications. The reverse was the fact. The Arians explained away what before was not doubted, and the Church only asserted her former belief in plainer terms. Dean Vincent.

[b] — God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God,] That is, true God of true God. All these expressions were introduced into the Creed, to express, if possible, what is meant by styling Christ, God. That is, we declare that He is God the Son from God the Father, truly and verily God as we conceive the Father to be: and the addition of light derived from light was intended to exemplify a communication of the divine attributes, without detracting any thing from the prerogative of the Father. These, as before observed, are not articles of faith, but an endeavour to express our meaning. We are accused of turning a similitude or comparison into an article of faith. God forbid! But it was the language of Scripture and of the fathers, to express the communication of the Godhead to the Son, by the comparison of light from light; because light communicated detracts nothing from the original light; fire communicated diminishes not the fire from which it is derived. This is the explanation meant to be delivered. It marks the sameness of substance in the two Persons. In a word, we profess nothing more in this part of the Nicene Creed, than we professed in the Apostles', that we "believe in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord."

As all the explanations of this Creed arise from the circumstance of Christ being called God in Scripture, and described with the attributes of God, let us first establish the proof of this, and then leave the consequence to the authority of Scripture.

He is styled God by St. John, who says in direct terms, "The Word was with God, and the Word was God," John i. 1. It is in consequence of this passage, that the Catholick church maintained the distinction of for our salvation, came down from heaven, And was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, And was made man, And was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate. He suffered and was buried, and the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, And ascended into heaven, And sitteth on the right hand of the Father. And he shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead: Whose kingdom shall have no end[d].

persons and the unity of substance; if the Word was with God, the Word and God were two: if the Word was God, they were as manifestly one.

St. Matthew says, "They shall call his name, Emmanuel; which, being interpreted, is God with us," Matt. i. 23. St. Luke declares, that John the Baptist should "turn many to the Lord their God, and he shall go before him," Luke i. 16, 17. St. Paul asserts, that "Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever," Rom. ix. 5. And, lastly, the Epistle to the Hebrews applies the words of David to Christ, "unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever," Heb. i. 8.

Now if all these Scriptures declare Christ to be God, what accusation can lie against the Church, for professing to believe that He is God? The Jew, the heathen, or the deist, may use these passages as a reason, why he rejects the Gospel: but the Arian, who allows the Gospel, can have no ground to stand on, but by explaining away the meaning of the word "God;" by pretending that it has two meanings; and in short by calling the Father and the Son two Gods, whom the Gospel and the Church never call two Gods, but two Persons.

We say also, that, as Scripture gives Christ the title of God, so likewise does it give Him the divine attributes of eternity, omniscience, and omnipresence. The language of Scripture is, "In the beginning was the Word. He is before all things. Thy throne, O God, is for ever. Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth. Thou, Lord, knowest the hearts of men." And, finally, our Saviour himself says, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

Again, the work of creation is attributed to both the Father and the Son. For, as the Old Testament declares, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," so the Gospel asserts, "all things were made by the Word (the Son), and without him was not any thing made that was made," John i. 3. And St. Paul adds, "By him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, all things were created by him and for him, and by him all things consist," Col. i. 16, 17.

Other prerogatives ascribed to the Son are, that "he is the image of the invisible God, Col. i. 15; the brightness of the glory of the Father, the express image of his Person, Heb. i. 3; that in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," Col. ii. 9.

And, finally, the Scripture declares, that He is equal with the Father, and that worship is due to Him as God. St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Philippians, says, "being in the form of God he thought it not robbery to be equal with God," Phil. ii. 6. And Christ Himself declares, that "all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father: he, that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father that sent him," John v. 23. Lastly, the Epistle to the Hebrews proclaims, "Let all the angels of God worship him," Heb. i. 6. This worship his disciples actually did pay to Him after his resurrection: and from the Revelation we learn, that the "saints in heaven shall worship him for ever and ever."

Having all these texts before us, what must we think of the Arian teachers, who are forced to explain away the clear and obvious sense of every passage, and apply a meaning of their own, which they can only deduce by figurative, metaphorical, or metaphysical interpretation? The Church abides by the written word: and, without seeking to be wise above that which is written, adores in pious reverence a mystery, which she pretends not to comprehend, but which she receives from the word of God, and acknowledges as an article of faith. Dean Vincent.

[c] —by whom all things were made:] These words, from their position in the Creed, may seem to refer to the Father; and the improper manner of reading them sometimes may countenance this mistake. But it is very plain, that they are here applied to the Son: the Father being spoken of in the first part, as "the Maker of heaven and earth, &c." Waldo.

[d] —whose kingdom shall have no end.] Lest we should imagine, that Christ should ever cease to be King, the ancient fathers at Constantinople, in the year 381, added these words to the Nicene Creed, against the heresy which then newly arose, denying the eternity of the kingdom of Christ. Bp. Pearson.

[e] And I believe in the Holy Ghost, &c.] This next article of the Creed, relating to the Holy Ghost, describes Him, in the language of Scripture, as "the Lord and Giver of life." He is expressly called "the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. "The Lord is that Spirit:" and, at the end of the last verse, "even as by the Spirit of the Lord," which should be rather translated, as it is in the margin, "by the Lord, the Spirit." In the same chapter, ver. 6, it is said, "The Spirit giveth life." And still more strongly, Rom. viii. 2, He is called "the Spirit of life:" the Fountain, the Author, the Giver, of spiritual life: without whose divine influence and assistance we are "dead in trespasses and sins." He is farther spoken of, as "proceeding from the Father and the Son," with respect to his mode of existence, which the compilers of the Creed most probably had in view in this article; or in the sense of being sent by them, with respect to the economy of grace, and the office He sustains in the work of man's redemption; which, his official procession, is more frequently taken notice of in Scripture, and therefore more material for us to be instructed in. Waldo.

The words, "Lord and Giver of life," ascribed to the Spirit, are not to be joined, as one single attribute; but are taken from two different texts of Scripture: in the one of which He is called, according to the marginal reading, "the Lord, the Spirit," 2 Cor. iii. 18; and said in the other "to give life," ver. 6; that is, the spiritual life of grace. The phrase, "who proceedeth from the Father and the Son," may signify either his deriving from the latter, as well as the former, his eternal substance; or since that hath been disputed between the Latin and Greek church, his being sent

This one expression was added to the Creed after the alterations made in it at the Council of Constantinople in 381: the Constantinopolitan Creed having only "who proceedeth from the Father." Different accounts are given of the insertion of the clause "and the Son." It probably came in at first by a private hand in the middle of the 5th century, after the procession from the Son was denied by some of the Greek writers. However this was the occasion of a schism between the Greek and Latin churches. Dr. Nichalls.

[f] — one Catholick and Apostolick Church, &c.] The Church is called Apostolick, because it was planted by the Apostles, in subordination to our blessed Saviour. Dr. Bennet. This article implies, that there is an unity in the Church, or perhaps only that there is but one true profession of the faith; and, "one baptism" implies that this Sacrament is not to be repeated. Dean Vincent. This article, concerning baptism, is very properly inserted to remind us of the efficacy and necessity of that divine ordinance: whereby we are admitted into the new covenant, and are entitled to all the benefits of it, which are here comprised under that most important one, "the remission of sins," provided we do not forfeit our title to them by our infidelity or disobedience. Waldo.

[g] Then the Curate shall declare unto the people what holy-days, &c.] The first reason of this direction was, lest the people should observe any such days as had been formerly kept, but were laid aside at the Reformation: and therefore the Bishops inquired in their visitations, "whether any of their Curates bid any other days than were appointed by the new calendar." This danger is now pretty well over; there being no great fear of the people's observing superstitious holy-days. But there is still as much reason for keeping up the rubrick, since now they are run into a contrary extreme, and, instead of observing too many holy-days, regard none; which makes it fit that the Curate should discharge his duty, by telling them beforehand what holy-days will happen, and then leaving it upon his people to answer for the neglect, if they are passed over without due regard. Wheatly.

[h] — and then also (if occasion be) shall notice be given of the Communion;] But by another rubrick, just before the exhortation, this is supposed to be done after the sermon. For there it is ordered, that "when the minister giveth warning for the celebration of the Holy Communion, (which he shall always do upon the Sunday, or some holy-day immediately preceding,) after the Sermon or Homily ended, he shall read the exhortation following." The occasion of this difference was the placing of "this rubrick of directions," at the last review, before the rubrick concerning the Sermon or Homily. For by all the old Common Prayer Books, immediately after the Nicene Creed, the Sermon was ordered; and then after that "the Curate was to declare unto the people whether there were any holy-days or fasting-days in the week following, and earnestly to exhort them to remember the poor, by reading one or more of the sentences, as he thought most convenient by his discretion." This was the whole of that rubrick then. All the remaining part was added at the Restoration, as was also the rubrick above cited just before the exhortation. Wheatly.

The primary object of the rubrick before the exhortation was to order, that, in compliance with the request of the Presbyterians, notice should be given before the day of its celebration. It accordingly directs the exhortation to be read "on the Sunday, or some holy-day immediately preceding." The words, "after the Sermon ended," might be inadvertently added, it having been hitherto the practice to read the exhortations after the Sermon. Shepherd.

[i] — and &c.] The rubrick formerly prescribed this time for publishing the banns of marriage. But the clause is now omitted, since by the 26th of Geo. II. chapter 33, commonly called the marriage act, it is provided that banns of marriage be published upon three Sundays preceding the solemnization of marriage, during the time of morning service, or of the evening service if there be no morning service, in the proper church or chapel on any of those Sundays, immediately after the second lesson.

[k] Then shall follow the Sermon,] For more effectually explaining the mysteries of the Creed, and for more vigorously pressing the duties of the Gospel, the ancient church appointed a Sermon or Homily in this place, which is useful every Sunday, and more especially when there is a Communion; because by a pious and practical discourse, suited to the Holy Communion, the minds of the receivers are put into a devout frame, and made fitter for the succeeding mysteries. Dean Comber.

It was the custom of the primitive church, that at the close of the common service the Bishop or Priest should make an exhortatory discourse to the people. This plainly appears to be at least as early as the time of writing the Apostolic Constitutions. St. Ambrose and St. Austin speak of this being the constant practice every Sunday in their time. And indeed innumerable are the Sermons or Homilies, which were spoken in the ancient churches, and are preserved to our times in the works of St. Chrysostom, Basil, Nazianzen, Austin, and others: which are generally practical discourses, full of excellent piety and warmth; and in which they very rarely intermix any thing of controversial divinity, but explain a portion of Scripture in a familiar though withal a very affecting way, and well adapted for the instruction of the common people. Indeed this province generally was undertaken by the Bishops, who at first voluntarily, and afterwards by injunction, preached every Sunday, unless hindered by sickness. But however, in the absence of the bishop, this duty was performed by presbyters, and, by their permission, in their presence. Dr. Nicholls.

The Sermon was usually an exposition of some part of the Epistle or Gospel, or proper Lesson for the day; as we may see in St. Augustine, in his Sermons "de Tempore,"[2] according to the pattern in Nehem. viii. 8; "They read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused the people to understand the reading." And the preacher was in his exposition appointed to observe the catholick interpretation of the old doctors of the church; as we may see in the nineteenth canon of the sixth council of Constantinople, held in Trullo. The canon is this. "Let the governours of churches, every Sunday at the least, teach their clergy and people the oracles of piety and true religion; collecting out of divine Scripture the sentences and doctrines of truth, not transgressing the ancient bounds and traditions of the holy fathers. And, if any doubt or controversy arise about Scripture, let them follow that interpretation, which the lights of the church and the doctors have left in their writings. By which they shall more deserve commendation, than by making private interpretations, which if they adhere to, they are in danger to fall from the truth." To this agrees the canon made in Queen Elizabeth's time, in the year 1571. "The preachers chiefly shall take heed, that they teach nothing in their preaching, which they would have the people religiously to observe and believe, but that which is agreeable to the doctrine of the Old Testament and the New, and that which the catholick fathers, and ancient bishops, have gathered out of that doctrine." These golden canons, had they been duly observed, would have been a great preservative of truth, and the church's peace. The Sermon was not above an hour long, as St. Cyril informs us. Bp. Sparrow.

It immediately followed the Gospel, and was an usual explication upon it; whence I conceive the name Postil is derived, quasi post illa Evangelia, Postil being nothing but a discourse upon, and subsequent to, the Gospel. L'Estrange.

The ancient practice of explaining considerable portions of Scripture to the people was revived by our reformers. Before them Colet had employed many years in publickly expounding all the Epistles written by St. Paul. Archbishop Cranmer expounded Hebrews, as Bishops Hooker, Latimer, and Jewel, did Jonah, the Lord's Prayer, many of the Epistles, and all the Epistles and Gospels used in the Communion service on Sundays and holy-days. From the practice of Ambrose, Origen, Chrysostom, and Austin, among the ancients, and of our reformers and other more modern divines, we may with safety affirm, that explaining and applying portions of Scripture read in the Lessons, (and other parts of the publick service,) is a very beneficial mode of preaching to ordinary congregations. Shepherd.

As to the preaching used in the Church of England, if we consider either the excellency or frequency of it, we may justly affirm, that, if any church under heaven "hath wherewithal to glory on this behalf," our Church "hath much more."

As to the excellency of it, this praise has been long yielded to our clergy both at home and from abroad, by the universal voice both of Protestants and of Papists. And the reason of it is apparent: for no nation under heaven hath such seminaries of learning in all kinds, as this nation hath, or any thing like them: I mean, our renowned Universities. And if ever the enemy would come up against our Church, the city of our Sion, to take and to destroy her, that policy of Holofernes against Bethulia will be most effectual, to seize upon "those fountains of our waters."

And as to the frequency or plenty of the word preached which continually flows from these fountains, this provision of our Church, which appoints a Sermon once on the Lord's day, must appear sufficient, yea, abundant; if we look back to the scarcity of it in the days of the Reformation, when the provision of a Sermon was but quarterly, as made in Edward the Sixth's time, 1547; and for many years after but monthly, according to an injunction of Queen Elizabeth, 1559. Wherefore this present provision of our Church, in appointing one Sermon on the Sundays, ought to be received with all thankfulness. And in truth a greater plenty than this may turn perhaps not to our nourishment, but only create in us a waste and wantonness. That appetite in many after a multitude of Sermons is no other than that of the Israelites, when, not content with the regular provision of their daily manna, "they required meat for their lusts." Far be it from me that I should discourage or straiten the ordinance of preaching: but God forbid, that the enlarging of that should ever straiten the ordinances of divine worship, or be esteemed before them! God forbid that ever in the Church of England the Sermon, how excellent soever, should be valued before the Service, which is incomparable! For to what end do we come to the house of prayer? It is to adore God, or to admire men? Is it to praise Him for the excellency of his greatness, or them for the excellency of their talents? Should this plenteous provision of preaching be ever again exalted and abused to the neglecting, despising, and disparaging of our publick worship, as it was before the Great Rebellion, it will well provoke God to take it again from us: and instead thereof to feed our lusts with preaching, as He did the Israelites with quails, till it "came out of their nostrils, and became loathsome unto them," Numb. xi. 20. It was a remarkable saying, so founded on the judgments of God, that a preaching church cannot stand: and it is also founded on the judgments of God, that a church which plans its religion in preaching shall never stand. Dr. Bisse.

[1] — or one of the Homilies] These Homilies are two books of plain Sermons, (for so the word signifies,) set out by publick authority, one whereof is to be read upon any Sunday or holy-day, when there is no Sermon. The first volume of them was set out in the beginning of King Edward the Sixth's reign, having been composed (as it is thought) by Archbishop Cranmer, Bishops Ridley and Latimer, at the beginning of the Reformation, when a competent number of ministers, of sufficient abilities to preach in a publick congregation, was not to be found. The second volume was set out in Queen Elizabeth's time, by order of Convocation, in the year 1563. And that this is not at all contrary to the practice of the ancient church, is evident from the testimony of Sixtus Sinensis, who, in the fourth book of his library, saith, "That our countryman Alcuinus collected and reduced into order, by the command of Charles the Great, the Homilies of the most famous doctors of the church upon the Gospels which were read in churches all the year round." Dr. Nicholls, Wheatly.

At the time of the Reformation in England, many of the clergy were exceedingly illiterate, and it was also LET your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. St. Matt. v.

Lay not up for yourselves treasure upon the earth; where the rust and moth doth corrupt, and where suspected that some of them still favoured the tenets of the church of Rome. Therefore to supply the defects of some, and to oblige the rest to teach according to the form of sound doctrine, there were two books of Homilies prepared: the first was published in King Edward the Sixth's time, 1547, supposed to be written chiefly by Abp. Cranmer; the second was not finished till about the time of Edward's death, so it was not published before Queen Elizabeth's time, 1560, having been probably written by Bp. Jewel. The design of them was to mix speculative points with practical matters; some explain the doctrine, and others enforce the rules of life and manners. These are plain and short discourses, chiefly calculated to possess the nation with a sense of the purity of the Gospel, in opposition to the corruptions of popery, and to reform it from those crying sins, which had been so much connived at under popery, while men knew the price of them, how to compensate for them, and to redeem themselves from the guilt of them by masses and sacraments, by indulgences and absolutions.

These two books of Homilies, upon their first publication, were distributed throughout the kingdom; and the parochial clergy were commanded to read them in their churches. When compared with the age in which they were written, they may be considered as very extraordinary compositions, though perhaps every argument and expression in them is not to be approved: but whoever will peruse them with candour and attention, will be convinced that they contain, as the 35th Article expresses it, "a godly and wholesome doctrine." The compilers of the Articles thought them "necessary for the times" in which they lived: and directed them "to be read in churches by the ministers, diligently and distinctly, that they may be understanded of the people." The English language has changed so much since those homilies were written, that they would scarcely now be understood by a common congregation: and therefore the reading of them publickly, as it would no longer answer any good purpose, has fallen into general disuse, with the tacit consent of the governing part of the Church. The clergy, however, may still study them with advantage to themselves; and may, with advantage to others, transfer parts of them into their sermons, with such alterations as the change of circumstances may render expedient.

The want of learning in the clergy at the time of the Reformation has been already noticed: and indeed so incompetent were they to the duty of preaching, that it was forbidden by four successive sovereigns of very different religious principles; by Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. Towards the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign the clergy were considerably improved in point of literature: but even at that time it has been reckoned that there were 8000 parishes without preaching ministers. James the First made a canon, directing that a Sermon should be preached every Sunday, in every parish church, which had a minister licensed for that purpose; but, by another canon, unlicensed ministers were permitted only to read a Homily. And our present form of ordering deacons does not empower them to preach, unless they "be thereunto licensed by the bishop himself:" but to a priest the bishop says, "Take thou authority to preach the word of God." Bp. Burnet, Bp. Tomline.

[m] — already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth] It seems the author of the Homilies wrote them in haste, and the Church did wisely to reserve this authority of correcting them and setting forth others. For they have many scapes in them in special, though they contain in general many wholesome lessons for the people; in which sense our ministers do subscribe unto them, and no other. Bp. Overall.

Before the Sermon, the minister who is to preach, "moves the people," by the direction of the 55th canon, "to join with him in" a short form of "prayer." This was more particularly needful in past ages, when the sermons were commonly at a different hour from the Liturgy, as they are still at our Universities. And, at whatever hour they were, great stress was laid on the use of this prayer for some time after the Reformation: because when that took place, an acknowledgment of the King's supremacy, which the papists denied, was very prudently, as things then stood, inserted into it. And hence it hath continued to our days, though it is frequently shortened into a Collect and the Lord's Prayer, the reason for enlarging being now become less. The original manner of performing this part of the preacher's office was by "bidding," that is, inviting and exhorting, the people to pray for the several particulars, mentioned by him: which they were understood to do, either silently in their minds, as they went along with him, or by comprehending them all in the Lord's Prayer at last. But in process of time some imagined it better to put the whole into the shape of a direct address: others followed their example, as thinking it a matter of indifference: but most have kept to the old way. And the intention being the same, neither custom should give offence. Abp. Secker.

This form of bidding prayers is very ancient; we may see the like in St. Chrysostom's and other Liturgies, which they called Allocutions, in which the deacon speaks to the people from point to point, directing them what to pray for, as hath been said before. This is all the difference betwixt them and this, that in them the people were to answer to every point severally, "Lord, have mercy," &c.; in this, they are taught to sum up all the petitions in the Lord's Prayer, and to pray for them all together. This was the practice in King Edward the Sixth's time, as appears by Bishop Latimer, Jewel, and others in those days, whose forms of bidding prayers, before sermon, are to be seen in their writings. Bp. Sparrow.

[n] Then shall the Priest return to the Lord's Table, &c.] After the confession of our faith follows the exercise of our charity, without which it would be but a dead faith, James ii. 22. Now as charity is to be expressed three ways, so we have directions for each of those ways, by giving, "in the Sentences;" by praying, "in the prayer for the Church militant;" and by forgiving, "in the general warning:" as for the charity of giving toward the relief of the poor, it is frequently and strictly commanded in the Gospel, hath the best examples of it, and the largest rewards promised to it, being instead of all the costly offerings of the Jews, and the only chargeable duty to which Christians are obliged: it recommends our prayers, and thence St. Paul prescribes, and the ancient church in Justin Martyr's time used to have collections every Sunday: however, when we receive the sacrament, it is absolutely necessary. alms at the passover, John xiii. 29, and supposes we will never come to the altar without a gift, Matt. v. 23. The first Christians gave all they had, and those in after-times dedicated large and noble oblations when they communicated, nor was any (of ability) allowed to receive without giving something: and to reject any man's oblation, was to deny him a share in the benefit of these mysteries: wherefore to stir us up more effectually to give bountifully, here are divers select sentences. Dean Comber.

° — the Offertory,] So called, because it is that part of the Communion service, in which the offerings are made. The custom of making oblations at the Communion is certainly apostolical, as appears from 1 Cor. xvi. 2: "On the first day of the week let every one lay by him in store as God hath prospered him." Which custom continued down to the following ages, as appears from different passages in Justin Martyr, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, and other ancient writers. Out of those offerings, which were not always in money, but in bread, wine, corn, &c. were taken as much bread and wine, as served for the celebration of the Communion at the time: but if any persons were under publick infamy, by reason of any ill actions by them committed, their offerings were not to be received. These offerings in the primitive times were so considerable, that they were divided into four portions: one for the relief of the poor; the second the bishop retained for his maintenance; the third was for the maintenance of the church and its ornaments; and the fourth for the Clergy. The office of the offertory was used in Walafrid Strabo's time, who lived in the middle of the ninth century; and it was so long before his time, that he could not tell to whom to ascribe its original. Dr. Nicholls.

P — these Sentences following,] These are in the place of the Antiphona or Anthem which we find in the old Liturgies after the Gospel, and which, from their being sung whilst the people made their oblations at the altar, were called "Offertory." The sentences which our Church has here selected for that purpose are such as contain instructions, injunctions, and exhortations to this great duty; setting before us the necessity of performing it, and the manner of doing it. Some of them (namely, those from the sixth to the tenth inclusively, unless the ninth be excepted) respect the clergy. And it was with an eye, I suppose to this difference, that in the last review there was a distinction made in the rubrick that follows these sentences, between "the alms for the poor," and "the other devotions of the people." Wheatly.

q — as he thinketh most convenient in his discretion.] That is, "according to the length or shortness of the time, that the people are offering," as it was worded in King Edward's first Common Prayer. Wheatly.

One or more of these sentences, or Scripture injunctions of bounty and almsgiving, as also the "Prayer for the whole state of Christ's Church," are appointed to be read, "if there be no Communion," before the congregation be dismissed: neither of these things being ever unsuitable. And "the first day of the week" is recommended in Scripture for purposes of charity, 1 Cor. xvi. 2, as well as set apart for "making supplications and giving thanks for all men," 1 Tim. ii. 1. But they are both more peculiarly proper with a view to the Communion.

When we commemorate our Saviour's dying love to us all, we ought surely to think of expressing our love to our brethren: which must be shewn by promoting both their spiritual good and their temporal. To the former belong those sentences, which require, that they, who are able, should contribute to the maintenance of a Gospel ministry, where it wants their help. And they require it strongly, as any person will perceive by reading them. For indeed they are seldom or never read to the people by the Clergy, that they may not seem to plead their own cause: excepting in some few of our churches, where the primitive practice, needful in too many more, of giving oblations to the minister, as well as alms to the poor, at the Sacrament, is preserved or restored. The rest of the sentences exhort to the latter duty of relieving the sick and needy. What is generally given for them on this occasion, must be considered, not as the whole, but a sample and earnest of our charity: a small one, it is to be hoped, in comparison of what we give at other times; and let us trust that it is every where faithfully applied, as it ought, with most religious and prudent care. Abp. Secker.

It may not be amiss on this subject of the offertory to observe farther, that, when there is no collection of alms made, there is no occasion to use any of the sentences appointed to be recited during the time of a collection. For the sense of the Church appears to have been, that alms and the sentences are intended always to accompany each other: and the obvious inference is, that, where the former are wanting, the latter will seem superfluous and without warrant.

Yet I dare not blame any minister, who continues the common practice of reciting one or two of them, before he proceeds to the prayer for the Church militant. And the rather, because it is observable, that in most of the occasional offices for fasts and thanksgivings, injoined by authority, one of these sentences, which bears the nearest relation to the occasions in hand, is directed to be read at the offertory. And these directions plainly carry their authority along with them. But, while we are left to the apparent directions in the rubrick only, it will be difficult to shew, that we have any authority from thence to use them, when there are no stated offerings of alms. The just consequence of which would have been, that we might not at those times use any of these sentences, had not custom, and an almost universal practice of the Clergy, forbid the drawing of such a consequence.

Therefore, as the matter now stands, it seems to be left as a point determinable at our own discretion: namely, either to do what has been most usually done, or not to do what we are persuaded in our judgments was not originally designed to be done. Archdeacon Sharp.

¶ Whilst these Sentences are in reading, the Deacons[r], Church-wardens, or other fit person appointed for that purpose, shall receive the Alms for the Poor, and other Devotions of the People, and put them into the Poor Men's Box; and bring it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the Holy Table.

[r] Whilst these Sentences are in reading, the Deacons, &c.] The deacons are the most proper persons for this business, it being the very office for which their order was instituted, Acts vi. And for this reason the Scotch Liturgy does not allow the church-wardens to do it, but at such times "when there are no deacons present." It is now indeed grown a custom with us for the church-wardens to perform this office, namely, to gather the alms and devotions of the congregation, which, by all the books before the Scotch Liturgy, they were ordered, as I have observed, to "put into the poor man's box;" not, I presume, into that fixed in the church, but into a little box which the church-wardens or some other proper persons carried about with them in their hands, as is still the custom at the Temple Church in London. Now indeed they are ordered to make use of a "decent bason to be provided by the parish for that purpose." With which, in most places, especially here in town, they go to the several seats and pews of the congregation. Though in other places they collect at the entrance into the chancel, where the people make their offerings as they draw towards the altar. This last way seems the most conformable to the practice of the primitive church, which, in pursuance of a text delivered by our Saviour, ordered that the people should come up to the rails of the altar, and there make their offerings to the priest, Matt. v. 23.

And with an eye, I suppose, to this practice, the deacons, or church-wardens, or whosoever they be that collect the alms and other devotions of the people, are ordered by the present rubrick to "bring it reverently to the priest," (as in their name,) "who is humbly to present and place it upon the holy table;" in conformity to the practice of the ancient Jews, who, when they brought their gifts and sacrifices to the temple, offered them to God by the hands of the priest. Wheatly.

ALMIGHTY and everliving God, who by thy holy Apostle hast taught us to make prayers, and supplications, and to give thanks, Ps. xci. 1. Job xxi. 15. Dan. iv. 34. Rev. iv. 9.

[s] And when there is a Communion, the Priest shall then place upon the Table &c.] "Then," that is, after presenting the bason with the alms. Shepherd. This rubrick, being added to our Liturgy at the same time with the word "oblations," in the prayer following, (that is, at the last review,) it is clearly evident, as Bishop Patrick has observed, that by that word are to be understood the elements of bread and wine, which the priest is to offer solemnly to God, as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty over his creatures, and that from thenceforth they might become properly and peculiarly his. For in all the Jewish sacrifices, of which the people were partakers, the viands or materials of the feast were first made God's by a solemn oblation, and then afterwards eaten by the communicents, not as man's, but as God's provision; who, by thus entertaining them at his own table, declared Himself reconciled and again in covenant with them. And therefore our blessed Saviour, when He instituted the sacrifice of his own body and blood, first "gave thanks, and blessed the elements," that is, offered them up to God as Lord of the creatures, as the most ancient fathers expound that passage: who, for that reason, whenever they celebrated the holy Eucharist, always offered the bread and wine for the communion to God, upon the altar, by this, or some such short ejaculation, "Lord, we offer thee thy own, out of what thou hast bountifully given us." After which they received them, as it were, from Him again, in order to convert them into the sacred banquet of the body and blood of his dear Son. In the ancient church, they had generally a side-table near the altar, upon which the elements were laid till the first part of the Communion service was over, at which the catechumens were allowed to be present; but when they were gone, the elements were removed and placed upon the holy altar itself, with a solemn prayer. Now though we have no side-table authorized by our Church; yet, in the first Common Prayer of King Edward the Sixth, the priest himself was ordered in this place to set both the bread and wine upon the altar: but at the review in 1551 this and several other such ancient usages were thrown out. After which the Scotch Liturgy was the first wherein we find it restored: but there the presbyter is directed "to offer up and place the bread and wine prepared for the Sacrament upon the Lord's table, that it may be ready for that service." And Mr. Mede, having observed our own Liturgy to be defective in this particular, was probably the occasion, that, in the review of it after the Restoration, this primitive practice was restored, and the bread and wine ordered by the rubrick to be set solemnly upon the table by the priest himself. From whence it appears, that the placing of the elements upon the Lord's table, before the beginning of morning prayer, by the hands of a clerk or sexton, (as is now the general practice,) is a breach of the aforesaid rubrick: and consequently that it is the duty of every minister to prevent it for the future, and reverently to place the bread and wine himself upon the table, immediately after he has placed on the alms. Wheatly.

"Though our Church," as Dr. Nicholls truly says, "has not ordered any particular prayer for this action of the priest, he ought not to neglect the action itself:" which reason holds much stronger when we consider, that there is an expression to be used in the prayer following the action, that presupposes the action to be done by the minister: which expression is rendered insignificant, if he omit the action. Archdeacon Sharp.

[t] After which done, the Priest shall say,] The second way of expressing our charity is by prayer; and though we cannot relieve all men, God can, and so we must pray for all to Him that is able to supply all mankind. And because the Communion is the highest exercise of charity, therefore of old this universal intercession was used in this office, where they prayed for the peace of the Church and state, for kings and for all Christians, especially the afflicted, as St. Cyril assures us; and Optatus calls this "the appointed form in the mysteries of the Sacrament, in which we offer for the whole church." And we do not (as the Roman church) crowd this into the Prayer of Consecration; but, as in St. Chrysostom's Liturgy, we make this prayer soon after the Gospel, since none are so likely to say this charitable prayer devoutly for all, as they who observe the rules of the Gospel. And there are two things to recommend this prayer; first, our alms just now offered to God by his minister, which the Scripture assures us give great efficacy to our prayers; secondly, our commemoration of the great sacrifice of Christ's death, the symbols of which are now to be set upon the holy table, that we may plead for all the world by the memorial of that oblation which obtained mercy for all, and by which Christ now intercedes for all in heaven.

2. As for the prayer itself, besides the preface and conclusion, it doth contain prayers, supplications, intercessions, and giving of thanks, which are to be made for all men, for kings, and all that are in authority, as St. Paul directs, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Dean Comber.

[u] Let us pray for the whole state of Christ's Church &c.] As there are few in proportion to whom we can do good with our substance; and many, that are much above our alms, and yet need our prayers; we proceed to offer them up "for the whole state of Christ's Church militant," that is, carrying on a warfare against the enemies of the soul, "here on earth:" that all the members of it may not only have "the spirit," the fervent desire, "of truth, unity, and concord," but may actually "agree in the truth of God's holy word, and live in unity and godly love." Then we petition more especially for those whose stations, as kings, magistrates, and clergy, or whose sufferings of any kind require it most: and give thanks for those, who are got beyond the reach of sufferings; begging that we may "follow their example," as far as it was a "good" one, and share in their happiness. Abp. Secker.

This prayer for the Church militant contains in it "supplications, prayers, and intercessions, and giving of thanks for all men, for kings, and all in authority," as the apostle directs. Which expression of our universal charity is highly necessary, when there is a celebration of the Lord's Supper: but, when there is none, yet being a general intercession it is necessary to fill up and complete the second service, which is a distinct service, and in the first institution was performed at different times. Dr. Bisse.

The form of this prayer is most ancient and apostolical. Next to the apostle, who wills "supplications and prayers and thanksgivings to be made for all men, especially for kings and such as be in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty;" which is the sum and subject of this whole prayer; we find in the Constitutions of the apostles, which was a book made to declare the customs of the church before Constantine's time, this prayer at large, first for the state of Christ's church: and then for the particular members of it; chiefly for the emperor and powers of the world, that they may be at peace with us: which is the reason that it is called in the Greek Liturgies "the catholick or general collect," and "the prayer for peace." And it is the source and fountain of those prayers, which were afterwards framed into the form of our litanies. St. Ambrose saith, that this prayer was always made before the consecration of the sacrament. Bp. Cosin.

The words "Let us pray" are manifestly addressed to the people, and the voice should be managed accordingly. The minister ought also to make a pause after the pronunciation of them, that the people may have full time enough to kneel down and compose themselves for prayer, and so be ready to join in the very beginning of this form. Dr. Bennet.

[w] — Christ's Church militant] Christ's church, that is, the whole number of the faithful, is usually divided into two parts: namely, the church militant and the church triumphant. By the church "militant," or in a state of warfare, we mean those Christians, who are at present alive, and perpetually harassed with the temptations and assaults of the world, the flesh, and the devil; and whose life is consequently a continual warfare under the banner of our blessed Saviour. By the church triumphant we mean those Christians who have departed this life in God's true faith and fear; and who now enjoy in some measure, and after the day of judgment shall be fully possessed of, that glory and triumph, which is the fruit of their labours, and the reward of those victories which they obtained over their spiritual adversaries, during the time of their trial and combat here upon earth. Dr. Bennet.

After the offertory is said, and the oblations of bread and wine, with the alms for the poor, are placed upon the table, the minister addresses this exhortation to the people: "Let us pray for the whole state of Christ's Church militant here in earth." The latter part of this sentence is wanting in Edward's first book. The words "militant here in earth," which were designed expressly to exclude prayer for the dead, were inserted in the second book, in which that part of this prayer, which contained intercession for the dead, was expunged. It was the intention of the divines, who made this alteration, to denote that prayers are not to be offered up for the dead, whose spiritual warfare is already accomplished; but for those only, who are yet "fighting the good fight of faith," and are consequently in a capacity of needing our prayers.

Alms and oblations give efficacy to prayer. They are the wings, on which it mounts more rapidly to heaven. In "the Prayer for Christ's Church" we shew that our charity extends whither our alms cannot reach: we recommend all mankind to the mercy of Him, who is able to relieve all, and of whose bounty all have need. And can we at any time more effectually plead with God, than when we commemorate the sacrifice of the death of Christ, the symbols of which are now placed upon the altar? This sacrament has been styled the "grand intercession:" and we most efficaciously intercede for all the world by the memorial of that "one oblation once offered," which obtained forgiveness for all, and by virtue of which our Mediator in heaven still intercedes for all.

Prayers to the same effect were offered in the primitive church at the celebration of the Eucharist, and occur in ancient and modern Liturgies. One similar to this, but inferior in point of composition, occurs in the Liturgy ascribed to St. Chrysostom, a little before the consecration. But a form of superior, or even equal excellence to this, is no where to be found. It is composed upon the principles laid down by St. Paul, in his exhortation to Timothy; and accordingly consists of prayers, supplications, and intercessions for the whole catholick church: beseeching God to inspire it with the spirit of truth and concord, and that the individual members may live together in unity and charity. It then prays more distinctly for the different orders, of which the church is composed; first, for the higher estates; secondly, for the Clergy; and lastly, for the people: that they may all, with sincerity and fidelity, discharge the duties allotted to their respective stations. The conclusion contains a thanksgiving for the deceased members of the Church, with a petition that the living may follow their good examples, and be finally partakers of the same inheritance of everlasting life and glory. Shepherd.

[x] — that they may truly and indifferently &c.] That they may "truly" determine all causes, "and indifferently," without any respect of persons, "minister justice;" aiming purely at that, which was God's great end in constituting all magistrates; namely, "the punishment of the wickedness and vice" of all evil punishment of wickedness and vice, and to the maintenance of thy true religion, and virtue. Give grace, O heavenly Father, to all Bishops and Curates[y], that they may both by their life and doctrine set forth thy true and lively Word, and rightly and duly administer[z] thy holy Sacraments: And to all thy people give thy heavenly grace; and especially to this congregation here present; that, with meek heart and due reverence, they may hear, and receive thy holy Word, truly serving thee in holiness and righteousness all the days of their life. And we most humbly beseech thee of thy goodness, O Lord, to comfort and succour all them, who in this transitory life are in trouble, sorrow, need, sickness, or any other adversity. And we also bless thy holy Name[a] for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and fear; beseeching thee to give us grace so to follow their good examples, that with them we may be partakers of thy heavenly kingdom: Grant this, O Father, for Jesus Christ's sake[b], our only Mediator and Advocate. Amen.

[z] — rightly and duly administer &c.] "Rightly," according to our Lord's institution; and "duly," as the necessities of the Church do require. Deon Comber.

[a] — And we also bless thy holy Name &c.] Those prayers for the dead, which the Roman Missal hath here added to this office, our Church hath prudently rejected, because they have no ground in Scripture, nor good foundation in the purest antiquity: and also because they can do no good to the wicked, who only need them; and are a disparagement to holy persons, by supposing them in a state of misery. Our Church here restores the eucharistical prayer, which many of the fathers mention; not praying for the dead, but praising God for such of them as are departed in the faith and fear of God. Dean Comber.

[b] — Grant this, O Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, &c.] The prayer concludes with entreating our heavenly Father to grant our former petitions, "for Jesus Christ's sake, our only Mediator and Advocate." This general conclusion of all our prayers would not be remarked particularly here; but that the mass hath thrust in the names of the Blessed Virgin and other saints into this supplication, through whose merits and prayers they intercede even in this place, where there is a lively commemoration of the death of Christ our only Mediator; which seems to intimate, that to plead in virtue of our Lord's passion is not sufficient, and that that intercession, by which the holy Virgin and all other saints became accepted by God, was not alone forcible enough. But we desire no other Mediator, nor need any other Advocate but our Lord Jesus, who is here represented. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Dean Comber.

[c] When the Minister giveth warning &c.] Great mysteries ought to have great preparation; the paschal lamb was to be chosen four days before it was slain, Exod. xii. 3. 6. The Jewish feasts were proclaimed some time before, Lev. xxv 9; and Hezekiah gave publick warning of his intended passover a good while before the celebration, 2 Chron. xxx. But we have a higher mystery to perform, and do it now so seldom, and are so unprepared for it, that it is necessary to give us so large a time before it, to dispose our souls for the worthy receiving thereof; and this present exhortation not only declares the intended time, but also may be very serviceable to our preparation. Dean Comber.

The ancient church indeed had no such exhortations: for their daily, or at least weekly communions made it known that there was then no solemn assembly of Christians without it; and every one (not under censure) was expected to communicate. But now, when the time is somewhat uncertain, and our long omissions have made some of us ignorant, and others forgetful of this duty; most of us unwilling, and all of us more or less indisposed for it; it was thought both prudent and necessary to provide these exhortations, to be read "when the minister gives warning of the Communion, which he is always to do upon the Sunday, or some holy-day, immediately preceding."

As to the composures themselves, they are so extraordinarily suitable, that if every communicant would duly weigh and consider them, they would be no small help towards a due preparation. The first contains proper exhortations and instructions how to prepare ourselves; the latter is more urgent, and applicable to those who generally turn their backs upon those holy mysteries, and shews the danger of those vain and frivolous excuses which men frequently make for their staying away. For which reason it is appointed by the rubrick to be used instead of the former, whenever the minister shall observe that the people "are negligent to come." Wheatly.

It is earnestly to be wished, that the Clergy should take great care how they read this or the following exhortation. Let not the tone of their voice be such as betrays a carelessness and want of concern; but serious, affectionate, and such as may awaken the people, who are generally very backward in this duty. Dr. Bennet.

[e] — this Exhortation following.] The Exhortation contains, first, an information, 1. of the time when we celebrate it; 2. of the persons to whom we shall administer it; 3. of the manner how they must receive it, namely, in remembrance of Christ's death, and with all thankfulness, both for it, and for this ordinance to commemorate it. Secondly, it contains an exhortation grounded on the benefit of doing it well, and the dan-

DEARLY beloved, on —day next I purpose, through God's assistance, to administer to all such as shall be religiously and devoutly disposed the most comfortable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ; to be by them received in remembrance of his meritorious Cross and Passion; whereby alone we obtain remission of our sins, and are made partakers of the Kingdom of heaven. Wherefore it is our duty to render most humble and hearty thanks to Almighty God our heavenly Father, for that he hath given his Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, not only to die for us, but also to be our spiritual food and sustenance in that holy Sacrament[f]. Which being so divine and comfortable a thing[g] to them who receive it worthily, and so dangerous to them that will presume to receive it unworthily[h]; my duty is to exhort you in the mean season to consider the dignity[i] of that holy mystery[k], and the great peril of ger of doing it ill, and exciting us to the duties of, 1. seriously considering the dignity of this Sacrament, and the peril of profaning it; 2. and strictly examining our hearts in order to our acceptance. Thirdly, this warning contains directions, 1. to the penitent, who is advised to prepare by repentance, which is now to be exercised in self-examination, contrition, confession, and holy purposes: and by charity to be shewed by making satisfaction for all injuries done by us, and forgiving those done against us. 2. Here is direction to the impenitent not to come unworthily; and these are, 1. solemnly warned; 2. shewed what they may do in order to fit them; 3. foretold of the danger of neglecting these preparatives. Lastly, here are directions to the doubting, shewing to what end they need ghostly counsel, and in what case they want it, of whom they must desire it, and what benefit they may have by it. These are the parts of this warning. Dean Comber.

When it is considered how many poor Christians there are, who have little or no means of coming to the knowledge of this ordinance, and the manner of preparing themselves for it, but by what they learn from hearing these exhortations; every pastor will think himself obliged in conscience, and as he values the edification of his flock, to read these exhortations with the greatest deliberation, and with an affection that shall even force the attention of his hearers.

And if the people seriously attend to the following exhortations or warnings, they will learn what they ought to do, in order to be worthy communicants. And they will do well to read them over again, when they return home; that they may fix them in their memory; and that they may be a standing rule to go by, through their whole life. Bp. Wilson.

[f] — to be our spiritual food and sustenance in that holy Sacrament.] The grace, which we have by the holy Eucharist, doth not begin, but continue life. No man therefore receiveth this Sacrament before baptism, because no dead thing is capable of nourishment. That which groweth must of necessity first live. If our bodies did not daily waste, food to restore them were a thing superfluous. And it may be that the grace of baptism would serve to eternal life, were it not that the state of our spiritual being is daily so much hindered and impaired after baptism. In that life therefore, where neither body nor soul can decay, our souls shall as little require this Sacrament as our bodies corporal nourishment. But as long as the days of our warfare last, during the time that we are both subject to diminution and capable of augmentation in grace, the words of our Lord and Saviour Christ will remain forcible, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," John vi. 53. Life being therefore proposed unto all men as their end, they, which by baptism have laid the foundation and attained the first beginning of a new life, have here their nourishment and food prescribed for continuance of life in them. Such as will live the life of God, must eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man: because this is a part of that diet, which if we want we cannot live. Hooker.

[g] — Which being so divine and comfortable a thing] It is not easy to recount the many divine and admirable effects, which the ancient church attributed to a devout and pious reception of this holy Sacrament. From passages in the writings of St. Ignatius, St. Irenæus, Tertullian, St. Cyril, and others, it is plain that these early fathers held, not only that much Christian grace and spiritual assistance was conveyed by a due receiving of this holy Sacrament; but that this was a sort of seed sown in them, which, by a preternatural virtue contained in it, would raise them up to eternal life. Dr. Nicholls.

This Sacrament, like all things that are high and fair, hath excellency enough to invite us to desire it, and yet danger sufficient to make us afraid to go about it rashly. And here our spiritual guide, having surveyed them both, makes a faithful report, as Caleb and Joshua did, Numb. xiv. 6, 7. He doth not deny that there is hazard and pains in the attempt, but the honour and advantage doth far outweigh them both. He considers it is "a divine thing," as the ancients called it, to be a companion of God's table, and to be made partaker of his nature: and also it is the sweetest "comfort" in the world, to behold these lively representations of our perfect expiation, to receive the pledges of pardon and immortality. On the other side, our spiritual guide considers, that for the obstinate and profane, for those that have sinned and will sin, it is very dangerous to press into this celestial banquet. Wherefore upon the whole inquiry the minister doth exhort us, to spend the time between this and the Sacrament well: for, if we come not to it, we lose this "divine comfort;" if we come unworthily, we run into an unknown danger: he is unwilling therefore we should be deprived of the comfort, or incur the mischief; and therefore he doth exhort us to prepare, for so we shall be sure of the advantage, and avoid the evil. Dean Comber.

[h] — and so dongerous to them who will presume to receive it unworthily;] See below, page 305, note x.

[i] — to exhort you in the meon season to consider the dignity &c.] There are two things especially to be done in this "mean season." The first is consideration of "the dignity" of the Sacrament, which St. Paul calls "discerning the Lord's body," 1 Cor. xi. 29; that is, making much difference between this and our ordinary food. The second is that, which St. Paul and we both

The way and means thereto is; First, to examine your lives and conversations[l] by the rule of God's commandments; and whereinsoever ye shall perceive yourselves to have offended, either by will, word, or deed, there to bewail your own sinfulness, and to confess yourselves to Almighty God, with full purpose of amendment of life. And if ye shall perceive your offences to be such as are not only against God, but also against your neighbours; then ye shall reconcile yourselves unto them; being ready to make restitution and satisfaction, according to the uttermost of your powers, for all injuries and wrongs done by you to any other; and being likewise ready to forgive others that have offended you, as ye would have forgiveness of your offences at God's hand: for otherwise the receiving of the holy Communion doth nothing else but increase your damnation. Therefore if any of you be a blasphemer of God, and hinderer or slanderer of his Word, an adulterer, or be in malice, or envy, or in any other grievous crime, repent you of your sins, or else come not[m] to that holy Table; lest, after the taking of that holy Saerament, the devil enter into you as he entered into Judas[n], and fill you full of all iniquities, and bring you to destruction both of body and soul.

call "examination," 1 Cor. xi. 28. And these are no more than what every prudent man doth, before he sets upon any great affair. First, he surveys the nature of the work; secondly, he examines his own fitness to undertake it. Thus we must consider the "dignity" of this holy mystery, to make us full of desires and humble; and the danger, to put us upon the strictest care and preparation. Our next duty is to search and try how we are fitted for it: we must not only admire the guest, but prepare and cleanse the heart for his reception. Dean Comber.

[k] — that holy mystery,] "Sacrament" and "mystery" are the same thing. Only that which is seen is properly called a "sacrament;" and that which is signified by the former is called a "mystery." Bp. Cosin.

[l] — First, to examine your lives and conversations &c.] A due preparation before the receiving of the holy Sacrament was a thing, which the ancient fathers, both in their writings and homilies, frequently inculcated on the people. Dr. Nicholls.

[m] — repent you of your sins, or else come not &c.] The first ages of Christianity considered how positively our Saviour had forbidden us to give that which is holy to the malicious, and to cast this pearl, as they interpreted it, of the Lord's body to those that wallow in swinish pleasures, Matt. vii. 6; and observed, how plainly St. Paul had described the danger of such, if they should receive it, 1 Cor. xi. 29. Wherefore they did very strictly forbid all such to approach these mysteries, and by canons of councils and the sentence of excommunication did keep back all notorious sinners. The Christian bishops also opposed the profane approach of sinners, if any such presumed to come, even of the emperors themselves. Besides all which, when the celebration was to begin, the deacon stood up and proclaimed, that all unbaptized persons, infidels, hereticks, &c. should depart, and none stay that had any quarrel, nor any come in hypocrisy. Which custom is imitated by our Church, in this denunciation; wherein, we most plainly shew obstinate sinners their danger, as St. Peter did to Simon Magus, Acts viii. 21—23. We appeal to their own consciences, charging them to examine faithfully; and, if they find themselves guilty, we warn them not to come till they have repented. We do not finally bid them not to come at all, but only to stay, till they have repented; because it may be useful, as St. Augustine notes, for such notorious offenders to stay till another communion, and to meditate, that their being excluded here on earth, whilst others enter in, to have communion with Christ, is the sad emblem of that day, when, if they do not now repent, they shall see many holy persons go in and sit down with Abraham in the kingdom of God, while they themselves are cast out. Dean Comber.

[n] — the devil enter into you as he entered into Judas,] The Church does not here affirm, that the devil entered into Judas, after he had received the holy Eucharist; but only, that he entered into Judas, whether he received the holy Eucharist or not: and she exhorts her members to take care, that their unworthy participation do not cause the devil to enter into them. The circumstance of receiving therefore is no part of the comparison: for the comparison goes no farther than the entering in of the devil. Dr. Bennet.

¶ Or, in case he shall see the people negligent to come[p] to the Holy Communion, instead of the former, he shall use this Exhortation[q].

DEARLY beloved brethren, on —— I intend, by God's grace, to celebrate the Lord's Supper: unto which, in God's behalf, I bid you all that are here present; and beseech you, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, that ye will not refuse to come thereto, being so lovingly called and bidden by God himself. Ye know how grievous and unkind a thing it is, when a man hath prepared a rich feast, decked his table with all kind of provision, so that there lacketh nothing but the guests to sit down; and yet they who are called (without any cause) most unthankfully refuse to come. Which of you in such a case would not be moved? Who would not think a great injury and wrong done unto him? Wherefore, most dearly beloved in Christ, take ye good heed, lest ye, withdrawing yourselves from this holy Supper, provoke God's indignation against you. It is an easy matter for a man to say, I will not communicate, because I am otherwise hindered with worldly business. But such excuses are not so easily accepted and allowed before God. If any man say, I am a grievous sinner, and therefore am afraid to come: wherefore then do ye not repent and amend? When God calleth you, are ye not ashamed to say ye will not come? When ye should return to God, will ye excuse yourselves; and say ye are not ready? Consider earnestly with yourselves how little such feigned excuses will avail before God. They that refused the feast in the Gospel, because they had bought a farm or would try their yokes of oxen, or because they were married, were not so excused, but counted unworthy of the heavenly feast. I, for my part, shall be ready; and according to mine Office, I bid you pronouncing such a pardon as God will confirm, if they be what they seem to us. Dean Comber.

Some explanation may be requisite of the direction here laid down, that they, "who cannot quiet their own consciences," as to their spiritual state, and fitness for the Sacrament, should "open their grief to some discreet and learned minister of God's word, that they may receive the benefit of absolution," if they appear entitled to it, "together with ghostly," that is, spiritual "counsel." Now here it should be observed, that this private absolution is not affirmed to be, as it is by the papists, necessary for all persons; but only advisable for some. It therefore is only a declaration of the minister's judgement, a fallible one indeed, but the proper and appointed one, that if the person's case be truly represented, he is pardoned and absolved by our heavenly Father, who alone can forgive sins. And such credit is only due to this declaration, as in other affairs we allow to authorized professors and practitioners of skill and probity; whose opinions we often think it prudent to ask, and are happy to have in our favour: and God forbid, that we should not give you ours, when we are asked it, with as much fidelity and as much secrecy, as any ministers of any church whatever! Abp. Secker.

[p] Or, in case he shall see the people negligent to come] No minister of God must say, that he cannot get such a convenient number, as the rubrick requires, to communicate with him as often as he himself is disposed, until he can truly say, that he has applied to his people more than once, in the words of this Exhortation following; and until he has begged of God, to touch their hearts with a due sense of their duty and danger, as he promises, and will not fail to do, considering how very much depends on so sacred and saving an ordinance.

When the tender love of God will not prevail with Christians to consider their ways, they will learn from this Exhortation what they must expect from the despised offers of mercy. Bp. Wilson.

[q] He shall use this Exhortation.] Though the frequency of our communicating be not expressly determined in Scripture, yet it is there supposed we will do it often; and this latitude was left, to give us opportunity to shew our love by coming freely and frequently, not to excuse our negligence or impiety in a customary or constant omitting of this duty, which is so heinous and so common a sin in this age; and so great a scandal in some who call themselves protestants, that there was never more need of this pious and rational Exhortation, than in these days. For it contains, first, a declaration of the time when this Sacrament is to be celebrated. Secondly, an invitation of all that are present to come. Thirdly, the arguments to move them to it, being, 1. A plain similitude from the guests who are invited by an ordinary man to a rich and costly feast, and they ungratefully refuse to come; for if this would highly displease us, much more must our withdrawing from the Sacrament provoke God. Secondly, we argue from the frivolousness of those pretences which men use to excuse their staying away, namely, That they are busy and cannot, or sinful and dare not come, both of these being very base and very vain in God's sight. Thirdly, We argue from the example of those who were invited to the feast in the Gospel, and made such kind of excuses, yet were justly condemned. Fourthly, We apply all by shewing, 1. Our care in providing this heavenly feast; 2. Our desire that all may come; 3. Their duty to come in thankfulness for the death of Christ; 4. Their danger if they wilfully stay away, since it is likely they will be severely punished for so great a sin against God, and so foul a scandal to their brethren. Lastly, We conclude with hopes that they will, and prayers that they may, return to a better mind. Dean Comber.

2 Cor. v. 20.

in the Name of God, I call you in Christ's behalf, I exhort you, as ye love your own salvation, that ye will be partakers of this holy Communion. And as the Son of God did vouchsafe to yield up his soul by death upon the Cross for your salvation; so it is your duty to receive the Communion in remembrance of the sacrifice of his death, as he himself hath commanded: which if ye shall neglect to do, consider with yourselves how great injury ye do unto God, and how sore punishment hangeth over your heads for the same; when ye wilfully abstain from the Lord's Table, and separate from your brethren, who come to feed on the banquet of that most heavenly food. These things if ye earnestly consider[r], ye will by God's grace return to a better mind: for the obtaining whereof we shall not cease to make our humble petitions unto Almighty God our heavenly Father.

See the references "When the Minister giveth warning."

DEARLY beloved in the Lord, ye that mind to come to the holy Communion of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ, must consider how Saint Paul exhorteth all persons diligently to try and examine themselves, before they presume to eat of that Bread, and drink of that Cup. For as the benefit is great[u], if with a true penitent heart and lively faith we [r] These things if ye earnestly consider, &c.] Were the sin and danger of neglecting this holy Sacrament duly considered, there would be fewer offenders in this kind; and if we have been guilty therein, whatsoever we have deserved for former omissions, it appears that our estate is not yet desperate, because God hath spared us, and given us this one invitation more. It is likely we heard this exhortation but slightly before, and resolved not to come however: but if we will weigh it seriously now, and beg the help of God's grace, there is no doubt but we may repent and amend. For we are herein courteously invited, and earnestly pressed to come; our scruples are satisfied; our excuses shewed to be vain; our duty is made evident; and our peril of neglecting it full expressed: so that it should seem that nothing, but obstinate purposes to despise reason, and example, the injunctions of God, and the request of our well-wishers, can after this keep us back. Dean Comber.

---

[s] At the time of the celebration of the Communion, &c.] The former exhortation is designed to increase the numbers, and this to rectify the dispositions, of the communicants, that they may be not only many, but good: the very mysteries of the Gentiles were veiled with many coverings to make them more sacred: and in the Greek church, besides all other preparatory matters, the priests invited the worthy, and warned the unworthy, when they were come to the Lord's table: which repeated warning is more necessary in this looser age, and this excellent form is rarely suited to this occasion: for it recommends to us two great and necessary duties; first, the duty of self-examination; which is, 1. pressed by arguments taken from the divine authority enjoining it, 1 Cor. xi. 28; from the great benefits which follow the doing it well, and the great sin and danger consequent to the doing it ill. 2. It is described exactly by the several parts of it, namely, true repentance, a lively faith, an intire amendment, and a perfect charity: to all which we are exhorted. Secondly, here is recommended the duty of thanksgiving; 1. By way of consideration, shewing the necessity of this duty, and the general ground thereof, namely, for the redemption of the world; withal declaring, what reason there is to praise God for this redemption, considering it in itself; and what cause to praise Him for it in this sacrament, which was instituted on purpose for this end. 2. This duty is directed by way of practice, and we are assisted to do it both with our lips at the holy table, and in our lives by submitting to his will, and keeping his commandments for ever after. Dean Comber.

St. Chrysostom informs us that in the Greek church, when the communicants were conveniently placed, the priest standing in a conspicuous station, and stretching forth his hand and lifting up his voice in the midst of profound silence, invited some, that is, the worthy, and forbade others, the unworthy, to approach. In this exhortation the minister excites us to two general duties, self-examination and thanksgiving. He states the benefits of receiving the Sacrament worthily, and the danger of receiving it unworthily. He inforces the duties of true repentance, lively faith, complete reformation, and perfect charity, in order to our becoming meet partakers of these holy mysteries. He insists, above all things, on the necessity of thanksgiving to God, for the redemption of the world by the death and passion of our Saviour Christ. Thanksgiving is a principal part of the eucharistick banquet, and the concluding paragraphs of the exhortation furnish us with various considerations, on which our gratitude may expatiate. Shepherd.

It is much to be desired that this exhortation be read with a serious gravity and an affectionate warmth. For nothing surely can more effectually stir up the devotion of the congregation than this admirable discourse, if it does not suffer in the pronunciation of it. Dr. Bennet.

[t] — the Communicants being conveniently placed] This seems to have an eye to an old custom, still retained in some country churches, where the communicants kneel down in rows one behind another, and there continue till the minister comes to them. In the first Common Prayer of King Edward, it is thus ordered, just after the offertory or sentences; "Then so many as shall be partakers of the holy Communion shall tarry still in the choir, the men on the one side, and the women on the other side:" where it may be remarked, that separating the men from the women, and allotting to each sex a distinct place, was what was very strictly observed in the primitive church. Wheatly.

[u] For as the benefit is great, &c.] "The cup of bless-receive that holy Sacrament; (for then we spiritually eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood; then we dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; we are one with Christ, and Christ with us;) so is the danger great, if we receive the same unworthily[x]. For then we are guilty of the Body and Blood of Christ our Saviour[y]; we eat and drink our own damnation, not considering the Lord's Body; we kindle God's wrath against us; we provoke him to plague us with divers diseases, ing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. x. 16. Now the "dwelling of us in Christ, and of Christ in us;" "our being one with Christ, and Christ with us:" are the necessary consequences of this spiritual communion of Christ's body and blood. For by "our dwelling in Christ" is meant our continuing in obedience to his laws, and by "Christ's dwelling in us" is meant the continuation of his favourable presence with us. And "by our being one with Christ, and Christ with us," is meant that in a spiritual sense we are more and more closely united to our Saviour, even as the members of the body are united to the head; and that we do from Him receive those spiritual influences and gracious assistances, by which our souls are strengthened and invigorated in holiness. And that these are the necessary consequences of the spiritual communion of Christ's body and blood needs no proof. Dr. Bennet.

As this Sacrament will naturally strengthen us in all good dispositions, we cannot doubt but God will add his blessing to the use of such proper means, especially being appointed means. For since He hath threatened punishment to unworthy receivers, He will certainly bestow rewards on worthy ones. Our Saviour hath told us, that "his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed," John vi. 55; sustenance and refreshment to the souls of men. When He blessed the bread and wine, He undoubtedly prayed, and not in vain, that they might be effectual for the good purposes, which He designed should be attained by this holy rite. And St. Paul hath told us, if it needs, more expressly, that "the cup, which we bless, is the communion," that is, the communication to us, "of the blood of Christ; and the bread, which we break, of the body of Christ;" 1 Cor. x. 16: that is, of a saving union with Him, and therefore of the benefits procured to us by his death: which are, forgiveness of our offences; for He hath said, "This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for the remission of sins," Matt. xxvi. 28: increase of the gracious influences of the Holy Ghost; for the apostle hath said, plainly speaking of this ordinance, that "we are all made to drink into one Spirit," 1 Cor. xii. 13: and everlasting life, for "whoso eateth his flesh, and drinketh his blood, dwelleth in Christ, and he in him, and he will raise him up at the last day," John vi. 54. 56. Whence a father of the apostolick age, Ignatius, calls the Eucharist "the medicine of immortality; a preservative, that we should not die, but live for ever in Jesus Christ." Abp. Secker.

[x] —so is the danger great, if we receive the same unworthily.] It must be always carefully observed, that the benefits of partaking of this sacrament are to be expected only from partaking worthily of it; "for he that eateth and drinketh unworthily," St. Paul hath told us, "is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," 1 Cor. xi. 27; that is, guilty of irreverence towards it, and "eateth and drinketh judgment to himself," ver. 29. Our translation indeed hath it, "damnation to himself." But there is so great danger of this last word being understood here in too strong a sense, that it would be much safer and exacter to translate it, as it is often translated elsewhere, and once in a few verses after this passage, and from what follows ought undeniably to be translated here "judgment" or "condemnation:" not to certain punishment in another life, but to such marks of God's displeasure as He sees fit; which will be confined to this world, or extended to the next, as the case requires. For "judgment" is a general term, that signifies any degree of correction or punishment in this life or the next. That which had been incurred by those unworthy receivers, to whom the apostle wrote, was only correction in the present life. For undoubtedly he told them the worst of their danger, and he tells them of nothing else. The very next words are: "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep," or are dead. Then follows what entirely clears up the matter: "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world." The punishment therefore of receiving unworthily will either be extended to another world, or confined to this, according to the degree of the fault: for "receiving unworthily" may, according to the kind and degree of it, be either a very great sin, or comparatively a small one: and if we repent sincerely and in time, it will be forgiven in both. But all dangerous kinds and degrees may with ease be avoided, if we only take care to come to the sacrament with proper dispositions, and, which will follow of course, to behave at it in a proper manner. Abp. Secker.

Although it is certain, that by "damnation," in the place above cited, the apostle means sickness and other judgments upon the body: yet it is as certain, that whoever presumes to come to the Lord's table without such an honest and good heart, as shews itself in a willingness to forsake all sin, and a conscientious desire and resolution to serve and please God in the general course of a sober, virtuous, and godly life, is liable to eternal damnation, till he repent of that his presumption, and reform his wicked life. But then it must also be remembered, that they, who have not such honest and sincere hearts, are in a state of damnation, whether they come to the holy sacrament or not: because the sentence of damnation is not inflicted upon such men, barely for receiving the sacrament unworthily, but chiefly for living and dying with corrupt hearts: the guilt whereof is indeed aggravated by the presumption and hypocrisy of making open vows of obedience with secret resolutions to continue in disobedience. But, as long as the heart of a man is not right in the sight of God, he has nothing to expect but eternal damnation, although he never come to the holy sacrament: and moreover such a heart renders him unfit to serve God with benefit in any other office of religion whatsoever: nay, even makes his prayer "an abomination to the Lord," Prov. xv. 8. Bp. Gibson.

[y] —For then we are guilty of the Body and Blood of Christ our Soviour;] That is, we do in some measure partake of the sins of the Jews, who crucified our blessed Lord, when we irrevcrently approach and make bold with these holy mysteries, which represent his meritorious death and passion. Dr. Nicholls.

and sundry kinds of death. Judge therefore yourselves, brethren[z], that ye be not judged of the Lord; repent you truly for your sins past; have a lively and stedfast faith in Christ our Saviour; amend your lives, and be in perfect charity with all men; so shall ye be meet partakers of those holy mysteries. [z] — Judge therefore yourselves, brethren,] When in this exhortation we are required to "judge ourselves" then, namely, at the time of communicating, this by no means implies, that we need not do it before, but that we should take care it be now perfected. Abp. Secker.

[a] — And above all things ye must give most humble and hearty thanks to God,] The meaning is not that faith and repentance are less necessary than thanksgiving; but that, these being supposed to precede, the principal point in the act of communicating is a thankful remembrance of God's mercy, disposing us to lay hold of it. Abp. Secker.

Most reasonably doth the priest invite us to praise the Lord with him at this time, and calls on us almost in the very words of St. Paul, Heb. xiii. 15. We have seen the everlasting love of the Father, the unspeakable kindness of the Son, the incomparable grace of the Holy Ghost, and our own infinite obligations. Let us therefore all join in offering up all possible praise and glory, worshipping the holy Trinity with such sincere and hearty thanksgivings, that we may be like the angels, with this only difference, that they openly behold that which we discern by faith, but both they and we "rejoice" in it "with joy unspeakable and full of glory." But because, when we have done all we can, we shall come far short, we must resolve, not only to make a few praises in this highest part of our devotion, but to perpetuate the duty to our lives' end; striving to imprint the love of the Lord Jesus so deeply in our minds, that the memory of it may never depart from us, but may dispose us to bless the Lord at all times, in all places, and upon all occasions. And farther, since no praises of our lips can be sufficient, we are here prescribed another way to make our thanks to be "continual:" namely, by glorifying God in our lives: that is, by resigning up ourselves to the disposal of his providence; and by yielding obedience to all his commandments. The Eucharist is but for one hour; the hymns will soon be over: but by submission and obedience we may glorify our God continually and every moment. Dean Comber.

[b] — all the days of our life. Amen.] We cannot sufficiently commend the great care our Church has taken, not only to prepare the hearts of the congregation, but also to drive away unworthy communicants, by the foregoing excellent exhortation, and the following address. Certainly if their consciences are capable of being wrought upon, they cannot but receive a deep impression from these discourses. And if their hearts are not fitly disposed, if their souls are not in a spiritual heavenly frame, it should seem impossible for them after such solemn warnings, to approach the holy table. It should be observed also, that during the reading of the exhortation, and the brief address which follows it, the people ought to be employed in a serious attention to them, having their hearts open and ready to be influenced thereby, that their devotion may be enkindled, and accompany every part of the office with all possible ardour and zeal. Dr. Bennet.

According to our sincerity in devoting ourselves to our Lord, we shall find the powerful communication of his good Spirit to us, to unite us closer to Himself. When this outward action declares the inward devotion of our hearts, to knit themselves to Him, and to become one spirit with Him, without all doubt He will make us feel that He dwells in us by the power of his Spirit, to enliven, help, and strengthen us in a Christian course of life. For this "communion" is mutual; and the word properly signifies a participation of something from Him, by our joining ourselves to Him. "We dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; we are made one with Christ, and Christ with us:" as the words are in this exhortation: and so we may expect all those graces and favours, which he hath received from God, to impart to faithful souls: particularly, it is a pledge of his divine presence with us, and that He will send his heavenly influence into our hearts. Being knit and joined to Him, as members of his body, we may be assured He will take care of us, as our head. He engages Himself to guide, quicken, refresh, powerfully move and assist us in all well doing. This we may humbly wait for, by virtue of our union with Him. As the evil spirit wrought in the children of disobedience, who were joined to devils by eating of their meat; so will the Spirit of grace work in those that obey our Lord, being joined to Him by partaking of his table. And for that end we may come to it; that, being knit still faster to Him, we may have a more abundant communication of his Holy Spirit to us. We may intreat Him to be a constant friend to us; to make his abode with us; "so that we may evermore dwell in him, and he in us." He will say "Amen" to it, as well as we: if in the uprightness of our hearts we perform this holy action. Bp. Patrick.

[c] Then shall the Priest say &c.] The feast being now ready, and the guests prepared with due instructions, the priest, who is the steward of these mysteries, according to the ancient Liturgies, invites them "to come near with fear and faith." And that God may accept them, He repeats those graces with which they must be adorned, which are, 1. repentance, 2. charity, 3. holy purposes, without which they can neither come with faith, receive with comfort, nor depart with a blessing. But supposing them to be so adorned, He then invites them to "draw near with faith, &c." shewing them what is the first duty to be done, namely, making an humble confession upon their knees. Dean Comber.

[d] — to them that come to receive the holy Communion,] This rubrick before the invitation stood, as it now does, from 1549 to 1661. During this period, the three preceding exhortations were, or might be, read to the whole congregation, but not to the communicants alone after others had withdrawn. This invitation was addressed to those only, who came to receive the Communion. When, in 1662, the two former exhortations were appointed to be read "on some Sunday or holyday before;" and to the third was prefixed this rubrick, "At the time of the celebration of the Communion the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the holy Sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation;" it became in some degree improper to retain here the words "to them that come to receive the holy Communion." "Then shall the priest say," was all the rubrick that was necessary.

This invitation consists of three parts; the qualifications required in those that are invited; the invitation itself; and a direction to make their confession to Almighty God. Invitations similar to this are mentioned in the writings of the fathers, and are found in ancient Liturgies. Shepherd.

[e] — Draw near with faith,] It has been said, that at the delivery of these words it would be a significant and expressive act, for the communicants to approach the Lord's table, and at the confession to place themselves on their knees at the rails of the chancel. This however can be done only by a small part of the communicants, except there be a very few in number. The expression is therefore to be taken rather in a spiritual, than a literal sense, as the words "with faith" seem to determine. Shepherd.

The drawing near which is here mentioned, cannot well be supposed to relate to the bodily approach of the communicants. For the Church supposes them to be conveniently placed for receiving, before the late exhortation was read, as appears from the rubrick prefixed to it: and it is notorious that there is no change of place intended now. The "drawing near" is meant in a spiritual sense. It is a drawing near to God in this sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; a more solemn approach to the divine Majesty; or entrance, as it were, into his more immediate presence. And in this sense the phrase is used in Scripture: "Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith," Heb. x. 22. Dr. Bennet.

[f] — meekly kneeling upon your knees.] As becomes offenders who sue for their pardon to the King of kings. Dean Comber. If in all the prayers we make, we should carry ourselves with reverence and submission, surely this must in an especial manner be attended with the most profound humility and devotion. Our voice at the same time should be as humble as our gesture; not clamorous, so as to disturb any, but sober, so as to excite and animate the devotion of others. Archdeacon Yardley. The people are evidently supposed to have been in a posture different from "kneeling," during the exhortation, "Dearly beloved in the Lord," and the invitation, "Ye that do truly and carnestly repent," which precede the Confession now about to be made. At this time, according to the injunction now delivered by the priest, and according to the rubrick which follows, they, as well as the minister himself, are to "kneel meekly and humbly on their knees." I venture to make this remark, because in several congregations I have observed, that it is a practice for the people to kneel during the exhortation and the invitation: a practice, not only hardly consistent with the rubrick, but incorrect also, as I apprehend, in principle; inasmuch as the posture, in which they receive the exhortation of the minister, should differ from that, in which they join with him in making confession of their sins, or hear from him a declaration of pardon. Edit.

[g] Then shall this general Confession be made,] From the foregoing admonition we proceed immediately to the first thing recommended in it, a penitent confession of our sins: which the ancient church made also on the same occasion. Abp. Secker. Beside the private confession of the closet, used by all good Christians before they come to the Sacrament, and that made to the priest in special cases of a great doubt or a strong temptation, there was anciently a general prayer for mercy, as St. Chrysostom informs us, used by all the communicants when they were come to the altar; and since Christ's sufferings are here remembered, we must own our sins which were the causes of them; yea, since we hope to have our pardon sealed, we ought first with shame and sorrow to own the transgressions, for his honour who doth so freely remit them: and hereto this excellent form directs us. Dean Comber.

The Church very aptly disposeth confession in this part of the Communion service: for considering that solemn penance, of so laudable practice in the primitive church, is laid aside, and the necessity of auricular confession worthily abolished; there is good reason some account should be given to the church, and in the church, of our humble acknowledgment of our sins, and hearty contrition for them, as preparatives necessary to the ensuing duty. L'Estrange.

the whole time of the priest's officiating at the Communion, he is directed to kneel only thrice: at this confession; at the Collect before the prayer for consecration; and at the act of receiving. In every other part of the office he is to stand. This was the practice of the ancient church; and the attitude was probably borrowed from the service of the temple, where the legal sacrifices were offered by the priest standing. Between the legal and evangelical sacrifices there is the same correspondence that exists between the shadow and the substance. The Christian priest offers up the incense of prayers, praises, and alms; the oblation of ourselves, our souls and bodies; and the memorial of the sacrifice of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. At the confession, and the Collect before the prayer of consecration, which form no part of those oblations, he kneels. In the former he confesses his own sins, as well as the sins of the people; and in the latter he acknowledges his and their unworthiness to approach the Lord's table. He receives the Communion kneeling, because that is the posture prescribed by the Church of England to all that communicate. At every other part of the service it appears to have been the intention of the Church that the priest should stand. L'Estrange, Shepherd.

[i] Almighty God, &c.] The attributes, here selected, clearly set before us the greatness and goodness of the Lord, and may support our hope, and encourage us to ask forgiveness. 1. He is "Almighty," ever absolute and supreme; so that, if He please, He can forgive without controul, and none can reverse his acts of grace. 2. He is the "Father" of our Redeemer; and in Him He loveth us with an everlasting love, by Him our peace is made, so that through Him we may go with boldness to the throne of grace. 3. He is "the Maker of all things," and of us among the rest. Now He hateth nothing that He hath made, for "his mercy is over all his works;" wherefore we may have good hopes that He will pity and help the work of his own hands. Lastly, He is "the Judge of all men:" let us therefore now make our supplication to Him, for it is yet the time of mercy, Job ix. 15; and He is now willing to help them whom his beloved Son hath redeemed with his precious blood. Dean Comber.

[k] — By thought, word, and deed,] Although it is impossible to recite here all the particulars in which we have sinned, yet the church puts our thoughts into some method for the furtherance of our penitential recollections: and how could that be better done, than by this brief yet full division, so often found in the ancient Liturgies, and so much used among the Fathers, directing us to consider of the several sins of our "thoughts," our "words," and our "deeds." For Solomon tells us that for every "secret thought;" Christ, that for "every idle word;" St. Paul, that for "every evil deed," God will bring us into judgment. Let us therefore now prevent that, by considering and judging ourselves. Dean Comber.

[l] — The burden of them is intolerable.] By this phrase we mean not always, that the sorrow, which we that instant feel for them, is extreme; for, though very sincere, it may be imperfect in its degree; or, though as perfect, as the natural constitution of our mind and body admits, it may be not very passionate and affecting; or, though it were once so, it may now be moderated by a joyful sense of God's mercy to us: but we mean, that the weight, with which our guilt, if not removed, will finally sit heavy on our souls, is unspeakably greater, than we shall be able to bear. Abp. Secker.

[m] —And grant that we may ever hereafter serve and please thee, &c.] In the same breath, that we ask for pardon, we must also petition for grace to amend our lives; or else we affront the holiness of God, while we pretend to crave his mercy. He that only desires forgiveness, to be quit of his present fear, is an hypocrite; and doth not hate or grieve for his iniquity, but for the punishment annexed to it; and, when that fear ceaseth, he will be as bad as ever. But, if we have truly felt the weight of sin, and duly apprehended the misery of having God to be our enemy, we shall be desirous to be kept from future sins, as we are to be delivered from our past offences. Dean Comber.

[n] — Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.] This confession of sins is conceived in words so apposite and pathetical, that if the repentance of those, who use it, be answerable to the form, it is impossible that it should ever be more hearty and sincere. Wheatly.

The Confession was composed by the Reformers. The Absolution, which is a benedictory prayer, occurs in the penitentiary of Egbert Archbishop of York, about the year of our Lord 730; and is said to have been composed by Pope Pontian, or Damasus. Though it is the form generally found in the more ancient missals of both the Roman and other churches, yet I do not know that it has been so scrupulously retained in any modern Liturgy, as in that of our Church. With the old precatory form which is literally translated, we have incorporated an introductory sentence, declaratory of the evangelical promise of pardon and forgiveness. Shepherd.

[o] Then shall the Priest &c.] After this confession, the minister, himself one of the sinners, who have joined in it, agreeably to the duty of his office, assures the people, that "God hath promised forgiveness to all, that turn to him" as they ought; and earnestly prays, that they may obtain it, adding express authorities of Scripture to confirm their faith and hope. Abp. Secker.

Isa lv. 7. Ezek. xviii. 30. John iii. 16, &c.

ALMIGHTY God, our heavenly Father, who of his great mercy hath promised forgiveness of sins to all them that with hearty repentance and true faith turn unto him; Have mercy upon you; pardon

[p] —pronounce this Absolution.] When the discipline of the ancient church was in force, no notorious offender could escape the censures that his sin deserved, nor was he admitted to the Sacrament without a publick and solemn absolution upon his repentance. And although this discipline be now (to the great hurt of the Christian world) laid aside, yet we are required to judge our own selves, and however to confess our sins to God with shame and sorrow. And now, lest our guilt should terrify us from coming to this holy table, the priest doth here very properly exercise the power given him by Christ, and pronounces absolution in his name in the form of a prayer, or a benediction, Numb. vi. 24; which, coming from a person commissioned by Christ for this end, ought to be received with faith and gratitude, and is the only way to quiet the conscience of a poor humble sinner, now that revelations are ceased. Dean Comber.

The priest is to pronounce this Absolution, because to him, and not to the deacon, it is said at ordination, "Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted:" unless the Bishop be present; and then, for honour's sake, and in token of his spiritual superiority, this act of authority is reserved for him. Here it is that he, in a peculiar manner, acts as the messenger of the Lord of hosts, as the ambassador of Christ; and therefore he is ordered to "stand," while he pronounceth it; and to "turn himself to the people," because the good news he brings, and the pardon he opens, directly concerns them. Archdeacon Yardley.

There are three several forms of absolution in the Service. The first is that which is used at Morning Prayer. "Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. and who hath given power and commandment to his ministers to declare and pronounce to his people being penitent, the absolution and remission of their sins: he pardoneth and absolveth."

The second is used at the Visitation of the Sick. "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath left power to his church to absolve all sinners which truly repent, of his great mercy forgive thee; and by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee, &c."

The third is at the Communion. "Almighty God our heavenly Father, who of his great mercy hath promised forgiveness of sins to all them, that with hearty repentance and true faith turn unto him, have mercy upon you, pardon and forgive you, &c."

All these several forms, in sense and virtue, are the same: for as when a prince hath granted a commission to any servant of his, to release out of prison all penitent offenders whatsoever, it were all one, in effect, as to the prisoner's discharge, whether this servant says, By virtue of a commission granted to me, under the prince's hand and seal, which here I shew, I release this prisoner; or thus, The prince who hath given me this commission, he pardons you; or lastly, The prince pardon and deliver you; the prince then standing by, and confirming the word of his servant: so is it here all one as to the remission of sins in the penitent, whether the priest absolves him after this form: Almighty God, who hath given me and all priests power to pronounce pardon to the penitent, "he pardons you:" or thus, By virtue of a commission granted to me from God, "I absolve you;" or lastly, "God pardon you," namely, by me his servant according to his promise, "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted." All these are but several expressions of the same thing, and are effectual to the penitent by virtue of that commission mentioned, St. John xx. 23, "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted." Which commission, in two of these forms, is expressed, and in the last, namely, that at the Communion, is sufficiently implied and supposed. For the priest is directed in using this form, "to stand up and turn to the people;" (rubrick immediately before it;) which behaviour certainly signifies more than a bare prayer for the people: for if it were only a prayer for the people, he should not be directed "to stand and turn to the people" when he speaks, but to God from the people. This gesture of standing and turning to the people signifies a message of God to the people by the mouth of his priest, a part of his ministry of reconciliation, a solemn application of pardon to the penitent by God's minister, and is in sense thus much, "Almighty God pardon you by me." Thus the Greek church, from whom this form is borrowed, uses to express it and explain it: "Almighty God pardon you, by me his unworthy servant:" or, "Lord pardon him; for thou hast said, Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted:" sometimes expressing, always including, God's commission. So then in which form soever of these the Absolution be pronounced, it is in substance the same; an act of authority by virtue of Christ's commission, effectual to remission of sins in the penitent.

Of all these forms, the last, in the Communion service, was most used in primitive times by the Greek and Latin church; and scarce any other form was to be found in their rituals, or ecclesiastical history, till about four hundred years since. Bp. Sparrow.

As to the contents of this Absolution, the priest first reminds the people, that he who is "Almighty" and only can forgive, Mark ii. 7, is also their "heavenly Father, and full of compassion towards them; yea, like as a father pitieth his own children, even so is the Lord merciful unto them that fear him," Ps. ciii. 13. Secondly he shews that God is not only engaged by his affection, but by his truth also, to deliver them, for "he hath" solemnly "promised," that He will freely forgive and fully be reconciled to all such as unfeignedly grieve for their sins, and wholly cast themselves upon his mercy. The latter part of the Absolution comprises every thing which the contrite can need or desire to cheer their hearts. Are they miserable? Here is "mercy." Are they sinful? Here is "pardon." Are they liable to punishment? Here is "deliverance." Are they desirous but unable to do good? Here is "strength and confirmation." Are they fearful of death and hell? Here is heaven and everlasting life. And all this asked of God by one, whom He hath commissioned to make this prayer: so that their only care is, that their repentance be sincere, and then this Absolution shall certainly be confirmed in the high court of heaven, and not one word thereof fall to the ground. Dean Comber.

It has been observed on the Order for Morning Prayer, page 10, note g, that the Absolution is to be pronounced "by the priest alone," in contradistinction to the people; it may be here observed, that the reasons against the people's pronouncing the Absolution after the priest in Morning and Evening Prayer hold still more strongly against their doing it in the Communion service: because the absurdity of their pronouncing it here is aggravated with this circumstance, that this is in the express form directed to the people, running thus, "pardon and deliver you from all your sins, confirm and strengthen you in all goodness, &c." Yet here we find too many of the poorer rank, and of the honourable not a few, returning the same pardon upon the priest, and dispensing it among their neighbours. These mistakes are "spots in our feasts of charity," too visible to be passed over without a just reprehension. Dr. Bisse.

Let every one, with a lowly demeanour and sober joy, attend to the Absolution. Let no one by any means usurp the peculiar office of the priest, and disturb the congregation by repeating it after him. But let all the people beg of God to confirm what the priest pronounces, by adding to it a decent and hearty "Amen." Archdeacon Yardley.

[q] Then shall the Priest say,] It is so necessary for every one that would receive comfort and benefit here, to have a lively faith, and a mind freed from unreasonable doubts and fears, that the church hath chosen these sentences to confirm the faith, and revive the hope of poor penitents, and they are those very promises on which the foregoing Absolution is grounded; so that unless any doubt of the truth of God's word, they must believe these promises of mercy. Dean Comber.

[r] Hear what comfortable words &c.] These most comfortable words should always be read with great deliberation, that the people may have time to reflect upon them, and to apply them every one to the comfort of his soul; and to prevent all unreasonable fears and doubts of God's gracious pardon and acceptance. Bp. Wilson.

[s] Come unto me all that travail &c.] This gracious invitation is the proof of the first assertion in the Absolution: namely, that our Lord "doth promise forgiveness of sins to all them that with hearty repentance turn unto him." The second assertion, namely, that "Almighty God will forgive all, that with true faith turn unto him," is confirmed by the next declaration in the words of our blessed Lord, "So God loved the world," &c. But, lest any should despair of God's mercy, because they have been great sinners, St. Paul is introduced avouching this excellent truth, that there is mercy for penitent sinners, by averring the certainty of it, so that it may be received as unquestionable, and alleging himself as a great and remarkable example of it. Finally, if any disconsolate penitent should yet ask, how can these things be? the beloved disciple is brought in to shew, by what means our pardon is effected. We have sinned indeed against a glorious Majesty who dwells in heaven, whither we cannot come ourselves; but we have a friend there, a Mediator to make our peace, an Advocate to plead our cause, who appears in our stead and intercedes for our pardon: an Advocate, peculiarly styled "the righteous," as being wholly innocent and without exception; and, above all, one who hath paid our debt, and was Himself that sin-offering and "propitiation," which satisfied the divine justice, and reconciled his Father by the merits of his own precious blood. Dean Comber.

[t] After which the Priest shall proceed, saying, &c.] This sacrament is a feast of joy and thanksgiving: the apostles ate it with gladness of heart, Acts ii. 46; and the primitive Christians did not think fit to receive upon any day of humiliation, because they were to rejoice in this feast. Wherefore the nature of the Eucharist requires some acts of praise and gratitude: and this is a very fit place for them, since we have now cleared our consciences by confession, and our hopes are raised by the former comfortable assurances of our pardon: now therefore the priest admonishes us to praise God in the responses; gives the reason of it in the prefaces; and joins with us in the doing of it in the trisagium. Dean Comber.

After we have exercised our charity, repentance, and faith, the next part of the office is thanksgiving, which is so considerable a part of our present duty, that it hath given name to the whole, and caused it to be called the Eucharist, or "sacrifice of praise." And here we begin with the lauds and anthem, which, together with most of the remaining part of the office, are purely primitive, near as old as Christianity itself, being to be found almost verbatim amongst the ancient writers. Having therefore exercised our faith upon the foregoing sentences, and so got above this world, we are now ready to go into the other, and to join with the glorified saints and angels, in praising and adoring that God who hath done so great things for us. Wheatly.

The versicles and the trisagium were so anciently, and so universally, and with such little variation admitted into the Liturgies of both the Eastern and Western churches, that some have, not without apparent justice, concluded them to be forms received from the apostles themselves. However this may be, those parts of the service are entitled to our admiration, by their own intrinsick excellence, by that genuine spirit of Christian piety which they breathe, not less than by their high antiquity, and general reception. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

and tried our ways, and turned again to the Lord: we are enjoined to lift up our hearts, Lam. iii. 40, 41. And hence all the Liturgies in the world have this exhortation; and the most ancient of the fathers expound it, as a seasonable admonition to take off our minds from all worldly thoughts, and fix them upon the mystery now in hand; and as a just command, to lift up our souls above all base fear, to consider the goodness of Him that hath taken our heavy load from us. And the people do comply with this reasonable injunction, and assure their pastor that they do now actually lift up their hearts unto the Lord, Ps. xxv. 1, and they must be careful that they not only say these words, but do the thing; and now, casting off all thoughts of the world, that they turn their mind towards God only. Dean Comber.

These versicles are called by the ancients, "Sursum Corda," from the two first words thereof. They are of very great antiquity in the church. St. Cyprian in his time says, that the priest prepared the minds of the faithful by saying, "Sursum Corda," "Lift up your hearts:" and the people made answer, "Habemus ad Dominum," signifying, "We lift them up unto the Lord." The same form is mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, and by St. Chrysostom. Dr. Nicholls.

These words with the answers, and the substance of all that follows constantly, as far as, "Glory be to thee, O Lord most high," appear to have been used in the Communion service more than 1500 years ago; and might probably descend from the apostolick times. Abp. Secker.

[x] Let us give thanks &c.] When the priest finds the communicants' hearts thus fixed upon the thoughts of the divine goodness, and elevated therewith, he doth, in the words of primitive antiquity, taken at first from the Psalms, and ever since retained in the churches of the East and West, exhort them to join with him in eucharist and thanksgiving, for the mercy of absolution now received, and for the comfortable feast they are going to partake of. And the people being convinced that God justly deserves these praises, and that they are highly obliged to give them to Him, do answer, that it is very fit and very just so to do. And none, who is truly sensible of God's goodness, can forbear blessing Him for it in so great an occasion as this. Dean Comber.

[y] It is very meet, right, &c.] When all are agreed, in the responses, to join in praising God, the priest, by this general preface, still the words of pious antiquity, gives a general reason of this duty, and on great festivals adds proper prefaces, containing special reasons for our thanksgiving on those special occasions: and now he begins his sacrifice of praise, he turns from the people (to whom he was speaking before) unto God, and addresses himself to Him, professing and declaring, that "it is meet and right," fit and just in itself, "and our bounden duty," who have received so many and great favours, "that we should" continually remember them, "and at all times" whenever we have leisure, "and in all places" wherever we be, in publick or private, that we should "give thanks" and praise "unto thee, O Lord," for thou art to us a most gracious and "holy Father," and in thyself an "almighty and everlasting God," whose mercies have no measure nor no end. Dean Comber.

[z] Therefore with Angels and Archangels, &c.] The prophet Isaiah heard that hymn, with which the angels, cherubins and seraphins, praised God in heaven, Isa. vi. 3; which, because the word "holy" is thrice repeated in it, was by the Greeks called Trisagium; and because the primitive Church believed the angels were present in Christian assemblies, 1 Cor. xi. 10; and that they desired especially to look into these mysteries, 1 Pet. i. 12; considering also that the "thrice holy" plainly declares the Trinity, the peculiar doctrine of the Christians; therefore they did, in the very first ages, take this hymn into the office for the Sacrament, believing it fit for angels and men to join in this heavenly song, over the memorial of our redemption. Dean Comber.

This hymn expressly and almost to a syllable agrees with that in the Gregorian service, in St. Chrysostom's liturgy, and before them in the Constitutions: the composition is most excellent, wherein the celestial choir are drawn into concert with the Church, joining as a chorus in the words of the people. L'Estrange.

It was long since ordained, namely, in the year 450, that this hymn should be used every day. But surely it is most proper for this blessed sacrament, that as every Person in the Trinity concurred for our redemption, so every one may be adored in the memorial thereof. The Father is "Holy," who gave us such a Saviour; the Son is "Holy," who effected this salvation; and the Spirit is "Holy," who sanctifieth us by virtue thereof; and yet these three are one Lord, to whom we must now with the most fervent gratitude offer up the sacrifice of thanksgiving. Which way indeed can we look, or what can we think upon, that by the operation of the Holy Ghost, was made very man of the substance of the Virgin Mary his mother; and that without spot of sin, to make us clean from all sin. Therefore with Angels, &c.

doth not declare how great and glorious their Creator and Preserver is? And how can we then refrain from giving glory also unto the Lord most high, in his nature most holy, in all his works glorious? Dean Comber.

[a] Proper Prefaces.] The decay of devotion let fall the apostolical and primitive use of daily and weekly communions, and the people in the later ages did not receive but at the greater festivals; upon which custom there were added to the general preface mentioned before some special prefaces relating to the peculiar mercy of that feast on which they did communicate, the Church thinking it fit, that, since every festival was instituted to remember some great mercy, therefore they who received on such a day, besides the general praises offered for all God's mercies, should at the Lord's table make a special memorial of the mercy proper to that festival: and this seemed so rational to our reformers, that they have retained those proper prefaces which relate to Christmas, Easter, Ascension-day, Whit-sunday, and Trinity-sunday, so as to praise God for the mercies of Christ's birth, resurrection, and ascension, for the sending the Holy Ghost, and for the true faith of the holy Trinity. Dean Comber.

Our Lord Himself, before He brake the bread and distributed it, gave thanks; and the Church has thought fit to do the same thing. But because our Lord has not prescribed any set form for this, but used one agreeable to the thing and the time; the Church therefore, as matters and occasion required, has accordingly adapted peculiar forms of prayer and thanksgiving, suited, as St. Augustin says, to the diversity of festival days, in which different benefits are commemorated. Bp. Cosin.

On the greater festivals there are proper prefaces appointed, which are also to be repeated, in case there be a Communion, for seven days after the festivals themselves; (excepting that for Whit-sunday, which is to be repeated only six days after, because Trinity-sunday, which is the seventh, hath a preface peculiar to itself;) to the end that the mercies may be the better remembered by often repetition, and also that all the people (who in most places cannot communicate all in one day) may have other opportunities, within those eight days, to join in praising God for such great blessings.

2. The reason of the Church's lengthening out these high feasts for several days is plain: the subject-matter of them is of so high a nature, and so nearly concerns our salvation, that one day would be too little to meditate upon them, and praise God for them as we ought. A bodily deliverance may justly require one day of thanksgiving and joy: but the deliverance of the soul by the blessings commemorated on those times, deserves a much longer time of praise and acknowledgment. Since therefore it would be injurious to Christians to have their joy and thankfulness for such mercies confined to one day; the Church, upon the times when these unspeakable blessings were wrought for us, invites us, by her most seasonable commands and counsels, to fill our hearts with joy and thankfulness, and let them overflow eight days together.

3. The reason of their being fixed to eight days, is taken from the practice of the Jews, who by God's appointment observed their greater festivals, some of them for seven, and one, namely, the feast of tabernacles, for eight days. And therefore the primitive church, thinking that the observation of Christian festivals (of which the Jewish feasts were only types and shadows) ought not to come short of them, lengthened out their higher feasts to eight days. Bp. Sparrow, Wheatly.

These prefaces are very ancient: though there were some of them, as they stood in the Latin service, of later date. For as there are ten in that service, whereof the last, concerning the Virgin Mary, was added by Pope Urban, 1095; so it follows that the rest must be of a more considerable antiquity. Our Church has only retained five, and those upon the principal festivals of the year, which relate only to the Persons of the ever-blessed Trinity, and not to any saint. Dr. Nicholls.

[b] After each of which Prefaces &c.] The proper prefaces, or those forms by which thanks were given to God, are always concluded with the trisagium, the triumphal, the cherubical hymn, for so it is styled in all the ancient Liturgies. Which because it contains the Eucharist, and does that, which our Lord did, before the distribution and reception, therefore the Church would by no means have it neglected. Bp. Cosin.

[c] Then shall the Priest, kneeling down &c.] The nearer we come to God, and to these holy mysteries, the greater reverence we ought to express: for since it is out of God's mere grace and goodness, that we have the honour to approach his table; it is at least our duty to acknowledge it to be a free and undeserved favour, agreeing rather to the mercy of the giver than to the deserts of the receivers. And therefore, lest our exultations should savour of too much confidence, we now allay them with this act of humility, which the priest offers up "in the name of all them that receive the Communion;" therein excusing his own and the people's unworthiness, in words taken from the most ancient Liturgies. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

This address the priest, kneeling down at the Lord's table, offers up in the name of all them that shall receive the Communion. In ancient Liturgies we meet with prayers resembling this. Thus in the Liturgies ascribed to St. James, "we come to this divine mystery, unworthy indeed, but relying on thy goodness;" and again, "we trust not in our own righteousness, but in thy mercy." But in no form extant can the humble and devout Christian so fully, as in this, express his sense of his own unworthiness, and pray the gracious Father of all mankind to have compassion upon his infirmities, to relieve his necessities, and to fulfil his desires. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

When the priest acknowledges, in the following humble form, his own and the communicants' unworthiness, and God's unmerited kindness in admitting them to his table; each person should make this act of humility his own by attending to it most devoutly. Bp. Wilson.

In this prayer we again solemnly acknowledge our unworthiness, as all the old Liturgies did, though not so fully; and pray, "that our sinful bodies may be made clean by Christ's body, and our souls washed through his most precious blood;" which expressions have been censured, as if they implied, that each of these, at least the latter of them, his blood, had some peculiar efficacy, of which the other was destitute. But this cannot be intended: because very soon after, the "preservation of our bodies and souls" also "unto everlasting life" is ascribed separately, both to his body and to his blood, as it is in Scripture also, Heb. x. 10. 19. Therefore the distinction, made here, was only meant for some kind of elegance of speech; and it much resembles what St. Clement the Roman, whom St. Paul intitles his "fellow-labourer," Phil. iv. 3, hath said, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, that "Christ gave his flesh for our flesh, and his soul for our souls." Abp. Secker.

[d] When the Priest, standing before the Table, &c.] If it be asked, whether the priest is to say this prayer standing before the table, or at the north-end of it; I answer, at the north end of it: for, according to the rules of grammar, the participle "standing" must refer to the verb "ordered," and not to the verb "say." So that whilst the priest is "ordering the bread and wine," he is to stand before the table: but when he says the prayer, he is to stand so as "that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people," which must be on the north-side. For if he stood "before" the table, his body would hinder the people from seeing: so that he must not stand there; and consequently he must stand on the north-side; there being, in our present rubrick, no other place mentioned for performing any part of this office. In the Romish church indeed they always stand "before" the altar during the time of consecration: in order to prevent the people from being eye-witnesses of their opera-that he may with the more readiness and decency break the Bread before the people, and take the Cup into his hands, he shall say the Prayer of Consecration[c], as followeth.

ALMIGHTY God, our heavenly Father, who of thy tender mercy didst give thine only Son Jesus Christ to suffer death upon tion in working their pretended miracle: and in the Greek church they shut the chancel door, or at least draw a veil or curtain before it, I suppose, upon the same account. But our Church, that pretends no such miracle, enjoins, we see, the direct contrary to this, by ordering the priest so "to order the bread and wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread, and take the cup into his hands, before the people." And with this view, it is probable, the Scotch Liturgy ordered, that "during the time of consecration the presbyter should stand at such a part of the holy table, where he may with the more ease and decency use both his hands." Wheatly.

The consecration of the elements being always esteemed an act of authority, and standing being therefore a more proper posture, as well as a more commodious one for this purpose, the priest is here directed to stand. Collis. See page 35, note a.

[c] — he shall say the Prayer of Consecration,] We do not eat our common food, without first praying for a blessing on it; which pious custom is so universal, that it is certainly a piece of natural religion; how much more then are we obliged, before we eat and drink this bread and wine, which Christ designed to set forth the mystery of his death, to consecrate it and set it apart by a solemn prayer; especially since Christ Himself in the institution of this sacred ordinance, while He was teaching his apostles how to celebrate it, did use a form of blessing over it, Matt. xxvi. 26; which St. Paul calls "giving thanks," 1 Cor. xi. 24. Wherefore all churches in the world from the apostles' days have used such a form, the ancient and essential part of which is the words of our Saviour's institution; for, since he makes this sacramental change, it hath been thought fit by all churches to keep his own words, which being pronounced by a lawful priest, do properly make the consecration; wherefore our Church hath cut off all the later superstitious additions, by which the Roman church hath corrupted this form, and given us a prayer of consecration, consisting only of the words of our Saviour's institution, and a proper prayer to introduce it. The first part is a prayer directed to "Almighty God our heavenly Father," commemorating his mercy in giving his Son to die for us, and the all-sufficient merit of his death, together with his command for our remembering it in this sacrament: and on these grounds desiring, that, since we obey Him in thus celebrating it, we may therein receive Christ's body and blood. The second part is the repetition of the words and actions of our Lord at the institution, concerning both the time and the manner of its institution. Dean Comber.

If it be here demanded, to what words the consecration of the elements ought to be ascribed; I answer, to the prayer of the faithful offered by the priest, and to the words of institution repeated by him. This was the sense of the ancient church of Christ, which used them both in their eucharistical offices; and never held, that the elements were changed from their common to a more sublime use and efficacy by the bare repeating of the words, "This is my body," and "This is my blood," as the Papists absurdly hold. To bring about this change must be the work of the Holy Ghost: and thereupon it is requisite, that we should pray to God, to endue the elements with this life-giving virtue. Now the words of institution can by no means be called a prayer: they were addressed by our Saviour to his disciples, and not to God: to them He said, "Take and eat." When we use them, they are historical, recounting what our Lord said and did, when He ordained this sacrament. And though when He said, "This is my body, this is my blood," these words effectually made them so, shewing that it was his will and pleasure that they should be taken as his sacramental body and blood; though the virtue of those words, once spoken by Christ, doth still operate towards making the bread and wine his body and blood; yet, as now used and spoken by the priest, they do not contain in them any such power, unless they be joined with prayer to God.

Our Lord Himself did, besides pronouncing them, give thanks and bless the elements. Thus our Church uses prayer, as well as the words of institution; and doth not attribute the consecration to the one without the other. "If the consecrated bread or wine be all spent, before all have communicated, the priest," it is true, is ordered by the rubrick to "consecrate more," by repeating only the words of institution. But the virtue of the prayer, which the Church hath last made, is to be understood as concurring therewith: and this is only a particular application to these particular elements. Hence comes the propriety of saying "Amen" at the end of those words: which would not be so properly added, unless it referred back to the preceding petitions. And that this is the sense of the Church of England is farther plain, in that she in her rubrick calls this "the prayer of consecration," in which the words of institution are contained; and it is addressed to Almighty God, &c., whereas the words of Christ were not supplicatory to God, but declaratory to his disciples.

After the same manner, in the "Office of Publick Baptism," in imitation of the custom of the ancient Christians, who dedicated the baptismal water to the holy and spiritual use, for which it was designed, our Church not only repeats the words of institution of that other sacrament; but likewise adds a solemn prayer, that God would "sanctify the water to the mystical washing away of sin." And, as in that sacrament she joins the prayer of the faithful to the words of Christ, so in the sacrament of the altar she thinks them both necessary to complete the consecration. Archdeacon Yardley.

A prayer of consecration, or setting apart the bread and wine to the sacred purpose, in which they are about to be employed, hath been used for that end at least 1600 years. And the mention, which ours makes of the institution of the Lord's supper, from the words, "who in the same night that he was betrayed," to the conclusion, is in every old liturgy in the world. The Romanists have put into their prayer of consecration names of saints, and commemorations of the dead, which we have thrown out. And indeed we have left nothing that so much as needs explaining: unless it may be useful to observe, that our Saviour's "one oblation of himself" is opposed to the various kinds of oblations under the law; and, "once offered," to the continual repetition of them: though probably a further view was, to intimate, that he is not, as the Papists pretend, really sacrificed anew in this holy ordinance. Abp. Secker.

The death of Christ, if we regard the persons for the cross for our redemption; who made there (by his one oblation of himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world; and did institute, and in his holy Gospel command us to continue, a perpetual memory[f] of that his precious death, until his coming again; Hear us, O merciful Father, we most humbly beseech thee; and grant that we receiving these thy creatures[g] of bread and wine, according to thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ's holy institution, in remembrance of his death and passion, may be partakers of his most blessed Body and Blood: who, in the same night that he was betrayed[h], * took Bread[k]; and, when he had given thanks, 1 Cor. xi. 23—25.

* Here the Priest is to take the Paten[i] into his hands:

whom it was undergone, is a "sacrifice;" if we regard Him who offered it, it is a free "oblation;" if we consider Him to whom it was offered, it is a "satisfaction;" and, in every one of these respects, it is "full, perfect, and sufficient:" or, particularly, it is a "full satisfaction," a "perfect oblation," and a "sufficient sacrifice;" not, like the legal offerings, for the sins of one kind, or the offences of one nation or of one person, but for the sins of all the world. Let none therefore mistake; or imagine we are about to sacrifice Christ again, as the Roman church falsely teacheth; for that is not only needless and impossible, but a plain contradiction to St. Paul, who affirms, that Jesus was offered only "once," Heb. ix. 26; x. 10. 12: and by that "one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," ver. 14, so that there needs "no more offering for sin," ver. 18. Dean Comber.

From these passages of the Epistles to the Hebrews it is plain that Christ can be no more offered, as the doctors and priests of the Roman party fancy it to be, vainly thinking that, every time they say mass, they offer up and sacrifice Christ anew, as properly and truly as He offered up Himself in his sacrifice upon the cross. And this is one of the points of doctrine, and the chief one, whereof the popish mass consisteth; abrogated and reformed here by the Church of England, according to the express word of God. Bp. Overall.

[f] —a perpetual memory] That is, a memorial or monumental record. Todd.

[g] —grant that we receiving these thy creatures &c.] We behold "the creatures of bread and wine," and we know them to be as yet no more. But we desire they may be made to us "the body and blood of Christ;" that, although they remain in substance what they were, yet to the worthy receiver they may be something far more excellent, which nothing can effect but that Word, which made all things out of nothing. We are not now begging for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life, John vi. 27: yet we ought to hope He will grant us this request, because we are about to partake of this ordinance, both in a right manner, as Christ did institute it, and to a right end, for a memorial of his death. We earnestly desire to be partakers of our Saviour, and in this manner He hath chosen to communicate Himself: therefore we may cheerfully request, that by receiving this bread and wine, which He hath chosen, we may become "partakers of his most blessed body and blood:" for St. Paul assures us, the bread thus blessed is the communion or communication of Christ's body: there needs no real change in the substance of the elements, for this participation is not by sense, but by faith. Dean Comber.

After the bread and wine are deputed, by holy prayer to God, to be used for a commemoration of Christ's death; though they do not cease to be what they were before, yet they begin to be something which they were not before this consecration: that is, they become now to us "visible signs of an inward and spiritual grace;" and do not merely figure to us the breaking of Christ's body, and the shedding of his blood: but are a pledge of that inward and spiritual grace which they represent. What that grace is, we are taught by our Catechism; when it tells us, that it is "the body and blood of Christ, which are verily and indeed received of the faithful in the Lord's supper:" that is, they have a real part and portion given them in the death and sufferings of the Lord Jesus, whose body was broken, and blood shed, for remission of sins. They truly and indeed partake of the virtue of his bloody sacrifice, whereby He hath obtained an eternal redemption for us. This is the meaning of partaking of his body and blood, which are here communicated. Bp. Patrick.

[h] —who, in the same night that he was betrayed, &c.] It is manifest from the connexion of these words with the former part of the form, that they are addressed to God, and not to the congregation. They are therefore a part of the prayer of the congregation, and in the repetition of them the mind of the minister must be directed to God, and not to the people. Dr. Bennet.

The best pattern for the celebration of this mystery is to be taken from its divine Author; whose words and actions are so punctually related as a direction to us in this solemnity: and, when the rite was disordered in the church at Corinth, St. Paul sends them to the first institution, 1 Cor. xi, as to the rule and canon whereby they ought to rectify all that was amiss. And for this reason, as before observed, no church in the world ever omitted these words of our Saviour, by which they believed the consecration to be principally made. Dean Comber.

[i] —the Paten] The "paten" is the plate, in which the sacred bread is laid. The original word, which is patena, signifies a wide open dish. In the more primitive times, when the Christians were but of mean condition, and their state of persecution would not allow them to pretend to any thing that was magnificent, the sacramental bread was only laid upon a plate made of osiers or wood. After this pope Zephirinus, about the year 230, brought in the use of glass patens. But in the Council of Rheims, 813, it was ordered, that patens and chalices should be made either of gold or silver. But this was the custom before in the churches of wealthy cities. Dr. Nicholls.

[k] —took bread—took the cup] At these words the priest was appointed by the first Liturgy, set forth in the first year of King Edward VI. to take the bread and cup into his hands, which is still observed by us. But he was not appointed to make any elevation of them, as the new Roman-Catholicks do at their mass:

*he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat, †this is my Body which is given for you: Do this in remembrance[m] of me. Likewise after supper he ‡ took the Cup; and, when he had given thanks, he gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this; for this § is my Blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many[o] for the remission of sins: Do this, as oft as ye shall drink it, in remembrance of me. Amen.

where the priest, saying, "Hoc est corpus meum," "This is my body," suddenly lifts up the wafer over his head, and afterwards the chalice, that the people may all fall down upon their knees and worship them. Which rite neither we, nor any of the Reformed or Protestant Churches, observe; but, in regard of the peril of idolatry, have wholly omitted it. Besides it is but a novelty as the Roman priests now use it; for in the ancient fathers we do not read of any such custom: but it is a late device of the new Roman-Catholicks, after they had brought in their novelty of transubstantiation. Bp. Cosin.

[l] — break the Bread.] Before the use of wafers was brought into the Church, breaking the bread was used, as more agreeable to our Saviour's practice, and an apter representation of his sufferings. This appears from various passages in Irenæus, Austin, Clement of Alexandria, Chrysostom, Cyprian, and others. This ancient usage of breaking the bread was first altered by the Greeks, who brought in a way of cutting it: for which purpose they provided an iron instrument, called "a spear," being something like a chisel with a long handle, by which they chopped a flat cake of bread into pieces; hereby pretending to exhibit a representation of our Saviour's side being pierced by the soldier's spear. But in the church of Rome the breaking of the bread, in order to communicate it among the faithful, is quite vanished. The priest only divides the sacrificial wafer, in a superstitious way, into three parts, which he eats up himself: but the wafers delivered to the communicants are all entire. Dr. Nicholls.

[m] — Do this in remembrance] That is, of Christ put to death, and sacrificed for us upon the cross; which is the sacrifice, which He truly and properly once made, and whereof we only make a commemoration and representation, as often as we celebrate this his sacrament, and observe the precept which He gave us about it. Bp. Cosin.

[n] — Chalice] The cup, which the consecrated wine is delivered in, is called by this name. In the earlier times of Christianity the chalices were made of wood. About the second century glass ones were substituted, unless in very poor churches, or some finely cut out of marble. When the government became Christian, gold and silver chalices came in use. By a canon of the Council of Rheims, in Charles the Great's time, all churches were obliged to have chalices of some purer metal. The ancient chalices were of two kinds: the greater, which were in the nature of our flagons, containing a large quantity of wine, which was all consecrated in them together; and the lesser, which were otherwise called "ministeriales," because the priest delivered the wine to be drunk out of them. For communion in one kind was not then invented by the Romish church. Dr. Nicholls.

[o] — shed for you and for many] "For many" in this place means the same as "for all," as in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, v. 19; where, since by one man "many" are said to have been made sinners, "many" are used for "all." Bp. Cosin.

[p] Then shall the Minister first receive &c.] The holy symbols being thus consecrated, the communicants must not rudely take every one his own part; because God, who is the master of the feast, hath provided stewards to divide to every one their portion. Some persons indeed have disliked the minister's delivering the holy elements to each communicant; pretending that it is contrary to the practice of our Saviour, who bid the apostles "take the cup and divide it among themselves." But one would think that any one that reads the context would perceive that this passage does not relate to the Eucharist, but to the paschal supper; since it appears so evidently from the nineteenth and twentieth verses of the same chapter, that the sacrament of the Lord's supper was not instituted till after that cup was drunk. But as to the manner of his delivering the sacrament, the Scriptures are wholly silent; and consequently we have no other means to judge what it was, but by the practice of the first Christians, who doubtless, as far as was convenient and requisite, imitated our Saviour in this as well as they did in other things: and therefore since it was the general practice among them for the minister to deliver the elements to each communicant, we have as much authority and reason as can be desired to continue this practice still.

2. The minister therefore that celebrateth "is first to receive the Communion in both kinds himself; then to proceed to deliver the same to the bishops, priests, and deacons in like manner," (that is, in both kinds,) "if any be present, (that they may help the chief minister," as the old Common Prayer has it, or "him that celebrateth," as it is in the Scotch Liturgy,) and "after that to the people also in order." And this is consonant to the practice of the primitive church, in which it was always the custom for the clergy to communicate within the rails of the altar, and before the sacrament was delivered to the people. Dean Comber, Wheatly. And herein only consists the true difference between ecclesiastical and lay Communion; and not, as the Papists pretend, in the clergy's receiving under both kinds, and the cup being denied to the laity. Archdeacon Yardley.

The minister is here ordered first of all to receive the Communion in both kinds himself, before he administers it to the people. But how or in what form of words, he shall take it himself, is not said: which is apt to produce some variety of expression on such occasions. Bishop Cosin indeed had drawn up a form, which all the clergy were to follow, when they received the Communion themselves: but it was not put in at the last revisal. Archdeacon Sharp.

any be present,) and after that to the people[q] also in order, into their hands[r], all meekly kneeling[s]. And, when he delivereth the Bread to any one, he shall say[t], [q] — and after that to the people] Chrysostom teaches, that "as the prayers, so the partaking of the mysteries, are common to the people with the priest." Which is directly contrary to the solitary masses of the Papists, when the priest only takes the mysteries. Bp. Cosin.

[r] — into their hands,] We have the unanimous testimony of the fathers, that the communicants always received the elements into their own hands. Cyril, in his fifth Mystagogick catechesis, directs the communicant to receive the body of Christ in the hollow part of the right hand, which he advises him to support with the left. This is what others call receiving it in the hands placed in the form of a cross. During the corrupter ages, when sacramental bread and wine were believed to be the actual body and blood of Christ, a wafer was substituted for bread, and that was by the priest put into the mouth of the communicant, that no particle of the body of Christ should be wasted or lost. And, lest the blood should be spilt, or any accident happen, the cup was totally withheld from the laity. At the Reformation the primitive practice was restored, and the Communion in both kinds delivered into the hands of the people. Shepherd.

[s] — all meekly kneeling.] No posture can be too humble when we are to receive a pardon; and a pardon, which must deliver us from death eternal. Bp. Wilson.

All the communicants in this heavenly feast are to approach in the posture of kneeling, as well to express their humility, and the sense they have of their own unworthiness, as that they may be in the posture of prayer; for they have many petitions to put up all the time of the celebration, for pardon, peace, and grace, for themselves and their friends, for the church, and for all mankind: so that if the posture were left at our liberty, no good man would do other than kneel; but we are more obliged so to do, since our Church enjoins it, and all the well-ordered churches in the world practise it: nor do any scruple it, but they who study for pretences to palliate their most unjustifiable separatioo, or designed neglect of this ordinance: for our Church declares we adore Christ, not the bread; and there is no more reason to call it idolatry to kneel before the altar with the consecrated bread upon it, than to kneel before a desk on which a Bible is placed: and if the devout communicant lift up his heart to Jesus, he will never scruple to bow his knee to Him also. Dean Comber.

The posture of kneeling, which we use when we receive, is a very proper one. Some indeed think, that the apostles received in the posture which they used at meals, and that we ought to imitate them in this. Now if so, to imitate them strictly, we must not sit, as these persons do, but lie all along; for so did the apostles at table. But indeed we may rather suppose, that when our Saviour blessed the bread and wine, this being an address to God, both He and they were in some posture of adoration; and that they changed it before receiving it, is not likely, considering how different that was from a common meal. Nor does it appear, that any part of the Christian church, till of late years, ever used any other posture than that of kneeling or standing; by each of which they meant to signify worship. We use the former; but with an express declaration inserted in all our Prayer Books, "that no adoration is hereby intended or ought to be done, either to the sacramental bread and wine; (for that were idolatry to be abhorred of all Christians;) or to any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood; for they are in heaven, and not here." (See rubrick after the Communion.) We kneel therefore only to adore the invisible God: and to be in a fit posture for those prayers and praises, which can never be more properly offered up to Him. And why any persons should prefer a different posture we cannot see. Abp. Secker.

As for the punctual time, when the posture of kneeling first began, it is hard to determine: but we are assured, that it hath obtained in the Western church above 1200 years; and though anciently they stood in the east, yet, as St. Cyril says, it was "with fear and trembling, with silence and downcast eyes, bowing themselves in the posture of worship and adoration."

But it is now the custom of the Greek, Roman, Lutheran, and most churches in the world, to receive kneeling.

And it is worth observing, that they who at other times cry out so much against the Church of England for retaining several ceremonies, which, though indifferent in themselves, they say, become unlawful by being abused by superstition and popery, can, in this more solemn and material ceremony, agree even with the Pope himself, (who receives "sitting,") rather than not differ from the best and purest Church in the world.

Nor may I pass by unobserved that the posture of "sitting" was first brought into the Church by the Arians; who, stubbornly denying the divinity of our Saviour, thought it no robbery to be equal with Him, and to sit down with Him at his table: for which reason it was justly banished the reformed church in Poland, by a general Synod, in the year of our Lord 1583. And it is the Pope's opinion of his being St. Peter's successor, and Christ's vicegerent, which prompts him to use such familiarity with his Lord. Wheatly.

Our kneeling at communions is the gesture of piety. If we did there present ourselves but to make some shew or dumb resemblance of a spiritual feast, it may be that sitting were the fitter ceremony: but coming as receivers of inestimable grace at the hands of God, what doth better beseem our bodies at that hour, than to be sensible witnesses of minds unfeignedly humble? Our Lord Himself did that, which custom and long usage had made fit: we that, which fitness and great decency hath made usual. Hooker.

The directing here, concerning "kneeling," hath reference as well to the minister himself, as to the people and other ministers. Bp. Cosin.

[t] — And, when he delivereth the Bread to any one, he shall say,] This form of words, used by him whom God hath made the steward of these mysteries to give his children their portion in due season, consists of three particulars: 1. Instruction, declaring what it is, namely, "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, the blood, &c." And this was used in St. Ambrose's time. 2. Prayer, desiring this communication of them to us may "preserve our bodies and souls unto everlasting life," and this is as ancient as St. Gregory at least. 3. Direction what we are to do, namely, "take, eat," or "drink this in remembrance that Christ died" and "his blood was shed for us;" and to "feed on him in our hearts by faith with thanksgiving," and to "be thankful" for his blood-shedding. And this part is a full paraphrase on Christ's own words, and the whole form together comes as nigh our Lord's own words, in his administering this his last supper, as can well be. Dean Comber.

THE Body of our Lord Jesus Christ[u], which was given for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life. Take and eat this in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart by faith with thanksgiving.

¶ And the Minister that delivereth the Cup[x] to any one shall say,

THE Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was shed for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life. Drink this in remembrance that Christ's Blood was shed for thee, and be thankful[y].

¶ If the consecrated Bread or Wine be all spent before all have communicated, the Priest is to consecrate more according to the Form before prescribed; beginning at [Our Saviour Christ in the same night, &c.] for the blessing of the Bread; and at [Likewise after Supper, &c.] for the blessing of the Cup.

¶ When all have communicated, the Minister shall return to the Lord's Table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated Elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth[a].

The first part of these words, namely "The body," or "The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ," was the only form used in St. Ambrose's time at the delivery of the bread and wine, to which the receivers answered, "Amen;" both to express their desire that it might be Christ's body and blood unto them, and their firm belief that it was so. The next words, "Preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life," were added by St. Gregory: and these with the former were all that were to be used at the delivery of the elements, during the first Common Prayer Book of King Edward VI. But these words, I suppose, being thought at that time to savour too much of the "real presence" in the sacrament, which was a doctrine that then was thought to imply too much of transubstantiation to be believed; they were therefore left out of the second book, and the following words prescribed in the room of them, "Take and eat this," &c., or "Drink this," &c., as in the latter part of our present forms. But these on the other side reducing the sacrament to a bare eating and drinking in remembrance of the death and passion of our Lord; they were in a little time as much disliked as the former. And therefore, upon Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne, (whose design and endeavour was to unite the nation as much as she could in one doctrine and faith,) both these forms were enjoined to be used (as we have them still) to satisfy both parties. Though in the Scotch Liturgy the last clause was again thrown out, and the former only (which was prescribed by the first book) retained, with a direction to the receiver to say "Amen:" which is undoubtedly the most agreeable to the primitive practice, and to the true notion of the Eucharist. Wheatly.

The first part of the words, which the minister speaks at delivering the elements, is very ancient: the rest is added by our Church: and the whole is unexceptionable. Abp. Secker.

[u] The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c.] After the consecration of the elements immediately follow the reception and distribution of them: which continue still in their natural substances of bread and wine, though they are changed, as to their virtue and efficacy, into the sacramental body and blood of Christ. Archdeacon Yardley.

While the minister and others are receiving the Communion, those who are preparing to receive may employ the time they have to spare in reading some appropriate Scriptures, and meditations upon them. Bp. Wilson. Such as he will find in the "Short and plain instruction for the better understanding of the Lord's supper, with the necessary preparation required, &c.;" by the excellent prelate, whose name is annexed to the foregoing recommendation. Edit.

[x] — the Minister that delivereth the Cup] Where there are two or more ministers present, it is the custom for the chief minister, or for him that consecrates, to administer only the bread, and for another to follow and administer the cup. This is agreeable to an old rubrick in King Edward's first Liturgy, which orders, that "if there be a deacon or other priest, then shall he follow with the chalice: and as the priest ministereth the sacrament of the body, so shall he (for more expedition) minister the sacrament of the blood, in form before written." For our Church does not (with the Roman church) rob the people of half the sacrament, but administers to the laity as well as the clergy, under "both kinds." Wheatly.

Here is an express distinction between a priest and a deacon, who by the ancient canons of the Church was not to deliver the bread. Bp. Cosin.

[y] — and be thankful.] When each person has communicated, let him return to his seat, that he may not hinder others from coming to the altar. At the end of the service (see above, note u,) he will find proper meditations, wherewith to entertain himself until all have received the communion. Bp. Wilson.

Or, if he have sufficient time, he may remember, that since all our prayers are accepted for Christ's sake, now we have received Him, and are full of the apprehensions of his love, we may very affectionately in our hearts pray for all mankind, and for the whole Church; as also for any special blessings for this Church, for the king, the magistrates, ministers, and people thereof; and particularly for our neighbours and friends, relations, and acquaintance, especially for such as are sick or sorrowful, poor or distressed: and also for ourselves, for pardon, for grace, and courage to keep our vows: yea, if we have time, we may meditate of the baseness and danger of the ways we have renounced, of the wisdom and comfort of a holy life, the greatness of God's assistance, and the mercy of his acceptance, with the sweetness of his rewards. And further we may resolve upon such acts of charity to the souls and bodies of our brethren, as we will afterwards perform; and this will banish vain and impertinent thoughts, and keep our devotions alive till the priest have done the celebration; and then having most heartily wished that all the communicants may be accepted as well as ourselves, we must join in the Post-Communion. Dean Comber.

[a] When all have communicated, &c. — covering the same with a fair linen cloth.] Which by the ancient writers, and the Scotch Liturgy, in which this rubrick first appeared, is called the "Corporal," from its being spread over the body or consecrated bread, and sometimes the "Pall," I suppose for the same reason. The institution of it is ascribed to Eusebius, Bishop of Rome, who lived about the year 300. And that it was of common use in the Church in the fifth century, is evident from the testimony of Isidore Peleusiota, who also observes that the design of using it was to represent the body of our Saviour being wrapped in fine linen by Joseph of Arimathea. Wheatly.

[b] Then shall the Priest say the Lord's Prayer,] Our Saviour concluded this feast with prayers and hymns, Matt. xxvi. 30; John xvii. 1, &c.; and all churches have followed his example: and if we rise not from our common meals without prayer and thanksgiving, surely we must more solemnly use them before we depart from the Lord's table. And the first part of this office is the Lord's Prayer; it being very fit, that after we have received our Saviour into our hearts, the first words we speak should be his; to as many as receive Him, He gives power to become the sons of God, John i. 12. Wherefore we may now, upon good grounds, call God, "Our Father," and are obliged to desire his name may be "hallowed" and praised for all his kindness towards us: and if ever we be in a fit posture to wish his "kingdom" may "come," it is now when we have made our peace with Him: we have now such assurances that He always wills that which is for our good, that with intire submission we may say, O Lord, not my "will," but thine "be done:" He hath given us heavenly bread to feed our souls, and so we need not question but He will "give us" every day "our daily bread" to sustain our natural life: we have set forth the memory of that great propitiation, and now by the virtue of that sacrifice we may cheerfully ask the "forgiveness of our trespasses," and shall prevail the sooner, because in this feast of charity "we" have "forgiven" all them that have "trespassed against us:" we have vowed to forsake all evil ways, and so may reasonably desire to "be kept" from "temptation," and "delivered" from all kind of "evil;" and as well with respect to what He hath done for us already, as to our hopes of his hearing these requests, we must conclude with the Doxology, and acknowledge that his is "the kingdom, power, and glory," both now and "for ever, Amen." Dean Comber.

The Post-Communion, like the Ante-Communion, begins with the Lord's Prayer; and we can at no time repeat this prayer more properly, or more effectually, than when we have just commemorated the meritorious sufferings and death of its divine Author. The Doxology is here annexed, because this part of the office is principally eucharistical: all these devotions being designed as an act of praise, for the benefits received in the holy sacrament. Shepherd, Wheatly.

It was the institution of Christ and his apostles, according to St. Jerome, that the Lord's Prayer was said at the celebration of the sacrament: and it seems from St. Ambrose and St. Austin, that by the Church it has been ever used in this place. Bp. Cosin.

[c] — the People repeating after him every Petition.] So says the rubrick. And if the Church did ever devise a thing fit and convenient, what more than this? that when together we have all received those heavenly mysteries, wherein Christ imparts Himself to us, and gives visible testification of our blessed communion with Him, we should, in hatred of all heresies, factions, and schisms, declaredly approve ourselves united as brethren in one, by offering up with all our hearts and tongues, that most effectual prayer, "Our Father, &c.;" in which we profess ourselves sons of the same Father, and in which we pray for God's pardon, no otherwise than as we forgive them that trespass against us: for which cause communicants have ever used it, and we at that time do shew we use it, yea, every syllable of it, as communicants, saying it together with one consent and voice. Bp. Sparrow.

[d] After shall be said as followeth.] After the Lord's Prayer, the priest offers up the sacrifice of the holy eucharist, or the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving for the whole Church, as in all old Liturgies it is appointed; and together with that is offered up that most acceptable sacrifice of ourselves, souls and bodies, devoted to God's service. Of which see Rom. xii. Bp. Sparrow.

For the further exercise and improvement of our devotion, the Church, in imitation of ancient Liturgies, hath provided two larger forms of prayer; the first of which is principally designed for the practice of that advice of St. Paul, who "beseeches us by the mercies of God to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, as our reasonable service," Rom. xii. 1. Upon which account the fathers esteemed it one great part of this office to dedicate ourselves to God; and this prayer is the direction for doing that duty, which is very seasonable to be done just now: for since Christ hath put us in mind of his infinite love in giving Himself for us, and in this sacrament hath given Himself to us, and we have chosen Him for our Lord, and solemnly vowed ourselves his servants; now it is most just and reasonable we should give ourselves wholly to Him in this proper and pertinent form. Dean Comber.

In this prayer "we intirely," that is, with our whole hearts, "desire" Him, "to accept this our sacrifice," of service, of praise, and thanksgiving, which we have offered up to Him: begging leave at the same time to "offer up ourselves, body and soul," as dedicated to his will: which is the great end of all our devotions: yet never mentioned in the Romish mass-book. We pray also once more for the whole Church: and lastly for our fellow-communicants, as well as ourselves, that we may be "fulfilled," that is, filled full, and, as the Psalmist expresses it, "abundantly satisfied, with God's grace and heavenly benediction." Abp. Secker.

[e] — our sacrifice of praise] The ancients called the whole Communion "the sacrifice of praise," as our Church here doth: whereas the Romanists only call it a sacrifice, without any other addition. But it is not most humbly beseeching thee to grant, that by the merits and death of thy Son Jesus Christ, and through faith in his blood, we and all thy whole Church may obtain remission of our sins, and all other benefits of his passion. And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves[f], our souls, and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice unto thee; humbly beseeching thee, that all we, who are partakers of this holy Communion, may be fulfilled with thy grace and heavenly benediction. And although we be unworthy, through our manifold sins, to offer unto thee any sacrifice, yet we beseech thee to accept this our bounden duty and service; not weighing our merits, but pardoning our offences, through Jesus Christ our Lord; by whom[g], and with whom, in the unity of the Holy Ghost, all honour and glory be unto thee, O Father Almighty, world without end. Amen.

the sacrifice of Christ which we here speak of; for that is always pleasing to God, and was absolutely perfect: but it is our own peace-offering, in commemoration thereof, in which there have been many failings, and therefore we desire and beg that it may be accepted in mercy. Dean Comber. In this regard, and in divers others also, the Eucharist may, by allusion and analogy, be fitly called "a sacrifice," and the Lord's table "an altar;" the one relating to the other: though neither of them can be strictly and properly so termed. It is the custom of Scripture to describe the service of God under the New Testament, be it either internal or external, by the terms which otherwise belonged to the Old: as, immolation, offering, sacrifice, and altar. So the evangelical prophet Isaiah, foretelling the glory and amplitude of the Christian Church, speaketh of God's altar which shall be there, upon which "an acceptable offering shall be made," Isa. lx. 4, &c. See also Rom. xv. 16; Phil. i. 17; Heb. xiii. 10. And indeed the sacrament of the Eucharist carries the name of a sacrifice, and the table, whereon it is celebrated, an altar of oblation, in a far higher sense, than any of their former sacrifices did, which were but the types and figures of those services, that are performed in recognition and memory of Christ's one sacrifice, once offered upon the altar of his cross. The prophecy of Malachi concerning the Church under the New Testament, (see Mal. i. 10,) applied by the doctors of the Roman church to their proper sacrifice, as they call it, of the mass, is interpreted and applied by the ancient fathers, sometimes in general to all the acts of our Christian religion, and sometimes in particular to the Eucharist: that is, the act of our prayers and thanksgiving for the sacrifice of Christ once made for us upon the cross, as here we use in the Church of England. The Church of England therefore herein followeth the holy Scripture and the ancient fathers. See also Ps. l. 14; Hos. xiv. 2; Heb. xiii. 15; Rev. v. 8; viii. 3; Ps. cxli. 2. Bp. Cosin.

[f] — here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves.] The sacrifices under the law were irrational creatures; that is, such creatures as were not endowed with reason: and they were also killed before they were offered: but when we offer ourselves to God as a sacrifice, we offer "reasonable and living" sacrifices; which are also "holy," because all Christians are separated from the world, and made holy, by their covenant in baptism. Now by offering ourselves as "reasonable, holy, and lively," that is, living "sacrifices," we comply with St. Paul's exhortation, who says, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable, to God, which is your reasonable service," Rom. xii. 1. Dr. Bennet.

As if it were said, Here at thy altar, where thy Son hath given Himself to us, "we" humbly and sincerely "offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves" wholly and entire, even all the faculties of "our souls, and" all the members of our "bodies," solemnly dedicating them and resigning them up most absolutely to thy service, and vowing them "to be a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice unto thee;" for we are not now to kill and offer any more brute creatures, as they did under the Law; but we must offer up ourselves to be pure and holy, by abstaining from all sin, and to be lively and active in every good work, which is our rational way of owning the divine mercies under the Gospel, and justly styled "our reasonable service:" we consecrate therefore our understandings and wills, our affections and passions, our senses and all our powers of body and soul, to be employed in thy commandments for ever; O Lord, accept us, and take possession of us, that we may never have any other master. Dean Comber.

[g] — through Jesus Christ our Lord; by whom, &c.] We know our own services to be altogether imperfect: wherefore we here declare, that our only hope of acceptance and pardon is "through Jesus Christ," by whom we are directed to offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, Heb. xiii. 15; as we here do in this doxology, which comes very near to the ancient form used in this office, and glorifies the whole Trinity, from every Person whereof we have now received peculiar testimonies of grace and favour: and if we do it with a devotion proportionable to the great obligations now laid upon us, it will then be accepted according to our desire. Dean Comber.

[h] Or this] For the help of devotion, the Church hath added another form to be used when we have more than ordinary comfort in receiving: for as the other consists chiefly of vows, so doth this of praises and thanksgivings, yet so, as here is a very earnest prayer for perseverance, which is highly necessary after the sacrament. The parts of which prayer are, a are very members incorporate in the mystical body of thy Son, which is the blessed company of all faithful people; and are also heirs through hope of thy everlasting kingdom, by the merits of the most precious death and passion of thy dear Son. And we most humbly beseech thee, O heavenly Father, so to assist us with thy grace, that we may continue in that holy fellowship, and do all such good works as thou hast prepared for us to walk in; through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

hearty thanksgiving directed to God the Father; and an humble petition for his grace, to make us persevere, and be fruitful in good works. Dean Comber.

[i] Then shall be said or sung.] The angelical hymn, as it is commonly called, or "Glory be to God on high, &c." wherein the ecclesiastical hierarchy does admirably imitate the heavenly, singing that at the sacrament of his body, which the angels did at the birth of his body. And as good reason there is, to sing this for Christ's being made "one with us" in the Sacrament, as for his being made "one of us" at his birth: and if ever we be fit to sing this angels' song, it is then, when we draw nearest to the estate of angels, namely, at the receiving of the Sacrament. Bp. Sparrow.

After such high favours, and such great blessings received, it is fit and necessary we should express our joy; and how can we welcome our Saviour into our hearts more properly than by the hymn which the angels welcomed him into the world withal, Luke ii. 14; and by that descant the primitive doctors made upon it, to suit it to this ordinance, where it hath been sung in all churches from the beginning? Dean Comber.

To conclude this office with an hymn is so direct an imitation of our Saviour's practice, that it hath ever been observed in all churches and ages. And though the forms may differ, yet this is as ancient as any now extant. The former part of it is of an heavenly original, being sung by angels at our Saviour's nativity; and was from thence transcribed into the oriental Liturgies, especially St. James's, where it is thrice repeated. The latter part of it is ascribed to Telesphorus about the year of Christ 139; and the whole hymn, with very little difference, is to be found in the Apostolical Constitutions, and was established to be used in the church-service by the fourth council of Toledo about a thousand years ago. In the present Roman missal it stands in the beginning of this office, as it does also in the first Common Prayer of King Edward VI., where it immediately follows the "Collect for purity;" though it now appears to be placed much more properly at the close of the Communion, when every devout communicant being full of gratitude, and longing for an opportunity to pour out his soul in the praises of God, cannot have a more solemn and compact form of words to do it in than this. In the Greek church it makes a constant part of the morning devotions, as well upon ordinary days, as upon Sundays and holy-days; only with this difference, that upon ordinary days it is only "read," whereas upon more solemn times it is appointed to be sung. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

As our blessed Lord sang an hymn with his disciples after the passover, in imitation of whom the whole Christian church hath used one in commemorating "our passover, sacrificed for us," we use one likewise, as ancient, in substance, as the fourth century at least. It were better indeed, that we sung it: if there did not, alas, often want numbers, and generally skill. The beginning of it is the song of the holy angels in St. Luke; on which foundation we proceed to "glorify" God, and "give thanks to him for his great glory;" meaning, that of his goodness, wisdom, and power, displayed in the work of redemption; fervently beseeching "the Son and Lamb of God," that his sufferings to "take away the sins of the world," and his "sitting at the right hand of the Majesty on high," Heb. i. 3, may bring down "mercy upon us;" and acknowledging, that we are all impure, "He only is holy:" men and angels are servants, "He only is the Lord; He only with the Holy Ghost" united to the "Father in glory" unspeakable "is most high" above all. Abp. Secker.

[k] — We praise thee, we bless thee, &c.] We are taught with many words to express our gratitude and joy, in imitation of those celestial hymns recorded in the Revelation, vii. 12; v. 13: as also because every word here used is highly pertinent, and hath its peculiar signification. We "praise" God, by setting forth his greatness; we "bless" Him, by declaring his goodness; we "worship" Him with our bodies; we "glorify" Him with our mouths; we "give him thanks" with our hearts, "for the great glory," which He hath gotten to Himself by these his mercies towards us. And further the adding of so many words well expresses the vehemency of our affections, and shews that we are full of admiration and delight. Dean Comber.

[l] O Lord, the only-begotten Son &c.] As the Father is the primary object, so the Son is the subject of the angelick praises: wherefore we here glorify Him, who is remembered and represented, given by God, and received by us, in this mystery. And, repeating all the names belonging to his person, to his nature, and his offices, we thereby declare the majesty and glory, the mercy and goodness, of Him whom we have now accepted for our Lord and King. And, whilst we are setting out his glories, we also invoke Him by all these honourable and endearing names, that He will employ his power, his interest, and merits, to make our persons and our prayers acceptable. Dean Comber.

1 Tim. vi. 15.

¶ Then the Priest (or Bishop if he be present[o]) shall let them depart with this Blessing[p].

THE peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge Phil. iv. 7.

[m] For thou only art holy;] Those that overcome the beast, and sing the song of Moses and the Lamb, use this amongst other expressions, "For thou only art holy," Rev. iv. 4. These words we here apply to our Saviour, as distinguished, not personally, but essentially: that is, not as He is the second Person in the Trinity, for God the Father, and God the Holy Ghost, are also as holy as God the Son, and all Three together are the only holy One; but as He is a Being uncreated and infinitely excellent above all other beings; as He is God Himself, and for that reason supremely holy, or the only holy One. Dr. Bennet.

[n] — thou only art the Lord;] God is called "the blessed and only Potentate," 1 Tim. vi. 15; that is, the only Lord: and consequently this appellation belongs to our Saviour Christ as He is God, in the same sense as He is the only holy One: namely, not personally, but essentially. Dr. Bennet.

There are indeed holy angels and saints; and there are lords many, 1 Cor. viii. 5. Yet none of these have a propriety in this title, because their holiness is imperfect and derived: only Jesus is holy in and of Himself, and of his holiness all others do receive. "He is holy and hallowed, because he halloweth and sanctifieth us," as the Liturgy of St. James paraphraseth. "He only is the Lord," saith St. Augustine, "who hath no other Lord above him." For He only with the Holy Ghost is equal to the Father, "God blessed for ever." And this is the reason, why we exalt Him so highly, and pass by the mediation of saints and angels; because none is so holy, none so mighty, none so high in the favour of God, nor none so gracious and loving to us, as Jesus is. This we acknowledge therefore with all possible joy and triumph; and it is a mighty rejoicing to our spirits, that He, who hath given Himself for us, and is come to dwell with us, is so high and magnificent. Dean Comber.

[o] Then the Priest (or Bishop if he be present) &c.] The people were always dismissed from this ordinance by a solemn blessing pronounced by the bishop if present, or, in his absence, by the priest: and none were allowed to depart till this was given by the one or the other. Wheatly.

This benediction is a peculiar of the bishop's office, if present; because "the less is blessed of the greater," Heb. vii. 7. L'Estrange.

[p] — with this Blessing.] Our Lord took his leave of his disciples with a blessing, Luke xxiv. 50; and the blessing He left them was his peace, John xiv. 27; the form of giving which is set down by St. Paul, Phil. iv. 7; from whom the primitive Church took this form, ordering the bishop (if present) to pronounce it, and all to stay till this blessing was given, which is a solemn desire that the peace of God may remain in us, and his blessing be upon us for ever. Dean Comber.

In this solemn and affectionate form of dismission, most of which is taken from the words of holy writ, the minister of Christ, in pronouncing it, prays, that "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding," that inward sense of our Maker's goodness to us, which even now is delightful, beyond the conception of those, who have not experienced it; and shall hereafter be so heightened, as vastly to exceed the present conceptions of the best of us; may "keep our hearts and minds," our judgments and affections, "in the knowledge and love of God and his Christ:" and that every "blessing" of the holy Trinity may be distributed "amongst us, and remain with us always." Abp. Secker. The form of this Christian blessing runs in the name of the three Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, into which we were baptized: and therefore seemingly most proper for the use of the Christian church. Dr. Bisse.

Our final blessing is taken out of Scripture. The former part is evidently borrowed from St. Paul; and the latter is a Christian paraphrase, or rather summary, of the form originally delivered to Moses, Numb. vi. 22—25. St. Paul, after directing us to address God in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, immediately adds, "And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." The words of St. Paul, had they been purposely designed, could scarce have been better suited to form a conclusion for this office. We have, according to his direction, offered up prayers, supplications, and thanksgivings to the divine Majesty, and before our departure the minister of Christ pronounces upon us the blessing of peace.

This benediction of the priest is not to be considered merely as a prayer. It is likewise an absolution; an assurance of blessing and of peace: for God Himself will bless those that are duly qualified to receive the sacerdotal blessing; and the benedictions and absolutions, which the ambassadors of Christ ministerially pronounce upon earth, will be ratified in heaven. Shepherd.

The people should receive this blessing as coming from God Himself, with all imaginable devotion. Bp. Wilson. And should most fervently desire of God to ratify and confirm it. Dean Comber.

And they should take care not to repeat it after the priest, for this is not only a mark of great ignorance, but it is an improper usurpation upon the priestly office: the rubrick ordering the blessing to be given "by the priest, or bishop if present:" so that it ought not to be pronounced by a deacon, much less by the people. And farther it may be observed, that the priest himself, if the bishop be present, is to become as one of the congregation; and, instead of standing up to give the blessing, ought like the rest to receive it on his knees from the bishop; according to that undoubted maxim, "without all contradiction the less is blessed of the greater," Heb. vii. 7. In case therefore of the bishop being present, which is supposed to happen in all cathedral churches, the people in pronouncing the blessing invade the office of the bishop himself: and the greater is blessed, not of the less, as of the priest, but even of the least, of the lowest of the people: a practice this, which, wherever it prevails, inverts the order established by reason as well as religion, and is the grossest of absurdities. Dr. Bisse.

The blessing was so highly esteemed in the primitive times, that none durst go out of the church, till they had received it. And when they received it, they knelt or bowed down their heads. This was done in imitation of the Jewish manner, which is thus described: "When the service was finished, the high priest lifted up his hands over the congregation, to give the blessing of the Lord with his lips; and they bowed themselves to worship the Lord, that they might receive the blessing from the Lord, the Most High," Ecclus. i. 21. Thus did the Jews: for they considered it as the blessing, not of man, but of God. They had indeed his express promise for it, when given in the publick worship. "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak to Aaron and his sons, saying, On this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel: The Lord bless thee," and so on, Numb. vi. 22, 23: "and they shall put my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them."

The same authority to bless, yea, and greater authority than this, seems to be given to the ministers of the Gospel. "For into whatsoever house they shall enter, and shall say, Peace be to this house; if the son of peace be there," that is, according to interpretation, if he, that dwells there, does not hinder it by his wickedness, or reject it through unbelief, "then their peace shall be upon him." If not, if he be not capable nor worthy of their blessing, "it shall turn to them again," Luke x. 6. And if this virtue be annexed to the blessing of the bishop or priest, so as to go and come with it, when bestowed upon a private house, how much more, when dispensed in the house of God in his name and by his command, over the holy congregation! As many of them doubtless as are "sons of peace," as are capable and desirous thereof, upon them shall the blessing of the minister rest, but from them that are not, that either neglect or reject it, "his blessing shall turn to him again." Dr. Bisse.

Here, before we conclude the office, let us reflect upon the admirable contrivance of it, and the beautiful harmony and order of its parts. After we have premised the Lord's Prayer, the Collect that follows it, the Commandments, the Prayer for the Sovereign, the Collect for the day, the Epistle, the Gospel, and Nicene Creed, which are as it were the introduction to this solemnity; we proceed to the offertory or contribution of our alms. And indeed it highly becomes us, when we approach the holy table to partake of God's unspeakable kindness towards lost mankind, to prepare our way by liberality to the poor, that is, to our Saviour Himself: for He accepts of what we give to his distressed servants as a mercy shewn to his own person. Then we offer the excellent prayer for the Church militant, than which nothing can more effectually express our most fervent charity towards all our fellow-Christians. By these steps we ascend to the divine mystery, and enter upon the sublimer parts of the office. Our hearts being raised to the highest pitch of religious fervour by the exhortation and the short address annexed to it, we pour forth a most pathetick form of confession, containing also an earnest petition for pardon; and for the assistance of God's grace in order to our greater spiritual improvement for the future. Upon this the priest pronounces the Absolution; and, to strengthen our hope, adds divers comfortable texts of holy Scripture. Being thus filled with the sense of God's infinite mercy, and exalted almost to rapture and ecstasy, we immediately break forth into a seraphick hymn of praise and thanksgiving. Then we acknowledge our own unworthiness to taste of this holy feast, and humbly beseech God to make us worthy communicants; and so, the elements being consecrated, we partake of them. Then we offer up the Lord's Prayer, which is the badge of our discipleship: and having returned thanks for the inestimable blessing of the holy Eucharist, and subjoined the angelick hymn, than which nothing can be more sublime and heavenly, together with one or more short collects at the discretion of the minister, we are dismissed with a solemn blessing. Dr. Bennet.

Thus we have gone through our publick service from the one end to the other, from the Exhortation to the Blessing; and we may well close with that exclamation of the prophet concerning Sion, "How great is its goodness, and how great is its beauty!" And we ought not to omit that memorable testimony, worthy not only to be fixed upon record, but to be engraven on the horns of the altar, which was given to our Common Prayer by the King and Parliament in that act which established the use of it: "That it was BY THE AID OF THE HOLY GHOST with uniform agreement concluded and set forth." May it ever enjoy the same testimony from their successors; and may they ever support, strengthen, and invigorate those laws, which have been placed as a fence about it; that no persons whatsoever presume under the highest penalties "to preach, declare, or speak any thing in derogation, depraving, or despising of the said book, or any thing therein contained, or any part thereof." Act for Uniform. 1 Eliz. Dr. Bisse.

[q] Collects to be said after the Offertory.] Lest there should be any thing left unasked in this excellent office, the Church hath added six Collects more, to be used at the minister's discretion: concerning which it may be observed, that they are plain and comprehensive, and that almost every sentence of them is taken out of the Bible; and they are as proper to be joined to any other office as to this. For which reason the rubrick allows them to be said "as often as occasion shall serve, after the Collects either of Morning or Evening Prayer, Communion, or Litany, by the discretion of the minister." Wheatly.

The titles are here given, that it may be known on what occasions to use them: and doubtless, if devout affections be brought with them, they may be useful to us all, and accepted by our heavenly Father. The first is a prayer For safety in all worldly changes: the second, For the preservation of our souls and bodies: the third, For a blessing on God's word: the fourth, For direction and success in all our undertakings: the fifth, For excusing the defects of our former prayers: the last, For the acceptance of all the rest of our supplications. Dean Comber.

[r] — after the Offertory, when there is no Communion,] Hence some have imagined, that "the prayer for the Church militant" is part of the offertory: because in the first rubrick, at the end of the whole office, that prayer is always to be used "on Sundays and other holy-days, if there be no Communion," and then one or more of these Collects are to follow. But the offertory only signifies the sentences that are read whilst the alms and other devotions of the people are collecting. To reconcile this difference it should be observed, that, by the first book of King Edward the Sixth, the prayer for Christ's church was never to be read, but when there was a Communion. So that then, if there was no Communion, these Collects were properly ordered to be said "after the offertory." But the Communion service being afterwards thrown into a different form, the prayer for the Church militant was added to that part of the service, which was ordered to be read "on Sundays and holy-days that had no Communion," without altering this rubrick. And this makes the rubrick before and the rubrick after these Collects a little inconsistent: however the difference is not much. For the Collects are still to be said "after the offertory," though not immediately after, as formerly, the prayers for the Church militant coming in between. Wheatly.

[s] Assist us mercifully, O Lord, &c.] In the Latin it is, "Adesto, Domine, supplicationibus nostris." So that to "assist mercifully in prayers" is to be mercifully present at them, or to be mercifully present to those who offer them. Now God is then said to be so present when he hears and receives them graciously. And accordingly our Church translates, "Adesto piis Ecclesiæ tuæ precibus," in the Collect for the twenty-third Sunday after Trinity, thus, "Be ready, we beseech thee, to hear the devout prayers of thy Church." And in the Collect for the first Sunday after Trinity, "adesto propitius invocationibus nostris," is rendered, "mercifully accept our prayers." Dr. Bennet.

[t] — chances of this mortal life,] Some have objected against this phrase, as implying somewhat irreligious. But our Saviour hath not scrupled to say, "And by chance there came down a certain priest that way," Luke x. 31. Abp. Secker.

When we apprehend any danger by reason of the sudden changes and sad accidents to which we and all the world are liable, there are two main particulars which we are to beg of God for our security. First, that He will always assist our prayers. Secondly, that He will direct us toward the right end. For so long as we can pray fervently, and are going on in the right course to heaven, we are in no danger, whatsoever may happen. Dean Comber.

[u] O Almighty Lord, &c.] The former prayer mentions the evils, from which we would be defended; this declares what it is which we desire should be preserved: it is grounded upon St. Paul's prayer, 1 Thess. v. 23, and may fitly be used when we fear or feel any temptation to sin; as the other, when we apprehend any danger. For so long as our hearts and bodies are kept in the ways of righteousness, we may be assured of universal and continual safety. Dean Comber.

[x] Grant, we beseech thee, Almighty God, &c.] This short Collect is of excellent use, after the Sermon or Lessons in publick, as also when the Scripture hath been read in private. And because it is not the hearing of God's word with our ears, but the engrafting in our heart, James i. 21, which makes it powerful to our salvation, we ought always after it to pray as here: first, that it may take root in our hearts; secondly, that it may spring forth in our lives. Dean Comber.

[y] Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings, &c.] "It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure," Phil. ii. 13. His grace therefore must go before us in all good actions, and dispose us for the performance of them. This is what we call preventing grace, that is, grace going before us. For to "prevent" in old English signifies, to go before. Accordingly the Church here begs Almighty God to "prevent" or go before "us in all our doings with his most gracious favour," that is, to give us his preventing grace, to prepare us for good actions, and that, our hearts being influenced thereby, all our doings may be good. Dr. Bennet.

In this prayer, which is frequently used before sermon, some have stumbled at the expression, "Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings:" because preventing most commonly signifies hindering. But the original meaning, and the true one here, is, Go before us: which may indeed be, either to further us by opening the way, or to obstruct us by stopping it. But surely it can no more be doubted, which we intend, than what David intended, when he said, "Thou shalt prevent him with the blessings of goodness;" and again, "The God of my mercy shall prevent me," Ps. xxi. 3; lix. 10. Abp. Secker.

ance to further us, and when we have done, we must wait for his blessing to crown all with success: all which we are taught to do in this compendious and pious form, which is never unseasonable, but very fit to be used, especially in the morning, before we begin work. Dean Comber.

In the first part of this godly prayer, we have the state of the question concerning the concurrence of grace and free will, more pithily and more plainly set down, than in any controversy-writers, whether in the Romish or Reformed churches. The sum is, that without God's preventing grace, or peculiar disposition of his favourable providence, we cannot do any good works at all, though but civilly or morally good, as a learned Jesuit acknowledgeth; nor any works spiritually good without God's assistant grace, or gifts of the Spirit inherent in us. This is that, which is in the same prayer better expressed by "the furtherance of his continual help." In the latter clause of the prayer, "that in all our works begun, continued, and ended in thee, we may glorify thy holy name, and finally by thy mercy obtain everlasting life," we have all, I am persuaded, that the Romish church would have said concerning the necessity of good works, whether unto salvation or justification; and all again, that the Protestants have said, or can say, against the Romish church, concerning justification by faith only, without works. When we pray "that we may glorify God's name by our good works," this argues their necessity to salvation, if not to justification. And when we pray, that, after we have glorified God's name by our good works, "we may attain everlasting life, by God's mercy in Christ, and through Christ;" this is an argument most concludent, that we must not rely upon, or put our confidence in, the best works which we do, though we do them continually; but in God's mercies, and Christ's merits only. And this is the full and lively expression of the Apostle's meaning, when he saith, "We are justified by faith in Christ alone." Dr. Jackson.

[z] Almighty God, the fountain of all wisdom, &c.] When St. Paul had asked all he could for his Ephesians, he commits them to Him that was able to do more for them than he could ask or think. And from thence we have taken this suppletory prayer; being very proper for the beginning or ending of publick or private supplications; because it sets before us, first, the incomparable wisdom of God: secondly, our own imperfections: and thence deduceth, 1. a general petition for compassion, as to all the defects of our prayers; 2. a particular request for the adding of that which we omitted.

This prayer is very proper to be said to ourselves, when we kneel down at our first coming into the church, to prayers. Dean Comber.

[a] — our ignorance in asking;] That is, in asking what is most proper and convenient for us. For we too often ask amiss, because we do not understand what is best for ourselves. Dr. Bennet.

[b] —for our blindness we cannot ask,] Here it may be said, that though we are indeed so blind, that we do not know what particulars are most proper and convenient for us; yet we often ask for what is most proper and convenient for us in general, without descending to particulars. How then can it be said, that there are some things, which for our blindness we cannot ask? See page 203, note g. Dr. Bennet.

[c] Almighty God, who hast promised, &c.] There are three qualifications of an acceptable prayer. 1. That it be made in Christ's name, John xiv. 13; xvi. 23. 2. That it be agreeable to God's will, 1 John v. 14. 3. That it be asked in faith, Matt. xxi. 22; James v. 15. Now because it were imprudent to expect to be heard upon other terms, the Church hath here put them all together in this finishing prayer, which is very properly used after any of our prayers, especially the common prayers, which if we have said in faith, we are sure the petitions are according to God's will, and made in the name of Christ. Dean Comber.

[d] Upon the Sundays and other Holy-days &c.] In the primitive church, while Christians continued in their strength of faith and devotion, those who were qualified generally communicated once every day; which custom continued till after St. Augustine's time: but afterward, when charity grew cold, and devotion faint, this custom was broken off; and they fell from every day to Sundays and holy-days only, and thence at Antioch to once a year and no more.

In regard of this neglect, canons were made by several councils to oblige men to receive three times a year at least, namely, at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, (probably in conformity to the ancient Jews, who were commanded by God Himself to appear before the Lord at the three great feasts that correspond to these; namely, "in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles,") and those, that neglected to communicate at those seasons, were censured and anathematized.

At the Reformation our Church took all the care she could to reconcile her members to frequent Communion. And therefore in the first Common Prayer Book of King Edward VI. it was ordered, that "upon Wednesdays and Fridays, though there were none to communicate with the priest, yet (after the Litany ended) the priest should put upon him a plain alb or surplice, with a cope, and say all things at the altar, (appointed to be said at the celebration of the Lord's Supper,) until after the Offertory. And the same order was to be used all other days, whensoever the people were accustomably assembled to pray in the church, and none were disposed to communicate with the priest." From whence it appears they took it for granted, that there would always be a sufficient number of communicants upon every Sunday and holy-day at the least; so that they could not so much as suppose there would be no Communion upon any of those days. But it seems they feared that upon other days there might sometimes be none to communicate with the priest, and so no Communion: and therefore they ordered, that, if it should so happen for a whole week together, yet nevertheless upon Wednesdays and Fridays in every week so much should be used of the Communion-service as is before limited. But afterwards, as piety grew colder and colder, the Sacrament began to be more and more neglected, and by degrees quite laid aside on the ordinary week-days. And then the Church did not think it convenient to appoint any of this service upon any other days than Sundays and holy-days. But upon those days she still requires that ("although there be no Communion, yet) all shall be said that is appointed at the Communion, until the end of the general prayer, [For the whole state of Christ's Church militant here on earth,] together with one or more of the Collects at the end of the Communion-office, concluding with the Blessing."

One reason of which order seems to be, that the Church may still shew her readiness to administer the Sacrament upon these days; and so that it is not hers nor the minister's, but the people's fault, if it be not administered.

But another reason why so much of this service is ordered to be read, though there be no Communion, is, because there are several particular things in that part of it, which ought to be read, as well to those who do not communicate, as to those who do. As first, the Decalogue or Ten Commandments of Almighty God, the supreme Lawgiver of the world, which it is requisite the people should often hear and be put in mind of, especially upon those days which are immediately dedicated to his service. Secondly, the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, proper to all Sundays and holy-days, without which those festivals could not be distinguished either from one another, or even from ordinary days, nor consequently celebrated so as to answer the end of their institution. Thirdly, the Nicene Creed, wherein the divinity of our blessed Saviour is asserted and declared, and therefore very proper to be used on those days which are kept in memory of Him and of his holy apostles, by whom that doctrine, together with our whole religion grounded upon it, was planted and propagated in the world. Fourthly, the Offertory, or select sentences of Scripture, one or more of which are to be read to stir up the congregation to offer unto God something of what He hath given them, as an acknowledgment that they receive from Him all they have; which, howsoever it be now neglected, the people ought to be put in mind of at least every Lord's day, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Fifthly, the prayer for the "whole state of Christ's Church militant here on earth," in which we should all join as fellow-members of the same body, especially upon the great festivals of the year, which are generally celebrated by the whole Church we pray for. Most of these things made up the "Missa Catechumenorum" of the ancient church, that is, that part of the service at which the Catechumens, who were not admitted to the reception of the Eucharist, were allowed to be present. And in our own congregations, when there is a Communion, those who do not communicate never depart till the end of the Nicene Creed, for the above said reasons; which shews that there is nothing in that part of the service, but what may very properly be used upon any Sunday and holy-day when there is no Communion. Nor is this a practice of our own Church alone, but such as is warranted both by Greeks and Latins. Socrates tells us, that in Alexandria upon Wednesdays and Fridays the Scriptures were read and expounded by their teachers, and all things were done in the Communion, but only consecrating the mysteries. And, as for the Latin church, Durandus gives direction how the Communion-service might be read without any Communion. Wheatly.

[e] And there shall be no celebration of the Lord's Supper, except &c.] This and the next rubrick were provided, to prevent the solitary masses, which had been introduced by the church of Rome, where the priest says mass, and receives the Sacrament himself, though there be none to communicate with him: which our Church disallows, not permitting the priest to consecrate the elements, unless he has "three at least" to communicate with him, because our Saviour seems to require "three" to make up a congregation. Bp. Cosin, Wheatly.

In the primitive church it is most plain, both by the canons of the old councils, and by the writings of the ancient fathers, that some part of the people at least never failed to communicate with the priest. Bp. Overall.

[f] And in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, &c.] How zealous the Church still is in desiring to bring her members to communicate oftener than she can obtain, is apparent from this injunction: and from her farther requiring "every parishioner" in general "to communicate at the least three times in the year, of which Easter to be one;" because at that time Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, and by his death (which we commemorate in this Sacrament) obtained for us everlasting life. Wheatly.

[g] — that the Bread be such as is usual to be eaten;] This rubrick is set down in opposition to the practice of the Greek and Roman churches, in late ages, to use wafers. For it is certain that our Saviour, in delivering the Sacrament to his disciples, used the common bread. And there is no trace in antiquity of wafers being used, till the eleventh century. Dr. Nicholls.

[h] And if any of the Bread and Wine remain unconsecrated, &c.] In the primitive times the bread and wine designed for the consecration, were a part of the offerings, which the clergy likewise had a share in: therefore our Church has restored the remaining part of them to the ancient proprietors, by ordering "the curate to have it to his own use." And this was particularly injoined by the old canons of the Church. Dr. Nicholls.

Though it hath not been actually consecrated, yet, by its being dedicated and offered to God, it ceases to be common, and therefore properly belongs to the minister, as God's steward. Wheatly.

[i] — but if any remain of that which was consecrated, &c.] In the primitive church whatever of the consecrated elements were left, after all had communicated, were either reserved by the priest to be administered to infirm persons in cases of exigency, that they might not die without receiving the blessed Sacrament; or else were sent about to absent friends, as pledges and tokens of love and agreement in the unity of the same faith. But this custom, being abused, was afterwards prohibited by the Council of Laodicea, and then the remains began to be divided among the clergy; and sometimes the other communicants were allowed to partake with them, as is now usual in our Church, where care is taken to prevent the superstitious reservation of them formerly practised by the papists. However, it would be convenient if the Scotch rubrick were observed, by which, "to the end there may be little left, he that officiates is required to consecrate with the least." Wheatly.

The reservation, which is practised by the Roman church, is most intolerable, and tends to little else but to increase superstition, and to profane the holy elements. For they keep the Sacrament in the pix upon the altar, because God, as they term the host, may be present there, and that it may be worshipped by the people: they reserve it for processions, to be adored as it is carried along the streets: they reserve it as a sort of charm to put out fires; and to be a sort of mace, and a guard likewise to be carried before the pope, when he goes a journey. But because these abuses have happened, and may happen again, by the reservation of the elements, our Church has prudently ordered, that, as for what remains thereof, "the minister and the communicants shall reverently eat and drink the same." And though the Council of Trent do excommunicate us for it, yet we have the ancient canons of the Church on our side. Dr. Nicholls.

[k] And note, that every Parishioner shall communicate at the least three times &c.] See above, note f. "Every parishioner;" that is, all males as well as females, as soon as they are of proper age. Bp. Cosin. The Church ordering every parishioner to communicate at least three times in the year, is far from requiring them not to communicate oftener. Collis. God forbid that any good Christian should make this an excuse for receiving no oftener, if he has an opportunity! and woe be to that pastor, who will not give the well-disposed part of his flock more frequent opportunities of testifying their love to Jesus Christ; of increasing their graces, and securing their pardon and salvation! Bp. Wilson.

[l] — of which Easter to be one.] There is no time, at which it is not our duty to remember the most cruel death, which the Author of life underwent for us. This time of the year however peculiarly claims the remembrance of so great a mystery: which has not only been observed by all antiquity, and indeed from the very infancy of the Church; but the very reason also and nature of the thing requires, that at that time, when the work of our redemption was accomplished, we should dwell upon the contemplation of it with the strictest attention as well as the greatest devotion. Bp. Cosin. See page 145, note i.

[m] — And yearly at Easter every Parishioner shall reckon &c.] What are the "ecclesiastical duties" here mentioned is a matter of doubt: Bishop Stillingfleet supposes them to be a composition for personal tithes, (that is, the tenth part of every one's clear gains,) due at that time: but Bishop Gibson imagines them to be partly such duties or oblations, as were not immediately annexed to any particular office; and partly a composition for the "holy loaf," which the communicants were to bring and offer, and which is therefore to be answered at Easter, because at that festival every person was, even by the rubrick, bound to communicate. They both perhaps may have judged right: for by an Act of Parliament, in the second and third of Edward VI, such personal tithes are to be paid "yearly at or before the feast of Easter," and also "all lawful and accustomary offerings, which had not been paid at the Deputy or Deputies; and pay to them or him all Ecclesiastical Duties, accustomably due, then and at that time to be paid.

¶ After the Divine Service ended, the money given at the Offertory shall be disposed of to such pious and charitable uses, as the Minister and Church-wardens shall think fit. Wherein if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint.

"WHEREAS it is ordained in this Office[n] for the Administration "of the Lord's Supper, that the Communicants should receive the "same kneeling; (which order is well meant, for a signification of our "humble and grateful acknowledgment of the benefits of Christ therein "given to all worthy Receivers, and for the avoiding of such profanation "and disorder in the holy Communion, as might otherwise ensue;) yet, "lest the same kneeling should by any persons, either out of ignorance "and infirmity, or out of malice and obstinacy, be misconstrued and "depraved; It is hereby declared, That thereby no adoration is intended, "or ought to be done, either unto the Sacramental Bread or Wine there "bodily received, or unto any Corporal Presence of Christ's natural "Flesh and Blood. For the Sacramental Bread and Wine remain still "in their very natural substances, and therefore may not be adored; (for "that were idolatry, to be abhorred of all faithful Christians;) and the "natural Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ are in Heaven, and not "here; it being against the truth of Christ's natural Body to be at one "time in more places than one."

usual offering days, are to be paid for at the Easter next following." Wheatly.

[n] Whereas it is ordained in this Office &c.] This protestation concerning the gesture of "kneeling" at the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and explaining the Church's notion of the presence of Christ's body and blood in the same, was first added in the second book of King Edward, in order to disclaim any adoration to be intended by that ceremony "either unto the sacramental bread or wine there bodily received, or unto any real and essential presence there being, of Christ's natural flesh and blood." But upon Queen Elizabeth's accession this was laid aside. For it being the Queen's design (as I have already observed more than once) to unite the nation as much as she could in one faith; it was therefore recommended to the divines, to see that there should be no definition made against the aforesaid notion, but that it should remain as a speculative opinion not determined, but, in which every one might be left to the freedom of his own mind. And, being thus left out, it appears no more in any of our Common Prayers till the last review: at which time it was again added, with some little amendment of the expression and transposal of the sentences; but exactly the same throughout as to the sense; excepting that the words "real and essential presence" were thought proper to be changed for "corporal presence." For a "real presence" of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist, is what our Church frequently asserts in this very office of Communion, in her Articles, in her Homilies, and her Catechism: particularly in the two latter, in the first of which she tells us, "Thus much we must be sure to hold, that in the supper of the Lord there is no vain ceremony, no bare sign, no untrue figure of a thing absent;—but the communion of the body and blood of the Lord in a marvellous incorporation, which by the operation of the Holy Ghost is through faith wrought in the souls of the faithful, &c.; who therefore" (as she farther instructs us in the Catechism) "verily and indeed take and receive the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's supper." This is the doctrine of our Church in relation to the "real presence" in the sacrament, entirely different from the doctrine of transubstantiation, which she here, as well as elsewhere, disclaims: a doctrine which requires so many ridiculous absurdities and notorious contradictions to support it, that it is needless to offer any confutation of it in a Church, which allows her members the use of their senses, reason, Scripture, and antiquity. Wheatly.

THE MINISTRATION OF[o]

PUBLICK BAPTISM[p] OF INFANTS[q],

TO BE USED IN THE CHURCH[r].

¶ The people are to be admonished[s], that it is most convenient that Baptism should not be administered but upon Sundays, and other Holy-days, when the

[o] The minis'ration of—Baptism] Having now gone through the constant offices of the Church, we come in the next place to those, which are only to be used as there is occasion. And of these the office of baptism, being the first that can be regularly administered, as being the first good office that is done to us when we are born, is therefore properly set first. And here it will be necessary, in the first place, to say something of the sacrament itself.

1. "Water" therefore (which is the matter of it) hath so natural a property of cleansing, that it hath been made the symbol of "purification" by all nations, and used with that signification in the rites of all religions. The heathen used divers kinds of baptism to expiate their crimes; and the Jews baptize such as are admitted proselytes at large; and when any of those nations turn Jews, who are already circumcised, they receive them by baptism only: with which ceremony also they purified such heathen women as were taken in marriage by Jewish husbands. And this is that universal, plain, and easy rite, which our Lord Jesus adopted to be a mystery in his religion, and the sacrament of admission into the Christian church, Matt. xxviii. 19.

2. For can any thing better represent "regeneration" or "new birth," which our Saviour requires of us before we can become Christians, John iii. 3—7; than "washing with water." For as that is the first office done unto us after our natural births, in order to cleanse us from the pollutions of the womb, Ezek. xvi. 4; so when we are admitted into the Church, we are first baptized, (whereby the Holy Ghost cleanses us from the pollutions of our sins, and renews us unto God, Tit. iii. 5,) and so become, as it were, spiritual infants, and enter into a new life and being, which before we had not. For this reason, when the Jews baptized any of their proselytes, they called it their "new birth, regeneration," or "being born again." And therefore when our Saviour used this phrase to Nicodemus, He wondered that He, "being a master in Israel," should not understand Him. And even among the Greeks this was thought to have such virtue and efficacy, as to give new life as it were to those who were esteemed religiously dead. For if any one that was living was reported to be deceased, and had funeral solemnities performed upon this account; he was afterwards, upon his return, abominated of all men, as a person unlucky and profane, banished and excluded from all human conversation, and not so much as admitted to be present in the temples, or at the sacrifices of their gods, till he was born again, as it were, by being washed like a child from the womb.

And thus in the Christian church, by our Saviour's institution and appointment, those who are dead to God through sin, are born again by the "washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost," Tit. iii. 5. And how proper (by the way) "water" is to typify the "Holy Ghost," may be seen by consulting several texts of Scripture, where "water" and the "Blessed Spirit" are mentioned as corresponding one to another, Isa. xliv. 3; John iv. 14; vii. 37—39.

That the primitive Christians had this notion of baptism, may very fairly be asserted from those other rites which they anciently used in the celebration of this mystery: such as were giving the new-baptized "milk" and "honey," and "salt," which were all given to infants new-born, Isa. vii. 15; Ezek. xvi. 4; and putting upon them "white garments," to resemble the "swaddling" spoken of by Ezekiel, Ezek. xvi. 6.

All these, the ancient fathers tell us, were done to signify and represent spiritual birth and infancy, and out of reference to what was done at the natural birth of children. And therefore who can doubt but that the principal rite of "washing with water" (and the only one indeed ordained by our blessed Saviour) was chosen by Him for this same reason, to be the sacrament of our initiation; and that those, who brought in the other rites above mentioned, did so conceive of it, and for that reason took in those imitations? In some churches indeed they have now for a long time been discontinued: for they being only used as emblems, to signify that the persons were become as new-born babes, they were left off at such times, when, whole nations becoming Christians, there were hardly any other baptisms than of babes in a proper sense, who needed no such representations, to signify their infancy.

As to the form of baptism, our Saviour only instituted the essential part of it: namely, that it should be performed by a proper minister, with "water, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," Matt. xxviii. 19. But as for the rites and circumstances of the administration of it, he left them to the determination of the apostles and of the church. Yet without doubt a form of baptism was very early agreed upon, because almost all the churches in the world do administer it much after the same manner. The latter ages indeed had made some superfluous additions; but our Reformers removed them, and restored this office to a nearer resemblance of the ancient model, most number of people come together; as well for that the Congregation there present may testify the receiving of them that be newly baptized into the number than any other church can shew. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

As baptism is the sacrament of our initiation and entrance into Christianity, it may be demanded, Why hath not the office belonging to it the pre-eminence? Why is it not in our service-book inserted and marshalled before that of the Communion, this sacrament being in order of nature after that? The answer is, the Communion was, both in the primitive church and in the beginning of our Reformation, accounted the principal part of the daily service of God in publick. The eucharistical office being then so concomitant with the daily prayers, and baptism more rarely happening, the Church thought fit to make them contiguous in order, which were so frequent companions in use. L'Estrange.

P — Public Baptism of Infants.] The subjects of baptism are infants, or persons grown up, whence there are three several offices. First, publick baptism of healthful infants: and, since infants were circumcised, and not excepted by Christ, when He instituted baptism in the place of circumcision; since they need it to wash them from original sin, and were baptized in the primitive church; they ought to be baptized now, and to be brought to the church, that there may be many witnesses of this solemn act, and that others may be put in mind of their vow; as also because thus they are admitted members of our religious assemblies in the proper place. Secondly, when children are weak, there is a private and short office: and, since Christ makes this the ordinary means of entering into heaven, John iii. 5; parents and ministers must in this case be very careful to get them baptized, being assured this will wash away their original sin, and graft them into the body of Christ, so that if they die before they have done actual sin, they are undoubtedly saved; and if this be neglected by the fault of parents or ministers, (however God's infinite mercy may deal with the child,) they must answer for putting its salvation on so great a hazard. Now this short office is good and sufficient if the child die, but if it recover it must be brought to church afterwards; that the congregation may be certified it was rightly baptized, and the covenant solemnly entered into for it. The third office is for those of riper years, who are converted from being Jews, Turks, heathens, or from those sectaries, who with those infidels renounce baptism. These must be well catechized before they come, and spend some time in fasting and prayer to prepare them: because they answer for themselves, and make the covenant with their own mouths, so that their godfathers are only witnesses to the fact, and must be monitors to them to live according to their vow. Dean Comber.

The first of these three offices is that which is now most commonly used. For there being but very few adult persons, who now come over to the church, infants are generally the persons that are baptized: and they being appointed to be brought to church, except in danger of death, the publick form of baptism is there ordered to be used. Of this therefore it will be requisite to treat in order at large, and only to take notice of those particulars in the others, which differ from this. Wheatly.

Q — Baptism of Infants.] The office we are now upon being appointed for infants, it will be proper to premise a few general hints in relation to baptizing them. For that reason it should be here observed, that, as baptism was appointed for the same end that circumcision was, and did succeed in the place of it; it is reasonable that it should be administered to the same kinds of persons. For since God commanded infants to be circumcised, Gen. xvii. 12, it is not to be doubted, but that He would also have them baptized. Nor is it necessary that Christ should particularly mention children in his commission: it is sufficient that He did not except them: for that supposeth He intended no alteration in this particular, but that children should be initiated into the Christian as well as into the Jewish religion. And indeed if we consider the custom of the Jews at that time, it is impossible but that the apostles, to whom He delivered his commission, must necessarily understand Him as speaking of children, as well as of grown or adult persons. For it is well known that the Jews baptized, as well as circumcised, all proselytes of the nations or Gentiles, that were converted to their religion. And if any of those converts had "infant children" then born to them, they also were, at their father's desire, both circumcised and baptized, if males; or if females, only baptized, and so admitted as proselytes. The child's "inability" to declare or promise for himself was not looked upon as a bar against his reception into the covenant: but the desire of the father to dedicate him to God was accounted available and sufficient to justify his admission. Nor does the ceremony of baptism appear to have been used amongst the Jews upon such extraordinary occasions only; but it seems rather to have been an ordinary rite constantly administered by them, as well to their own, as to the children of proselytes; for the Mishna prescribes the solemn "washing," as well as the circumcision of the child, which I know not how to interpret, if it is not to be understood of a baptismal washing.

This therefore being the constant practice of the Jews, and our Saviour in his commission making no exception, but bidding his apostles "go and disciple all nations, baptizing them, &c.;" that is a sufficient argument to prove, that He intended no alteration in the objects of baptism, but only to exalt the action of baptizing to a nobler purpose, and a larger use. For when a commission is given in so few words, and there is no express direction what they should do with the infants of those who become disciples; the natural and obvious interpretation is, that they must do in that matter as they and the church in which they lived had always used to do. And we may assure ourselves, that had the apostles left children out of the covenant, and not received them as members of the church; the Jews, who took such care that their children should not want their own sacrament of initiation, would certainly have urged this as a great objection against the Christian religion. But we do not read of any such objection ever made, and therefore we may depend upon it, that the apostles gave them no room for it.

It is true indeed, it has been often objected to us, that the Scriptures make no express mention of the baptism of infants; to which we might reply, were the objection true, that neither do the Scriptures make any express mention of the alteration of the sabbath: and yet I believe there are but few of those who are of a different opinion from us, in the point before us, but who think the observation of the first day of the week is sufficiently authorized from the New Testament: and yet this is not more clearly implied than the other. We read in several places of whole "households being baptized," Acts xvi. 15. 33; 1 Cor. i. 16, without any of Christ's Church; as also because in the Baptism of Infants every Man present may be put in remembrance of his own profession made to God in his exception of their infants or children. Now it is very unlikely that there should be so many households without children; and therefore, since none such are excepted, we may conclude that they were baptized as well as the rest of the family: only the baptism of adult persons being more for the honour of the Christian religion, the holy writers chose only to name the chief persons baptized, thinking it sufficient to include their children and servants under the general terms of "all theirs," or "their households." And what makes it still more probable that children were really included in these terms, is that the Scriptures no where mention the deferring of the baptism of any Christian's child, or the putting of it off till he came to years of discretion. An argument that surely may as justly be urged against the adversaries to infant baptism as the silence of the Scriptures is against us. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

It has been a very ancient usage of the church, derived, as there is all the reason to think, from the apostolical times, that the children of believing parents should receive the benefit of Christian baptism. Origen makes this to be a part of apostolical tradition: "For this the church received as a tradition from the apostles, namely, to give baptism to infants." The writings of Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, and such other very early Christian writers, are so short, that one cannot expect to find every Christian usage therein: but I think that Pædobaptism could be hardly so generally used in the second and third century, unless it had been a custom in the former ages; nay, from the beginning of Christianity. For, if it had been a custom which had gradually grown up, some of those ancient writers would somewhere or other in their works have opposed it. There is not indeed any thing in the holy Scriptures, which does in express terms command it. But yet there do not want probable arguments drawn from thence, which do evince the truth thereof. For, since the Gospel is said to be "a better covenant" than the Jewish law, Heb. viii. 6: we cannot think, that an injunction to admit members into the church, only after years of discretion, should be so good an one, as that which allows them to come into it the eighth day after their birth, Gen. xvii. 12. When "Lydia was baptized and her household," Acts xvi. 15; and when St. Paul "baptized the household of Stephanas;" it is hard to be believed that there was never a child in those families. When the apostles were commanded to "baptize all nations," Matt. xxviii. 19; it is not to be supposed, but that the children therein were to be baptized, as well as the persons of riper age; unless a particular restriction had gone along with the command. Since the apostle assures us, that "they which are of the faith," that is, all Christians, "are children of Abraham," Gal. iii. 7; then surely their offspring have as good a title to partake of the federal rite of baptism whereby they may enter into the Christian covenant, as the carnal progeny of Abraham had to enter into the Jewish covenant by circumcision. When the apostle declares that the children of a believing parent "are holy," 1 Cor. vii. 14, it cannot be denied, but that, either they were actually entered into the Christian covenant, or that at least they had a title thereunto. Dr. Nicholls.

But when we come to the ancient fathers, who lived nighest to the apostolical times, and were the best judges both what was the practice of the very first ages, and how they understood the words of holy writ, when it was first delivered to the church; they do uniformly declare in favour of infant baptism. And surely they must be allowed to be competent witnesses of what was done by the apostles themselves. They could tell whether themselves or their fathers were baptized in their infancy, or whether it was the apostles' doctrine or advice to stay till they were grown up to years of maturity. But now in none of these do we meet with any thing that favours the opinion of our adversaries, but almost in all of them a direct confutation of their errors. In some of them we have express and direct mention of the practice of the church in baptizing infants; and even in those, in whose way it does not come to say any thing as to the age when baptism should be administered, we have frequent sentences from whence it may be inferred by way of implication. St. Clement, in the apostles' times, speaks of original sin as affecting infants: if so, then baptism is necessary to wash it away. Justin Martyr affirms, that baptism is to us in the stead of circumcision; from whence we may fairly conclude, that it ought to be administered to the same kinds of persons. In another place he mentions several persons, "who were discipled (or made disciples) to Christ, whilst children;" which plainly intimates, that children may be made "disciples," and consequently may be baptized. For the only objection of the Antipædobaptists against infant baptism is their incapacity of being made disciples. Now here they may perceive, that, if Justin rightly understood the word, children may be disciples. And it is worth observing, that the persons he here speaks of are said to be "sixty and seventy years old:" and therefore, if they were discipled and baptized when children, it follows they must be baptized even in the days of the apostles. But to proceed: Irenæus, who lived but a little after Justin, reckons infants among those who were "born again to God." A phrase, which in most ecclesiastical writers, and especially in Irenæus, is generally used to signify that "regeneration," which is the effect of baptism. And, that this must be the sense of the word here, is plain, because infants are not capable of being born again in any other sense. Tertullian again, a few years after him, speaks of infant baptism as the general practice of his time. In the next century, Origen, in several places, expressly assures us that "infants were baptized by the usage of the church." And lastly, about the year 250, (which was but 150 years after the apostles,) St. Cyprian, with sixty-six bishops in council with him, declared all unanimously, that none were to be hindered from baptism and the grace of God: "Which rule," saith he, "as it holds for all, so we think it more especially to be observed in reference to infants, and persons newly born." The same might be shewn from all the other fathers of the three first centuries, who all speak of it as a doctrine, settled and established from the beginning of Christianity, without once questioning or opposing it; which certainly they would have done in some or other of their works, had they known it to have been an innovation, contrary to the doctrine or practice of the apostles. Dr. Nicholls, Wheotly.

[r] — to be used in the Church.] In the very early times of Christianity, whilst the faithful were under a state of persecution, there was no settled place of administering the rite of baptism. The apostles baptized in ponds and rivers; and in any other place, where there was convenience of water. Thus Philip baptized the Eunuch in a watery place, which they met with accidentally in the road, Acts viii. 38. But the apostles likewise began a custom in their time, of baptizing in houses: and so it should seem that St. Paul was baptized, Acts ix. 17, 18; there being no mention of any river: probably the water which was about the house, serving for that occasion. The same seems to be the case with the jailor, who was converted by St. Paul, and was "baptized, he and all his, straightway," Acts xvi. 33. This custom of baptizing in houses, where the congregations of the faithful met, continued for the first ages, when the persecution obliged them to perform all religious acts with as much privacy as might be. After the empire became Christian, and temples were every where erected, a baptistery or room to baptize persons in, was joined to the church; where the persons, who were baptized, had the prayers of the congregation for God's blessing upon them. This being neglected by some persons, who performed the baptismal rites in private houses and oratories, they thereby seeming to slight the publick baptisteries, occasioned the 59th canon of the Constantinopolitan council under Justinianus the younger: "Let not baptism be celebrated in any oratory within a private house: but they that would partake of an undefiled baptism, let them go to the publick churches, and there let them enjoy this gift. But, if it shall be proved against any one, that he has transgressed against this ordinance, if he be a clergyman, let him be deposed; and if he be a layman, let him be excommunicated." Our Church has not been so severe, as to have recourse to excommunications and depositions, upon the breaking in upon this duty: but she orders, that "the baptism be administered in the church," in the publick congregation: "that the congregation there present may testify the receiving of them that be newly baptized into the number of Christ's church." And it is a pity that so wholesome a constitution should be trampled under foot by the vanity of some, and the compliance of others, though there be not so great a penalty annexed to it, as formerly was. Dr. Nicholls.

Baptism. For which cause also it is expedient that Baptism be ministered in the vulgar tongue. Nevertheless, (if necessity so require,) Children may be baptized upon any other day.

[s] The people are to be admonished, &c.] "It appeareth by ancient writers," as was expressed in the rubrick till the last review, "that the sacrament of baptism in the old time was not commonly ministered but at two times, at Easter and at Whitsuntide:" at Easter in remembrance of Christ's resurrection, of which baptism is a figure, Rom vi. 4; and at Whitsuntide in remembrance of the three thousand souls baptized by the apostles at that time, Acts ii. 41. For this reason in the Western church all, that were born after Easter, were kept until Whitsunday; and all, that were born after Whitsunday, were reserved until the next Easter; unless some imminent danger of death hastened the administration of it before. Though in the Eastern church the feast of Epiphany was also assigned for the administration of this sacrament, in memory of our Saviour being, as it is supposed, baptized upon that day. And, about the eighth or ninth century, the time for solemn baptism was enlarged even in the Latin church, all churches being moved by reason of the thing, to administer baptism, as at first, at all times of the year. Wheatly. The wise reformers of our Liturgy thought it too great a liberty, to be left to the parents to keep their children from baptism from the time of their birth to the following Easter, which was indulged by the provincial council only a little to comply with the see of Rome, who tenaciously adhered to an old custom, the reason of which was vanished: and therefore they very prudently order, that the people should be admonished to bring their children to church for baptism upon Sundays only and holy-days, and that in any time of the year; not with any particular regard to those Sundays and holy-days, but because the greatest congregations then meet at church, who may be witnesses of their reception into the church, and may thereby receive benefit, by refreshing their memories with a recital of those sacred engagements, which they themselves formerly made. Dr. Nicholls. See page 164, note n.

The reason of the former part of this rubrick is plain enough. That this office, which is designed to be a publick one, should not be used on such days, or at such hours of the day, when there is no publick service performed, or congregation attending; and when consequently the administration of baptism would only be private in effect, though executed within the walls of the church and with the publick form. But how the allowance is to be interpreted depends upon the meaning of the word "necessity:" which can hardly be conceived to take place here in any such strict sense as that in which it is used in the rubrick before the office of private baptism. For what necessity can there be, to prefer any other day for publick baptism before a Sunday or holy-day, which would not equally warrant a private baptism; that is to say, supposing the expression, "if necessity so require," to be tantamount to that other in the following office "if need shall compel." If there were room to believe that both these expressions related to the "same" causes or "urgent causes," then the allowance to baptize "on any other day" must be understood only of "private" baptisms. But as I fear it can hardly be so construed, especially as provision is made for such cases in the private office, so neither am I able to assign the instances, of which it may be properly understood. Should it be alleged, that no more might be intended by the expression, than to except some cases of great inconvenience, as it seems to be opposed to the words foregoing "most convenient," this meaning might well enough be approved, if such construction might be allowed.

Under such uncertainty the point which I chiefly rest upon is this. That it doth not appear that we of the clergy have any power lodged with us to judge and determine what are those cases of "necessity" or "inconvenience," which deserve a dispensation, or exception from the general rule. It is said, that "the people shall be admonished" to bring their children to be baptized "only on Sundays or holy-days." Which I suppose with regard to us, is no more than a general direction to discourage their neglect of this rubrick, as we have opportunity, and to put them in mind, as often as there shall be occasion to remind them, to bring their children when there is a congregation to witness their baptism: at least "on such days and at such hours, as there is publick service usually performed." And if they comply with the rubrick thus far, as to bring their children to church on any day when there is stated service, taking upon themselves to answer for the "necessity" of the case; and withal give notice to the curate of their intention "either the night before, or in the morning before prayers begin," as a following rubrick directs; I do not see that the baptism of their children can be refused or postponed. But then, on the other hand, how far a curate, though he take not upon himself to judge of the necessity, &c., may take upon himself to baptize on any day, or hour of the day, when there is no publick service is another question. This I think is clear, that he may justify himself in refusing to do so, both by the office, one part of which is the publick "reception of the baptized infant into the congregation of Christ's flock;" and by the rubrick, which enjoins that the baptism shall be administered "immediately after the second lesson either of morning or evening prayer:" which of the two is left to the curate's discretion, but his discretionary power goes no farther.

It will be observed, that, for the same reason, baptism ought never to be deferred till the stated service is over, where it can be performed in time of service: which proviso I put in on account of those places, as cathedral and collegiate churches, for instance, where the usual situation of the font is at so great a distance from the choir or the place of divine service, as to render the compliance with this injunction impracticable.

For, wherever the font is, there, and there only, can this office be regularly performed: which we of the clergy should take the more notice of, because it is the only point in these previous rubricks, placed at the head of the office, which is expressly charged upon the minister: "The priest coming to the font and standing there shall say." Archdeacon Sharp.

[t] And note, that there shall be for every Male-child to be baptized two Godfathers, &c.] This rubrick, which was added at the last review, is concerning the Godfathers and Godmothers. The use of which in the Christian church was derived from the Jews, as well as the initiation of infants itself. And it is by some believed that "the witnesses" mentioned by Isaiah at the "naming of his son," Isa. viii. 2, were of the same nature with these sureties.

2. In the primitive church they were so early, that it is not easy to fix the time of their beginning. Some of the most ancient fathers make mention of them, and through all the successive ages afterwards we find the use of them continued, without any scruple or interruption, till the Anabaptists, and other Puritans of late years, raised some idle clamours against them. Some of these there will be a properer place to speak to hereafter. In the meanwhile it may be observed in general, that since the laws of all nations (because infants cannot speak for themselves) have allowed them guardians to contract for them in secular matters; which contracts, if they be fair and beneficial, the infants must make good when they come to age; it cannot, one would think, be unreasonable for the Church to allow them spiritual guardians, to promise those things in their name, without which they cannot obtain salvation. And this too, at the same time, gives "security" to the Church, that the children shall not apostatize, from whence they are called "sureties;" provides monitors to every Christian, to remind them of the vow which they made in their presence, from whence they are called "witnesses;" and better represents the new birth, by giving the infants new and spiritual relations, whence they are termed "Godfathers and Godmothers."

3. How long the Church has fixed the number of these sureties, I cannot tell: but by a constitution of Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1236, and in a synod held at Worcester, in the year 1240, I find the same provision made as is now required by our rubrick, namely, "That there should be for every male-child, that is to be baptized, two Godfathers and one Godmother; and for every female, one Godfather and two Godmothers."

4. By the twenty-ninth canon of our Church, "no parent is to be admitted to answer as Godfather for his own child." For the parents are already engaged under such strict bonds, both by nature and religion, to take care of their children's education, that the Church does not think she can lay them under greater: but still makes provision, that if, notwithstanding these obligations, the parents should be negligent, or if it should please God to take them to Himself before their children be grown up; there yet may be others, upon whom it shall lie to see that the children do not want due instructions, by means of such carelessness, or death of their parents. And for a farther prevention of people's entering upon this charge, before they are capable of understanding the trust they take upon themselves, it is farther provided by the above-mentioned canon, that "no person be admitted Godfather or Godmother, before the said person, so undertaking, hath received the holy communion." Wheatly.

[u] — must be ready at the Font,] What the font is, every body knows, but not why it is so called. The rites of baptism in the first times were performed in "fountains" and "rivers," both because their converts were many, and because those ages were unprovided of other baptisteries. We have no other remainder of this rite but the name: for hence it is, that we call our baptisteries "fonts;" which, when religion found peace, were built and consecrated for the more reverence and respect of the sacrament. These were set at first some distance from the church; after, in the church-porch; and that significantly, because baptism is the entrance into the church mystical, as the porch to the temple. At the last, they got into the church, but not into every, but the city-church, where the bishop resided, hence called "the mother-church" because it gave spiritual birth by baptism; afterwards they were brought into rural churches. Wheresoever they stood, they were had in high veneration. Bp. Sparrow.

[x] — And the Priest] Our Church here declares who is the proper and ordinary minister of baptism. The commission to baptize was given to the apostles and their successors, and other persons whom they should appoint for that office. In common cases our Church has in this rubrick declared who is the ordinary minister of baptism; namely, the priest: liberty being allowed in extraordinary cases, or in the absence of the priest, as it was in the primitive church, for a deacon to baptize. Dr. Nicholls. The priest, who, under the bishop, and by authority derived from him, is the proper and ordinary minister of baptism; or the deacon, as his deputy and assistant. Archdeacon Yardley.

[y] — coming to the Font,] There is an obvious remark to be made upon this restriction as to place: namely, that no minister ought to use this publick form in a private house; or indeed in any place, except at the font itself, to which the use of it is restrained. Nay, if the rubrick did not forbid him, the very office itself would, in which he is directed to pray in these words, "Grant, that whosoever is here dedicated to thee by our office and ministry, may be endued with heavenly virtues, &c." Consider whether these words can consistently, or indeed without absurdity, be used in a parlour or bedchamber, or in any other place save at the common baptistery, or "fountain of baptism," as the old offices term it, appropriated to each parish or congregation. Archdeacon Sharp.

If the occasion be so urgent as to require baptism at home, the Church has provided a particular office for the administration of it; which directs, that the essential parts of the sacrament be administered immediately in private; but defers the performance of the other solemnities till the child can be brought into the church. As to the office we are now upon, it is by no means to be used in any place but the church. It is ordered to be said "at the font," in the middle of the Morning or Evening Prayer, and all along supposes a congregation to be present; and particularly in one of the addresses which the priest is to use, it is very absurd for him to tell the Godfathers and Godmothers in a chamber, that "they have brought the child thither to be baptized," when he himself is brought thither to baptize it. It is still more absurd for him in such a place to use that expression, "Grant that whosoever is here dedicated to thee by our office and ministry, &c." For he knows that the word "here" cannot be applicable to the place he is in: nor yet has he any authority to omit or alter the form.

If we look back into the practice of the primitive church, we shall find that the place where this solemn act was performed was at first indeed unlimited: "in any place where there was water," as Justin Martyr tells us; "in ponds or lakes, in springs or rivers," as Tertullian speaks: but always as near as might be to the place of their publick assemblies. For it was never (except upon extraordinary occasions) done without the presence of the congregation. A rule of the primitive Christians so zealously kept to, that the Trullan Council does not allow this holy sacrament to be administered even in chapels that were appropriate or private, but only in the publick or parish churches; punishing the persons offending, if clergy, with deposition; if laity, with excommunication.

In our own Church indeed, since our unhappy confusions, this office hath been very frequently made use of in "private;" and some ministers have thought themselves, to prevent the greater mischief of separation, necessitated to comply with the obstinacy of the greater and more powerful of their parishioners; who, for their ease or humour, or for the convenience of a more splendid and pompous christening, resolving to have their children baptized at home, if their own minister refuse it, will get some other to do it.

But such persons ought calmly to consider, how contrary to reason and the plain design of the institution of the sacrament this custom is. For what is the end of that sacred ordinance, but to initiate the person into the church of Christ, and to intitle him to the privileges of it? And where can there be a better representation of that society, than in a congregation assembled after the most solemn and conspicuous manner for the worship of God, and for the testifying of their communion in it? Where can the profession be more properly made before such admission; where the stipulation given, where the promise to undertake the duties of a Christian; but in such an assembly of Christians? The ordinance is certainly publick; publick in the nature and end of it; and therefore such ought the celebration of it to be; the neglect whereof is the less excusable, because it is so easily remedied. Wheatly.

[z] — (which is then to be filled with pure Water,)] Water is the element appointed by our Saviour as an essential, without which the sacrament cannot be administered: and it ought to be "pure," both in regard to decency, and to the spiritual significancy of it, as employed to wash away sins. Archdeacon Yardley.

[a] Hath this Child been already baptized, or no?] The minister is injoined to ask this question, that he may not unawares baptize a child, that has been baptized before: which is contrary both to the word of God, and to the usage and laws of the church in all ages. For though several persons are recorded in Scripture to be baptized, there is no mention of any one that was ever re-baptized, though they were to receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper often, 1 Cor. xi. 24, &c. And, since baptism succeeded in the place of circumcision, the latter being never reiterated in the Jewish church, so neither ought the former. For since this sacred rite is the initiatory one, whereby we are admitted into our holy religion, it ought not to be repeated: since we enter into our religion but once, to reiterate the form were only to make sport with, or at least to pervert the intent of, the sacred mystery. And to this probably relate the "one faith, one baptism," Eph. iv. 5: and the "once enlightened," Heb. vi. 4, is not improbably to be understood of the same. But the whole current of antiquity runs against the repetition of baptism. Dr. Nicholls.

Iteration of baptism once given hath been always thought a manifest contempt of that ancient apostolical aphorism, "one Lord, one faith, one baptism;" baptism not only one, inasmuch as it hath every where the same substance, and offereth unto all men the same grace; but one also, for that it ought not to be received by any man above once. We serve the Lord, which is but one, because no one can be joined with Him; we embrace that faith, which is but one, because it admitteth no innovation; that baptism we receive which is but one, because it cannot be received often. For how should we practise iteration of baptism, and yet teach, that we are by baptism born anew; that by baptism we are admitted into the heavenly society of saints; that those things be really and effectually done by baptism, which are no more possible to be often done, than a man can naturally be often born, or civilly be often adopted into any one stock or family? This also is the cause, why they, that present us unto baptism, are entitled for ever after our parents in God; and the reason why there we receive new names, in token that by baptism we are made new creatures. As

Ps. li. 5. Eph. ii. 3.

DEARLY beloved, forasmuch as all men[c] are conceived and born in sin[d]; and that our Saviour Christ saith, None can enter into Rom. v. 12. 18. Joh xiv. 4.

Christ hath therefore died and risen from the dead but once, so that sacrament, which both extinguisheth in Him our former sin, and beginneth in us a new condition of life, is by one only actual administration for ever available, according to that in the Nicene Creed, "I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins." Hooker.

The first part of the office, or the preparation before baptism, concerns either the child or the sureties: as to the child, we first inquire if it want baptism; secondly, shew the necessity of it in an exhortation; thirdly, we pray it may be fitted for it in the two Collects. First, the priest asks if this child have been already baptized, because St. Paul saith, "there is but one baptism," Eph. iv. 5; and as we are born, so we are born again, but once. Secondly, the minister begins the exhortation, shewing, 1. What reason there is to baptize this child, namely, because of its being born in original sin, Ps. li. 5, and by consequence liable to condemnation, Rom. v. 12; the only way to free it from which is baptizing it with water and the Holy Ghost, John iii. 5. And secondly, beseeching all present, upon this account to pray to God, that, while He baptizes this child with water, God will give it his Holy Spirit, so as to make it a lively member of Christ's church, whereby it may have a title to "remission of sins." Thirdly, the two Collects follow, made by the priest and all the people for the child: the first Collect commemorates how God did typify this salvation, which He now gives by baptism, in saving Noah and all his by water, 1 Pet. iii. 21; and by carrying the Israelites safe through the Red Sea, 1 Cor. x. 2. And it declares also how Christ Himself by being baptized sanctified water for remission of sin: and upon these grounds we pray, that God will by his Spirit cleanse and sanctify this child, that he may be delivered from his wrath, saved in the ark of his church, and so filled with grace as to live holily here, and happily hereafter. The second Collect, after owning God's power to help this child, and to raise him from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, doth petition Him to grant it may receive remission and regeneration, pleading with God to grant this request, by his promise to give to them that ask, that so this infant may be spiritually cleansed by God's grace in its baptism, and come at last to his eternal kingdom, through Christ our Lord, Amen.

2. The next part of the preparation concerns the Godfathers or sureties, who are, 1. encouraged in the Gospel and its application, with the thanksgiving; 2. instructed in the preface before the covenant; 3. engaged in the questions and answers. The Jews had sureties at circumcision, who promised for the child till it came to age, Isa. viii. 2; and the primitive Christians had sponsors to engage for such as were baptized; and since children cannot make a covenant themselves, it is charity to appoint (as the laws of men do) others to do it for them till they be of age; and this gives security to the church, the child shall not be an apostate; provides a monitor for both the child and its parents, to mind them of this vow, and keep the memory of this new birth, by giving the child new and spiritual relations of Godfathers and Godmothers: now to these the priest next addresseth, 1. in "the Gospel," Mark x. 13; which shews how the Jews, believing that Christ's blessing would be very beneficial to young children, brought them to Him in their arms, and when the disciples checked them, Christ first declares that infants, and such as were like them, had the only right to the kingdom of heaven, and therefore they had good right to his love and his blessing, and to all means which might bring them to it, and accordingly He took them in his arms and blessed them. After this follows the explication, and applying this Gospel to the sureties; for if they doubt, here they may see Christ's love to infants, and their right to heaven and to this means, so that they may firmly believe He will pardon and sanctify this child, and grant it a title to his kingdom; and that He is well pleased with them, for bringing this child to his holy baptism; for He desires that this infant, as well as we all, may come to know and believe in Him. Wherefore, thirdly, here is "a thanksgiving" to be offered up by all, beginning with praising God for calling us into his church, where we may know Him and obtain the grace to believe, it being very proper for us to bless God for our being Christians, when a new Christian is to be made; and then follows a prayer, that we who are Christians may grow in grace, and that this infant may receive the Spirit in order to its regeneration and salvation. After which form of devotion, fourthly, there is a "preface to the covenant," wherein the Godfathers and Godmothers are put in mind, first, what hath been done already, namely, They have brought the child to Christ, and begged of Him in the Collects to accept it, and Christ hath shewed them in the Gospel, that the child is capable to receive, and He willing to give it salvation, and the means thereof upon the conditions required of all Christians, that is, repentance, faith, and new obedience. Secondly, therefore, they are required to engage in the name of this child, till it come of age, that it shall perform these conditions required on its part, that it may have a title to that which Christ doth promise, and will certainly perform on his part. Fifthly, the engagement itself follows, which is very necessary, since baptism is a mutual covenant between God and man, and therefore in the beginning of Christianity, (when the church consisted chiefly of such as were converted from the Jews and heathens, after they came to age,) the parties baptized answered these very same questions, and entered into these very engagements for themselves, which infants (who need the benefits of baptism as much as any) not being able to do, the Church lends them the feet of others to bring them, and the tongues of others to promise for them; and the priest stands in God's stead to take this security in his name; he "demands" therefore of the sureties, first, if they in the name and stead of this child will renounce all sinful compliances with the "devil," the "world," and the "flesh," which tempt us to all kinds of sin, and so are God's enemies and ours also, in so high a measure, that unless we vow never to follow and be led by them, we cannot be received into league and friendship with God: to this they reply in the singular number, as if the child spake by them, "I renounce them all." Secondly, as Philip asked the eunuch, if he did believe before he baptized him, Acts viii. 31, so the priest asks, if they believe all the articles of the Christian faith, into which religion they are now to be entered, and therefore they must engage to hold all the fundamental principles thereof revealed in Scripture, and comprised in the Apostles' Creed, and they are to answer, "All this I stedfastly believe." Thirdly, that it may appear to be their own free act to admit themselves into this holy religion, they are asked if they will be baptized into this faith, and they answer, "That is my desire;" for who would not desire to be a child of God, a member the kingdom of God[e], except he be regenerate[f] and born anew of Water and of the Holy Ghost[g], I beseech you to call upon God the Father[h], through our Lord Jesus Christ, that of his bounteous mercy he will grant of Christ, and an heir of heaven? But since these benefits of baptism are promised only to them who live holily, fourthly, it is demanded if they will keep God's holy will and commandments as long as they live, since they now take Christ for their Lord and Master, and list themselves under his banner, and receive his grace in this sacrament, to renew and strengthen them to keep this vow. Upon these accounts they promise "they will" keep God's commandments. And now the covenant is made between God and this infant, He hath promised it pardon, grace, and glory, and is willing to adopt it for his own child: and this child by its sureties hath engaged to forsake all evil ways, to believe all truth, and to practise all kind of virtue. Dean Comber.

[b] — Then shall the Priest proceed &c.] If the minister be answered, that the child hath not been baptized, he then begins the solemnity with an exhortation to prayer: for there being a mutual covenant in this sacrament between God and man, so vast a disproportion between the parties, and so great a condescension on the part of the Almighty, (who designs only our advantage by it, and is moved by nothing but his own free grace to agree to it,) it is very reasonable, the whole solemnity should be begun with an humble address to God. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[c] Dearly beloved, forasmuch as all men &c.] Holy Church's aim being in all her services to make them "reasonable," that according to St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv, we may all join with her in her offices, both with our "spirit and understanding," she hath been careful, not only to put them into a known tongue, but also to instruct us in the nature of them: making thus her Prayer Book a sum of divinity. Therefore here in the beginning, she instructs out of holy Scripture concerning the necessity and efficacy of baptism, as very briefly, so very pithily and fully. First, laying down this for a rule, that we are all born in sin, as it is in Rom. v. 18, 19; all guilty in Adam's fall, (so the Catholick church spread over the world always understood it,) and therefore by our first birth have no right to heaven, into which "no unclean thing shall enter," Eph. v. 5. Secondly, that therefore there is need of a second birth to give us a right to that, as it is in St. John iii. 3, "Except a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Thirdly, that this second or new birth is by water and the Holy Ghost, St. John iii. 5, "Except a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." By water and the Holy Ghost is there meant holy baptism. For first, this is the most literal interpretation of the words; for what is baptism but water and the Holy Ghost? and therefore the best: for that is certainly the sense of the Holy Ghost, who, as we all believe, was the author of the letter of the Scripture, and therefore of the literal sense, where that is not contrary to, but agreeable with, the other Scriptures. Now this literal sense given is agreeable to other texts: as, namely, to Acts viii. 38; x. 47; where water is declared to be the element of baptism: and expressly again, Eph. v. 26, "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water." And as this is the most literal, so is it the most catholick interpretation of the words; and therefore also the best, by St. Peter's rule, 2 St. Peter i. 20, "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation." That this is the most catholick interpretation, appears by all the ancient interpreters upon the place, who all expound it of baptism. And indeed if it were lawful to expound it otherwise, seeing no other Scripture contradicts this literal sense; I know not how it can be avoided, but that men may lose all their creed by playing so with Scripture, leaving the letter for figures. Thus are we instructed in the nature, necessity, and efficacy of holy baptism; that it is the only ordinary means of our regeneration, or second birth, which gives us a right and title to heaven. Bp. Sparrow.

Of all the ancients there is not one to be named, that ever did otherwise either expound or allege the place, than as implying external baptism. Hooker.

[d] — forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin;] The Church here assigns as an argument why we should pray for the infant, the consideration of that sin, in which it was "conceived and born:" which although arrogantly denied by the old Pelagians, and their revived issue, the Socinian and Anabaptist, yet is it affirmed in Scripture, Ps. li. 5; Rom. v. 12. 18; Job xiv. 4, 5: and was observed by the light of nature among the heathens; believed by revelation among the Jews, and all the orthodox Christians; yea, it hath a thousand witnesses in every man's breast, who will but consider how miserably he is inclined in many cases against his reason, his judgment, and his resolutions. And it was very necessary for the Church to lay this foundation, because the denial of original sin hath always been followed by the contempt of infant baptism. Dean Comber.

[e] — he cannot enter into the kingdom of God,] That is, he can neither have part in the kingdom of grace nor of glory; neither be made a member of the Church militant nor triumphant. Nothing defiled can come there, Rev. xxi. 27; 2 Cor. xvi. 15, 16: and, alas! they are defiled both in body and soul. But God hath provided a remedy as large as the evil: water, to cleanse the outward, and the Spirit, to purify the inward man. The baptism of water without the Spirit will not suffice; no, nor yet the baptism of the Spirit without water; for St. Peter orders those to be baptized with water, who had received the Spirit before, Acts x. 47, 48. So that since children need this grace so exceedingly, and God hath so graciously provided this remedy, and assured us of the necessity thereof; we must not allege that God is able to save without it; but most devoutly beseech Him that "this child" may become partaker of this blessed means. Dean Comber.

[f] — except he be regenerate and born anew of Water and of the Holy Ghost,] That is, except he be baptized. Bp. Cosin.

[g] — born anew of Water and of the Holy Ghost,] To be "born of water" signifies to be baptized with water; and to be "born of the Spirit" signifies to be renewed in the inner man, to be sanctified or made holy by the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit. And this birth of water and of the Spirit is a new birth, as it is distinguished from that old or former birth of nature, by which we enter into the world. Dr. Bennet.

Let us pray[m].

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, who of thy great mercy didst save Noah and his family in the ark from perishing by water; and also didst safely lead the children of Israel thy people through the Red Sea, figuring thereby thy holy Baptism[n]; and by the Baptism of thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ, in the river Jordan, didst sanctify Water[o] to the mystical washing away of sin; We beseech thee, for thine infinite mercies, that thou wilt mercifully look upon this Child; wash him and sanctify him with the Holy Ghost: that he, being delivered from thy wrath, may be received into the ark of Christ's Church; and being stedfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity, may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally he may come to the land of everlasting

[i] — that thing which by nature he cannot have;] Nothing is more evident, than that the blessings of the covenant with God by Christ cannot be had by nature: for by nature we are the children of wrath, and consequently the objects of God's displeasure. Dr. Bennet.

[k] — baptized with water and the Holy Ghost,] Baptism with the Holy Ghost does in Scripture phrase betoken the being endued with the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost. But in human writings it very commonly signifies otherwise; and particularly in this place it denotes the being endued with the sanctifying and regenerating grace of the Spirit. Dr. Bennet.

[l] Then &c.] The rubrick here is deficient with respect to the posture or action of the minister. It is not said, whether he shall kneel or stand, at these and the other prayers previous to the administration of baptism in the two first offices. In that for adults indeed the rubrick is far more clear for his standing; it being said before the two first prayers in the office, "And here all the congregation shall kneel;" whereby the minister seems to be excepted. But nothing certain can be gathered as to the two former offices, which occasions the clergy to practise differently in this circumstance. Archdeacon Sharp.

Every one in the congregation ought devoutly to join in this and all the other prayers, and to shew their piety, their zeal, and their charity, in interceding for the child or children here offered to God, that they may effectually receive all the benefits annexed to this holy sacrament. Archdeacon Yardley.

[m] Let us pray.] Being prepared with the former motives and directions, the minister invites us in the ancient form, "Let us pray;" and goes before us in these two pious composures. In the first of which there are three parts: 1. A preface, laying down the encouragements to his request; 2. The request itself; 3. The end for which we make it.

1. The preface, having reminded us, that He, whom we call upon, is "Almighty" in power, and "Everlasting" in duration, commemorates the ancient types of holy baptism, together with the consignation thereof in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ: that by remembering what God hath done by, and for, the element of water, with respect to this mystery, we may heighten our own expectations, and learn to hope for great things from it, and engage the Almighty to make the present effect answerable to so early and so noble an apparatus, as Himself had made thereunto.

2. The petition advanced upon these promises is, first, for God's general pity to be expressed towards this infant, because it is miserable by nature, and liable to his wrath; secondly, particularly that He will please to wash and purify it from all its natural pollutions by the living water, John vii. 38, even his holy Spirit, which alone can cleanse the soul, and which gives the power of cleansing to this water.

3. And we ask this the more fervently because there will follow so blessed an effect upon our being heard: namely, first, privative; if it please Him so to wash away the sin of this child, it shall be "delivered from God's wrath," Matt. iii. 7. Secondly, there will follow also positive effects, even the seeds of sanctifying graces, which will manifest themselves in due time, so as to conduct him to happiness hereafter. Dean Comber.

[n] — figuring thereby thy holy Baptism;] The apostle tells us, that "the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved by water. The like figure whereunto, even baptism, doth also now save us, &c." 1 Pet. iii. 20. Whence it is plain, that in the deliverance of Noah's family by the ark, God did prefigure, or represent by way of type, the Christian baptism. We are told also, that the children of Israel were all of them "baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea," 1 Cor. x. 2; that is, they were by that baptism made the disciples of Moses; and consequently that baptism was a type or figure of the Christian baptism, by which we are made our Saviour's disciples. Dr. Bennet. See page 153, note s.

[o] — didst sanctify Water &c.] Such was the language of the primitive church: not that they thought the water contracted any new quality in the nature; but was only said to be "sanctified" in the use thereof, being converted by Christ's institution from common to sacred purposes. L'Estrange.

The action of our blessed Saviour, here alluded to, serves to shew us, that though baptism, or the being washed or sprinkled with water, be in itself of no consequence, yet, when it is appointed by God, it is to be otherwise esteemed of; and, by thus doing, He hath as effectually declared, that baptism, when thus appointed, is an holy thing, as if He had expressly said so: and God's declaring a thing holy by the words or deeds of our Saviour may be properly called a sanctifying of it. The end and design of his sanctifying baptism may be shewn from innumerable places of the New Testament. It will be sufficient to mention but one in this place, namely, Acts ii. 38: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Venner.

Matt. vii. 24. Rev. xxii. 5. Heb. xi 16. life, there to reign with thee world without end; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Ps. cxxiv. 8; lxxii. 12; ix. 10. John iii. 36; xi. 25. ALMIGHTY and immortal God[p], the aid of all that need, the helper of all that flee to thee for succour, the life of them that believe, and the resurrection of the dead: We call upon thee for this Infant, that he, coming to thy holy Baptism, may receive remission of Tit. iii. 5. his sins[q] by spiritual regeneration[r]. Receive him, O Lord, as thou hast promised[s] by thy well-beloved Son, saying, Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you; So give now unto us that ask; let us that seek find; open the gates unto us that knock; that this Infant may enjoy the everlasting benediction of thy heavenly washing, and may come to the eternal kingdom which thou hast promised by Christ our Lord. Amen. Matt. vii. 7. Gal. iii. 27—29.

¶ Then shall the people stand up, and the Priest shall say[t],

Hear the words of the Gospel, written

[p] Almighty and immortal God, &c.] In this second prayer, in which we renew our address to express our earnestness and importunity, we request, 1. that this child may be pardoned and regenerated; 2. that it may be adopted and accepted by Almighty God: both which are enforced with their proper motives. The first petition is ushered in by a solemn invocation, wherein we call upon God by all those attributes, which express his power and mercy; we confess Him to be "Omnipotent" and "Immortal," 1 Tim. vi. 16; the "reliever" of the needy, Ps. x. 16, and lxix. 33; the "helper" of those that fly to his protection, John vi. 37: He giveth eternal "life" to "believers," and raiseth those that are "dead," John xi. 25: and therefore He is fittest to be solicited in behalf of a weak and helpless infant, dead in trespasses and sins. Dean Comber.

[q] — may receive remission of his sins &c.] These words are capable of two different senses. Either original sin may, with respect to the several actual transgressions, to which it leads, be called "sins" in the plural number: or else "remission of sins" may signify the state of remission of sins, even that covenant state through Christ, by which the remission of sins, both original and actual, is made over to us. Into this state infants are put by baptism. Their original sin is immediately forgiven; and they have an assurance, that their future actual sins shall be forgiven also, provided they continue in their duty. Dr. Bennet.

[r] — by spiritual regeneration.] What is meant here by "spiritual regeneration," requires to be spoken to. To be "regenerate and born anew of water and of the Holy Ghost" are, in the beginning of this office, spoken of as the same thing: "the inward and spiritual grace," conveyed to us in this sacrament, is by our Church Catechism said to be "a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness; for being by nature born in sin, and the children of wrath, we are hereby made the children of grace." St. Paul says, "We are buried with Christ by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life," Rom. vi. 4. And the same St. Paul styles baptism "the washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5; because in baptism the holy Spirit works in us a change something like a new birth, translating us from a natural state in Adam to a spiritual state in Christ; both the water and the Spirit at the same time concurring to this new birth: for, as we are but once born into our natural life, so are we but once born into our spiritual or Christian life: we are but once baptized, and once regenerated; regenerated at the very time when we are baptized. This is the language of Scripture: thus this term was applied by the ancient fathers; and thus it is used by our Church. So that to speak of a Christian's being regenerated in any other stage of his life; or to apply the term of regeneration, or new birth, to the turning from a lapsed state to a state of holiness, to that renovation, amendment, or renewal of the heart of man, which is the duty of a Christian, and which the word of God exhorts us to acquire; to make it signify conversion or repentance; is, if there were no worse consequences attending it, mixing and confounding distinct notions, misapplying Scripture phrases, and abusing the ancient and known language of the Church. Archdeacon Yardley.

[s] Receive him, O Lord, as thou hast promised &c.] The motive, by which we urge this second petition, is no less than God's gracious promise by Jesus Christ, Matt. vii. 7, that "if we ask, we shall have:" which St. Luke applies to the giving of the Holy Spirit, Luke xi. 13; and some of the ancients refer the promise to this very mystery. Nor can this promise be urged more properly. For we have brought this infant to heaven's gate; but we cannot make it the child of God, nor let it in: so that all we can do is to "ask" and "seek" to Him to open the gate, and to receive it, who hath promised to hear the prayers of his Church. Dean Comber.

[t] Then shall the people stand up, and the Priest shall say, &c.] "The people standing up," which shews that they were to kneel at the two foregoing prayers; the minister, in the next place, is to read to them a portion out of the Gospel of St. Mark. Which, though anciently applied to the sacrament of baptism, has been censured by some as improper for this place, because the children there mentioned were not brought to be baptized. But if people would but consider upon what account the Gospel is placed here, without doubt they would retract so impertinent a charge. In the making of a covenant, the express consent of both parties is required: and therefore, the covenant of baptism being now to be made between Almighty God and the child to be baptized; it is reasonable, that, before the sureties engage, in behalf of the infant, they should have some comfortable assurances, that God on his part will be pleased to consent to and make good the agreement. For their satisfaction, therefore, the priest, who is God's ambassador, produces a warrant from Scripture, (the declaration of his will,) whereby it appears that God is willing to receive infants into his favour, and hath by Jesus Christ declared them capable of that grace and glory, which on God's part are promised in this baptismal covenant: wherefore the sureties need not fear to make the stipulation on their part, since they have God's own word, that there is no impediment in chil-by Saint Mark, in the tenth Chapter, at the thirteenth Verse.

THEY brought young children to Christ, that he should touch them; and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

¶ After the Gospel is read, the Minister shall make this brief Exhortation upon the words of the Gospel.

BELOVED, ye hear in this Gospel the words of our Saviour Christ, that he commanded the children to be brought unto him; how he blamed those that would have kept them from him; how he exhorteth all men to follow their innocency. Ye perceive how by his outward gesture and deed he declared his goodwill toward them; for he embraced them in his arms, he laid his hands upon them, and blessed them. Doubt ye not therefore, but earnestly believe, that he will likewise favourably receive this present Infant; that he will embrace him with the arms of his mercy; that he will give unto him the blessing of eternal life, and make him partaker of his everlasting kingdom. Wherefore we being thus persuaded of the goodwill of our heavenly Father towards this Infant, declared by his Son Jesus Christ; and nothing doubting but that he favourably alloweth this charitable work of our's in bringing this Infant to his holy Baptism; let us faithfully and devoutly give thanks unto him[u], and say, dren to make them incapable of receiving that, which He hath promised, and will surely perform.

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, heavenly Father, we give thee humble thanks, for that thou hast vouchsafed to call us to the knowledge of thy grace, and faith in thee; Increase this knowledge, and confirm this faith in us evermore. Give thy holy Spirit to this Infant, that he may be born again, and be made an heir of everlasting salvation; through our Lord Jesus Christ, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen.

From all which premises, the Church in a brief exhortation that follows, concludes, that the sureties may cheerfully promise that which belongs to their part, since God by his Son hath given sufficient security that his part shall be accomplished. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

Lest any should doubt, whether Christ will accept an infant to baptism, and the effects of it, holy Church propounds to us the tenth chapter of St. Mark, out of which she concludes Christ's love and good-will to children in general; "for he commanded them to be brought to him; he rebuked those that would have kept them from him; he embraced them in his arms, and blessed them:" which are all plain arguments, that He will receive them when they are brought to Him. Yea, and that He will so far embrace them, as to receive them to eternal life, if they be brought to Him, is plain by his own words in that Gospel: "Suffer little children to come unto me; for to such," and therefore to themselves, (for what belongs to others, because they are such as children are, must needs belong to the children,) "belongeth the kingdom of God." Since then they be capable of the kingdom of heaven, and there is no ordinary way for them to the kingdom of heaven, but by a new and second birth of water and the Holy Ghost, that is, baptism; doubt ye not, but that he," who expressed so much love to them, as is mentioned in the Gospel, "will favourably receive the present infant to baptism, and graciously accept our charitable work in bringing him to it." Thus holy Church concludes out of Scripture, according to the practice and doctrine of the Catholick church.

Cyprian tells us, that the infant is not to be hindered from baptism. This was the sentence of that council in the year of our Lord 246; and this was no new decree, but the most established faith of the Church, as St. Augustine saith. Bp. Sparrow.

[u] — let us faithfully and devoutly give thanks unto him, &c.] The willingness of God to receive us into his favour being the overflowings of his pure mercy and goodness, and not owing to any merits or deserts in us, it is fit it should be acknowledged in an humble manner. And therefore next follows a thanksgiving for our own call to the knowledge of, and faith in, God, which we are put in mind of by this fresh occasion: and wherein we also beg of God to give a new instance of his goodness, by "giving his Holy Spirit to the infant" now to be baptized, that so "it may be born again, and made an heir of everlasting salvation. Wheatly.

[x] Then shall the Priest speak unto the Godfathers and Godmothers &c.] No doubt now remaining, but that God is ready and willing to perform his part of the covenant, so soon as the child shall promise on his; the priest addresses himself to the Godfathers and Godmothers to promise for him: and from them takes security, that the infant shall observe the conditions that are required of him. And in this there is nothing strange or new: nothing which is not used almost in every con-

DEARLY beloved, ye have brought this Child here to be baptized, ye have prayed that our Lord Jesus Christ would vouchsafe to receive him, to release him of his sins, to sanctify him with the Holy Ghost, to give him the kingdom of heaven, and everlasting life. Ye have heard also that our Lord Jesus Christ hath promised in his Gospel to grant all these things that ye have prayed for: which promise he, for his part, will most surely keep and perform. Wherefore after this promise made by Christ, this Infant must also faithfully, for his part, promise by you that are his sureties, (until he come of age to take it upon himself,) that he will renounce the devil and all his works, and constantly believe God's holy Word, and obediently keep his commandments. tract. By an old law of the Romans, all magistrates were obliged, within five days after admission to their office, to take an oath to observe the laws. Now it happened, that C. Valerius Flaccus was chosen Edile, or overseer of the publick buildings But he, being before Flamen Dialis, or Jupiter's High Priest, could not be admitted by the Romans to swear: their laws supposing, that so sacred a person would voluntarily do what an oath would oblige him to. C. Valerius however desired, that his brother, as his proxy, might be sworn in his stead: to this the commons agreed, and passed an act that it should be all the same as if the Edile had sworn himself. Much after the same manner, whenever kings are crowned in their infancy, some of the nobility, deputed to represent them, take the usual oaths. The same do ambassadors for their principals at the testifying of leagues or articles; and guardians for their minors, who are bound by the law to stand to what is contracted for them. Thus the Church, acting after the same method as all nations and orders of men, admits infants to baptism by sponsors undertaking for them. Wheatly. Dr. Nicholls.

The custom of Godfathers and Godmothers seems to have had its original from a like practice among the Jews: (see above, page 333, note t:) the modern Jews, as Buxtorf informs us, have always a sponsor or susceptor at the circumcision of the child. But the use of them in the Christian church is of so ancient a date, that they are mentioned by some of the earliest writers of our religion: such as Justin Martyr, Tertullian, St. Cyril of Alexandria, and St. Austin. But if there were nothing of antiquity in favour of this usage of our Church, yet methinks the benefits of it to common Christianity should skreen it from those furious assaults, which have been sometimes made against it. For what an excellent security is it to the Church, that several Christian men and women pass their word that the child shall be instructed in the Christian faith; that they will take this duty upon themselves, in case the parents of it die, or be negligent of it? Dr. Nicholls.

It is the duty of Godfathers and Godmothers, not only to answer for the child, as we call it, when it is baptized; but also and principally to take care of the education thereof, to assist the parents in that great duty, and, in case of their death, to take it more particularly upon themselves. They are therefore obliged to have a watchful eye over their charges; to give them good instructions; to admonish, correct, and reprove them; to encourage them in well doing, &c. And this care must not cease, till the children either are confirmed, or have received the Lord's Supper, and thereby in a solemn manner taken upon themselves their baptismal covenant. Hence it is evident, how useful this institution is; and with what good reason our Church insists upon having Godfathers and Godmothers at the baptism of infants. For, though the parents are indeed obliged, both by nature and religion, to bring up their children virtuously; yet the Church, for the greater security, requires sponsors also to see that it be done: and has thereby made every provision in her power for avoiding neglect in the education of children, and for bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Only let parents remember, of what importance this matter is; and let them discharge a good conscience therein, by procuring proper persons for this office: such as are truly pious; such as have a deep sense of their duty, and are zealous for the promotion of God's glory, and the salvation of souls. Dr. Bennet.

[y] I demand therefore, &c.] The reasonableness of a vicarious stipulation having been justified, the form, that is here used, is now to be considered. It is drawn up all along by way of question and answer, which seems to have been the method even in the days of the apostles; for St. Peter calls baptism the "answer of a good conscience," 1 Pet. iii. 21: and in the primitive church queries were always put to the persons baptized, which persons at age answered themselves, and children by their representatives, who are therefore to answer in the first person, (as the advocate speaks in the person of the client,) "I renounce, &c." because the contract is properly made with the child.

2. For which reason, in the first book of King Edward, the priest is ordered to demand of "the child" these several questions proposed; and in our present Liturgy, though the minister directs himself to the Godfathers and Godmothers, yet he speaks by them to the child, as is manifestly apparent from the third question: and consequently the child is supposed to return the several answers which are made by the Godfathers, &c. and "to promise by those that are his sureties" (as the above preface expresses it) "that he will renounce the devil and all his works, and constantly believe God's holy word, and obediently keep his commandments."

3. The queries proposed are four, of which the last was added at the Restoration; there being but three of them in any of the former books, though in the first of King Edward they are broke into eight. They being all of them exceedingly suitable and proper, I think it not amiss to take notice of them severally.

4. First, then, when we enter into covenant with God we must have the same friends and enemies as He hath; especially when the same, that are enemies to Him, are also enemies to our salvation. And therefore, since children are by nature the slaves of the devil, and, though they have not yet been actually in his service, all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow, nor be led by them?

1 John ii. 15, 16; v. 19. 1 Cor. vii. 31. Rom. viii. 12—14.

Tit ii. 11—14.

Answer[z]. I renounce them all[a] will nevertheless be apt to be drawn into it, by the "pomps and glory of the world, and the carnal desires of the flesh;" it is necessary to secure them for God betimes, and to engage them to take all these for their enemies, since whoso loveth them cannot love God, 1 John ii. 15. This first part of the baptismal vow, together with the answer, is so exactly primitive, that if we compare ours and the ancient forms together, we shall thereby perceive, that although they somewhat differed among themselves, yet we have extracted the marrow and substance of them all.

5. Secondly, faith is a necessary qualification for baptism, Mark xvi. 16: and therefore before Philip would baptize the eunuch, he asked him, "If he believed with all his heart?" and received his answer, that "he believed Jesus Christ to be the Son of God." Acts viii. 37. From which remarkable precedent the Church hath ever since demanded of all those who enter into the Christian profession, "if they believe all the articles" which are implied in that profession; and this was either done by way of question and answer, or else the party baptized (if of age) was made to repeat the whole Creed.

6. But thirdly, it is not only necessary that the party to be baptized do believe the Christian faith; but he must also desire to be joined to that society by the solemn rite of initiation: wherefore the child is farther demanded, "Whether he will be baptized in this faith?" because God will have no unwilling servants, nor ought men to be compelled by violence to religion. And yet the Christian religion is so reasonable and profitable both as to this world and the next, that the Godfathers may very well presume to answer for the child, that "that is his desire:" since if the child could understand the excellency of this religion, and speak its mind, it would without doubt be ready to make the same reply.

7. Lastly, St. Paul tells us, they that are baptized must "walk in newness of life," Rom. vi. 4: for which reason the child is demanded, fourthly, "If he will keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of his life?" For since he now takes Christ for his Lord and Master, and lists himself under his banner, it is fit he should vow, in the words of this sacrament, to observe the commands of his general. Wherefore as he promised to forsake all "evil" before, so now he must engage to do all that is "good," without which he cannot be admitted into the Christian church. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

For the better understanding of the true sense and meaning of these questions, which are put to the sponsors, and the answers, which the sponsors are to make; it must be observed, that when an adult person is baptized, these questions are put to the person himself, and he himself returns the answers to them. So that there is a most express and formal covenant then made between God and the party baptized: God acting by his lawful minister, and the person baptized acting in his own person. But infants are not capable of entering into covenant in their own persons: and yet they are obliged to the terms of the covenant, when they come of age. Wherefore, that this may be the more effectually represented and shadowed forth to the congregation, the questions are put to the sureties, and the sureties do make answers in the infants' names. Not that the infants can be supposed actually to renounce the devil, &c.; to believe the articles of the Christian faith; or to promise obedience to God's commandments; but all this is done to signify the engagements which the infants are brought under, and which they must actually perform when they are able so to do. The sureties do therefore act in the infants' stead, as is usually done in other cases: for instance, when a copyhold estate is taken up in the name of an infant, some one personates the infant, and makes the same assurances as if the infant were of age. Even so here the sureties answer for the infant in the same manner of words, as if the infant himself were capable of returning the answers in his own person.

This is manifestly our Church's intention and design in this case: as farther appears, if there be any farther need of proof, from that exposition of the interrogatories in baptism, which was accepted by King James the First, and affirmed by the Archbishop of Canterbury to be the true sense and intention of the Church of England, when it was given in by Dr. Burgess in these words following; namely, "I conceive that those interrogatories made to the infant, and answered as in his name by the sureties, intend only an adumbration of that stipulation and covenant, which is really entered into by receiving the sacrament of baptism, and not to import, that the child actually hath such a distinct faith, repentance, or desires as are there professed: or that he is indeed supplied thereof from his sureties, who cannot make over their own faith and repentance to others, as goods and chattels used to be conveyed." Dr. Bennet.

Whilst these demands and answers are making, the rest of the congregation are not to join therein: the whole transaction being between the minister on the one side, and the Godfathers and Godmothers on the other. But that this time, instead of being lost, may be employed to the spiritual advantage of all, let every one seriously recollect what passed at his own baptism; and let him take this proper opportunity of renewing the vows which were then made for himself. When the minister begins, "Dost thou renounce?" let him say, not aloud, so as to disturb the congregation, but to himself, with a devout heart, "I do renounce the devil and all his works, &c., so that, God being my helper, I will not follow nor be led by them." When the minister saith, "Dost thou believe?" repeat to yourself the articles of your Christian faith, and at the end say in your heart, "All this I stedfastly believe." When he saith, "Wilt thou be baptized?" say softly, "Lord, I thank thee, that I have been baptized in this faith." And when he comes to the last demand, "Wilt thou then obediently keep?" say within yourself, "I will obediently keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of my life: and may the grace of God assist me herein." Thus shall we turn this part of the service to our own use, into an act of true devotion, beneficial to our own souls, and acceptable to Almighty God. Archdeacon Yardley.

[z] Answer. &c.] Since this is so solemn a covenant, the sureties must speak with a plain and audible voice to the several queries. Dean Comber. And in the words set down in the Common Prayer Book; and not, as is too much the practice of the times, give assent only by silence or a consenting bow. Archdeacon Yardley.

[a] I renounce them all.] Here some persons object, that they promise more than they are able to perform. For, say they, how can we undertake that the child shall renounce the devil, &c., when perhaps, after all our care, he will prove very untoward and wicked? The answer is, that it appears from the foregoing note, that neither the sureties do promise, nor does the Church desire them to promise, that the child shall certainly do what they say in his name. They only represent the child, and speak in his name, and bring solemn obligations upon him, for his own soul's good: and they are bound to endeavour, by good advice and instruction, to prevail with the infant, as he grows up, to act accordingly. But, if the infant after all their care shall prove refractory, the sureties have nothing to answer for. They have discharged the trust reposed in them, and done what they solemnly undertook as sureties: and the neglect and forfeiture of the baptismal covenant is what the child himself must answer for at God's tribunal. Dr. Bennet.

This form of interrogating the Godfathers in the name of the child is very ancient and reasonable. Its antiquity appears from various passages in St. Chrysostom, Cyprian, Cyril, and Augustine. And that it is reasonable we shall perceive, if we consider, that in baptism we are making or concluding a "covenant," the new covenant of the Gospel; in which covenant God's part is promises, precious promises, as St. Peter calls them, 2 Pet. i. 4, for performance of which He hath given his word; and therefore good reason it is, that we also should give our word and promise for performance of the conditions on our parts, namely, to renounce the devil and the world, and swear fidelity to our Lord. In all other covenants and contracts it is thought reasonable, that the several parties should mutually engage for performance of conditions, and that at the making and concluding of the contract. And why should not that, which is thought reasonable in all other contracts, be thought reasonable in this? As thus to give our faith and word for performance of conditions is reasonable; so, if it be done with grave solemnity, and in publick, it is so much the better, and more obliging: for grave solemnities make a deep impression upon the apprehension: (whence it is, that a corporal oath vested with the religious solemnity of laying the hand upon, and kissing the holy Gospels, is more dreaded, than a naked and sudden oath:) and promises made in publick bind more, because of the shame of falsifying, where so many eyes look on: which very shame of being noted to be false oft-times is a greater bridle to sin, than the fear of punishment, as the world knows. And this use the ancient fathers made of it, to shame gross offenders, by remembering them of their solemn promise made in baptism, to renounce the devil, and give up themselves to God.

"Children, who by reason of their tender age, cannot perform this solemnity," have appointed them by the Church, Susceptores, Godfathers, who shall in the name of the child do it for them. As, by the wisest laws of the world, guardians may contract for their minors or pupils to their benefit; and what the guardians in such cases undertake, the minors or pupils are bound, when they are able to perform; for the law looks upon them, not the guardians, as obliged: so did the Church always account, that these promises, which were made by the Godfathers in the name of the child, did bind the child, as if in person himself had made it. And when the ancients did upbraid any offenders with the breach of their promise made in baptism, none of those, that were baptized in their infancy, were so desperate, as to answer scornfully, It was not I, but my Godfathers, that promised; and if any should so have answered, he would have been loudly laughed at for that his empty criticism.

Though this promise of abrenunciation made in baptism be ancient and reasonable, yet it is not "absolutely necessary" to baptism; but when danger requires haste, it may be omitted, as the Church teaches in "Private Baptism;" yet if the child lives, it is to be brought to church, and this solemnity to be performed after baptism. See "Rubrick at Private Baptism." Bp. Sparrow.

[b] Then shall the Priest say, &c.] The administration of baptism, which now follows, contains, first, prayers for sanctifying the child and the water: secondly, the form of baptizing instituted by Christ Himself; thirdly, the solemn receiving of it into the Church. The first prayers are four short collects for the child, that it may receive the benefits of baptism. First, that the evil inclinations which it draws from old Adam may be mortified, and that it may put on those virtuous dispositions called the new man. Secondly, that the concupiscence, and all carnal affections, may be destroyed, so as the effects of the Spirit may live and grow in it. Thirdly, that it may have strength to triumph over the enemies it hath renounced. Lastly, that it may grow in grace, and be endued with all kinds of virtue. Secondly,

O Merciful God[c], grant[d] that the old Adam[e] in this Child may be so buried, that the new man may be raised up in him. Amen. Eph. iv. 20—24.

Grant that all carnal affections may die in him, and that all things belonging to the Spirit may live and grow in him. Amen. Rom. viii. 6.

Grant that he may have power and strength to have victory, and to Eph. vi. 10, 11. 13.

the Prayer of Consecration for sanctifying the water (which was always made in the primitive church) contains, first, a preface commemorating how baptism was one of those sacraments of remission, typified by the blood and water shed out of our Saviour's side on the cross; and how it was instituted after his resurrection by his own express command; the words of which divine institution were anciently believed to consecrate the water, and to oblige the most holy Author to join his Spirit to the water, to make it effectual to that regeneration which is the inward part of this sacrament. And since the Spirit is necessary as well as the water, the whole congregation joins in beseeching Him by whose commission we do this, to sanctify the water for the washing away of sin, and so to let his Spirit go along with the outward part, that it may not only seal the child's pardon, but convey grace into it, to make it a living member of Christ, and a child of God, and to keep it in that estate for ever. Thirdly, the holy actions follow; first, naming the child with a new name, answerable to the new nature it here receives, a Christian name, as a remembrance of that religion it is entered into, given by the Godfather as a memorial of its new relations which it gets in baptism. Secondly, the form by which it is baptized, being of Christ's own inditing, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost:" and as the apostles only had commission to do this, so with us only lawful ministers may baptize. And since the belief of the Trinity is the peculiar and distinguishing article of the Christian religion, therefore Christ appoints they shall be made Christians by being thus baptized in the name of the three Persons of the Trinity: and while we pronounce Christ's words, we dip the child in the water, or (which custom, and the coldness of our climate, hath now made almost necessary) sprinkle it, because the efficacy of the sacrament depends not on the quantity of water, but on the grace of God, which we believe to be conveyed by this divine sacrament, and therefore say "Amen." Fourthly, having thus baptized it as Christ appointed, we first declare the child is a Christian, and a member of the Church, into which holy society the minister (as a steward of God's family) doth solemnly receive it, (and of old this was done with a kiss of charity,) and for the clearer manifestation that this child now belongs to Christ, we set his sign and peculiar mark upon it, signing it with the sign of the cross on the forehead, (a custom by which the primitive Christians declared what religion they were of,) for Christians only believe in a crucified Saviour, and therefore the cross was the badge of a Christian, and that in which St. Paul gloried: and though the Papists have abused this to superstition, yet that ought not to hinder us from restoring it to its first innocent use, namely, to be a token that this child shall confess the faith of Christ crucified, and to be the soldier's badge, to declare it is now listed under Christ's banner, and hath engaged to fight very courageously against all its spiritual enemies, under that victorious leader: and now that it is thus listed and signed with Christ's cognizance, we hope it will continue his faithful servant and soldier to its life's end, and we pray it may do so. Amen. Dean Comber.

[c] O merciful God, &c.] It is desirable, that the minister at this place make a short pause, that the congregation may have sufficient time to kneel down, and direct their minds to God, and be ready to join in the following excellent prayer. Dr. Bennet.

The contract being now made, it is fit the minister should more peculiarly intercede with God for grace to perform it: and therefore in the next place he offers up four short petitions: the first, for the child's regeneration; the second, for his sanctification; the third, for power against spiritual enemies; the fourth, for increase of grace. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

There was a custom which obtained in the early ages of the Church, which was to exorcise the baptized person, or to cast Satan out of him, who was supposed to have taken possession of his body in his unregenerate state. But because, in process of time, many superstitions and unwarrantable practices mixed with this ancient rite, especially in the Roman church, our reformers wisely thought fit to lay it quite aside, and to substitute in lieu of it these short excellent prayers: wherein the minister and the congregation put up their petitions to Almighty God, that the child may be delivered from the power of the devil, and receive all the benefits of the divine grace and protection, without the ancient ceremony attending it. Dr. Nicholls.

[d] O merciful God, grant &c.] The first Collect is taken out of Romans, vi. 4—6; where the apostle teaches us, that a principal end of baptism is for the mortifying of the old man, or old Adam; that is, for the destruction of original corruption, and the extirpation of all evil concupiscence, which being slain and buried as it were, then the new man, that is, a gracious disposition, doth succeed by the Spirit's entering into us. 2. As the former Collect petitions for the removing of the cause, so the second does for the destruction of the effects; carnal affections, and inclinations to lust, covetousness, and vain-glory, spring from original sin, and are the branches and fruits of that root of bitterness; these evil fruits we pray may be rooted up by the Spirit, and that in their stead may be planted spiritual affections, heavenly desires, holy purposes, the love of God, and the like; that so the child may keep his covenant with ease and delight. 3. The third Collect goes farther, and sues for spiritual strength, not only that he may not be conquered, but may conquer and triumph over those enemies, which he hath now defied: and since human nature hath no such power of its own, we therefore beg of Him who is able to subdue all things to Himself. 4. The last Collect advanceth still higher, desiring that this child, and all others to whom this salutary rite shall be administered, may not only "cease to do evil," but "learn to do well," Isa. i. 16, 17; not only "escape the pollutions of the world, but "add to their faith virtue," 2 Pet. i. 4, 5. We pray that they may be endued with grace and heavenly qualities, meekness and charity, faith and patience, temperance and sobriety, zeal and devotion, &c.: so that they may obtain eternal life, which, though it be not due by the servant's merit, yet shall be bestowed by the mercy of the Master upon all that are so qualified. Dean Comber.

[e] — that the old Adam &c.] By "the old Adam" we mean that original pollution, which we derive from our parents: and by "the new man" we mean that gracious renovation, which is wrought in us by the Spirit of God through Jesus Christ. And by the burial of the one, and the raising up of the other, we mean the mortification of the one, and the increase and vigour of the other. Dr. Bennet.

[f] Almighty, everliving God,] The word of God teacheth us, that the world was darkness, and a chaos, until "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," Gen. i. 2; whence the rude and indigested matter received a quickening influence, which produced that beauty and order that we now behold. And, as it was in the first creation and generation of all things, so it is in the new creation and generation of a Christian: the Spirit moving upon the waters of baptism giveth light and life, and bringeth in order and comeliness instead of the confusion and darkness which sin had caused. Wherefore, since there is so great a work to be done by the Spirit, we must most humbly beseech, that the Holy Spirit may return to its ancient seat. That the primitive Christians always used a prayer for the consecrating of the water, appears by many witnesses; and, what is more, their prayers consisted of two principal parts, as ours also doth: namely, 1. the repetition of Christ's word, Matt. xxviii. 19; and 2. a petition for the Holy Spirit. Only the present form is somewhat fuller. Dean Comber.

[g] — did shed out of his most precious side both water and blood,] We read that when our Lord was crucified, "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water," John xix. 34. This was a part of our Saviour's passion, which He underwent for our sakes. And whether it had any significancy in it with respect to Christian baptism or not; or whether it was only the natural consequence of a wound in that part of our Saviour's body: for, the pericardium being wounded, a liquor resembling blood and water would probably issue forth; yet, since the matter of fact was undoubtedly true, it may lawfully be mentioned and taken notice of in this place. Dr. Bennet.

[h] — sanctify this Water to the mystical washing away of sin;] By a passage of St. Cyprian it should seem, that the ancient Christians had a custom in their baptism, to have a consecratory prayer for the dedication of the baptismal water to the sacred use, for which it was designed. But the Roman church afterwards added to this several strange and superstitious rites: breathing into it, making crosses over it, quenching in it a wax candle, mixing chrism in it, and this to be done only upon a certain day of the year, and kept afterwards for use. But our Church has reduced all to primitive practice, being content with only a prayer, to separate the water from a vulgar to a sacred use. Dr. Nicholls.

[i] — grant that this Child, now to be baptized therein, &c.] In baptism, the nature and substance of water doth still remain, and yet it is not bare water: it is changed, and made the sacrament of regeneration. It is water consecrated. Bp. Cosin.

[k] Then the Priest shall take the Child into his hands, &c.] All things being thus prepared for the baptism of the child, the minister is now to "take it into his hands," and to ask the Godfathers and Godmothers to "name" it. For the "Christian name" being given as a badge that we belong to Christ, we cannot more properly take it upon us, than when we are enlisted under his banner. We bring one name into the world with us, which we derive from our parents, and which serves to remind us of our original guilt, and that we are born in sin: but this new name is given us at our baptism to remind us of our new birth, when, being washed in the laver of regeneration, we are thereby cleansed from our natural impurities, and become in a manner new creatures, and solemnly dedicate ourselves to God. So that the naming of children at this time hath been thought by many to import something more than ordinary, and to carry with it a mysterious signification. We find something like it even among the heathens: for the Romans had a custom of naming their children on the day of their lustration, (that is, when they were cleansed and washed from their natural pollution,) which was therefore called "Dies Nominalis." And the Greeks also, when they carried their infants, a little after their birth, about the fire, (which was their ceremony of dedicating or consecrating them to their gods,) were used at the same time to give them their names.

And that the Jews named their children at the time of circumcision, the holy Scriptures, Gen. xxi. 3, 4; Luke i. 59, 60; ii. 21, as well as their own writers, expressly tell us. And though the rite itself of circumcision was changed into that of baptism by our Saviour, yet He made no alteration as to the time and custom of giving the name, but left that to continue under the new, as He had found it under the old dispensation. Accordingly we find this time assigned and used to this purpose ever since; the Christians continuing from the earliest ages to name their children at the time of baptism. Wheatly.

[l] — and shall say to the Godfathers and Godmothers, &c.] This rubrick directs that the name, though it may be pitched upon by the relations, be dictated by

¶ And then naming it after them (if they shall certify him[m] that the Child may well endure it) he shall dip it in the Water discreetly and warily, saying, the Godfathers and Godmothers. For this being the token of our new birth, it is fit it should be given by those who undertake for our Christianity, and engage that we shall be bred up and live like Christians; which, being confirmed by the custom and authority of the Church in all ages, is abundantly enough to justify the practice, and satisfy us of the reasonableness of it. Wheatly. We derive one name, together with our original guilt, from our parents, which ought to humble us, and remind us of our being born in sin. But this new name we receive at the time of our regeneration, to admonish us of our new birth and our heavenly kindred. This Christian name was given us, when we were listed under Christ's banner; and it is a badge that we belong to God: so that, as often as we hear it, we should remember the vow then made in our behalf. Dean Comber.

[m] — (if they shall certify him &c.] After the name is thus given, "the priest (if the Godfathers, &c. certify him that the child may well endure it) is to dip it in the water discreetly and warily;" which was in all probability the way by which our Saviour, and for certain was the usual and ordinary way by which the primitive Christians did receive their baptism, Acts viii. 38; Rom. vi. 3, 4; Col. ii. 12. And it must be allowed, that by dipping, the ends and effects of baptism are more significantly expressed; for as in immersion there are three several acts, namely, the putting the person under water, his abiding there for some time, and his rising up again; so by these were represented Christ's death, burial, and resurrection; and in conformity thereunto (as the apostle plainly shews, Rom. vi. 3, 4) our dying unto sin, the destruction of its power, and our resurrection to newness of life. Though indeed affusion is not wholly without its signification, or entirely inexpressive of the end of baptism. For as the "immersing" or "dipping" the body of the baptized represents the burial of a dead person under ground; so also the "affusion" or "pouring water" upon the party, answers to the covering or throwing earth upon the deceased. So that both ceremonies agree in this, that they figure "a death and burial unto sin:" and therefore, though immersion be the most significant ceremony of the two, yet it is not so necessary but that "affusion" in some cases may supply the room of it. For since baptism is only an external rite, representing an internal and spiritual action, such an act is sufficient, as fully represents to us the institution of baptism: the divine grace which is thereby conferred, being not measured by the quantity of water used in the administration of it. It is true "dipping" and "affusion" are two different acts; but yet the word "baptize" implies them both: it being used frequently in Scripture to denote not only such washing as is performed by dipping, but also such as is performed by pouring or rubbing water upon the thing or person washed, Mark vii. 4; Luke xi. 38. And therefore when the Jews baptized their children, in order to circumcision, it seems to have been indifferent with them, whether it was done by immersion or affusion. And that the primitive Christians understood it in this latitude, is plain, from their administering this holy sacrament in the case of sickness, haste, want of water, or the like, by affusion, or pouring water upon the face. Thus the jailor and his family, who were baptized by St. Paul in haste, the same hour of the night that they were converted and believed, Acts xvi. 33, are reasonably supposed to have been baptized by affusion; since it can hardly be thought that at such an exigency they had water sufficient at hand to be immersed in. Wheatly.

[n] But if they certify &c.] Although dipping or plunging into the water were the more ancient practice, and more universal in the primitive times; yet sprinkling or pouring water on the head of the baptized person was of great antiquity in the Church likewise. It had its beginning in the cases of sick persons chiefly, who could not come to the publick baptistery, nor could the weakness of their constitution admit of their being dipped all over in the water: and therefore the sprinkling or pouring of a small quantity of water upon the face or head was judged sufficient. In the fourth and fifth centuries aspersion was more common. After the heathen nations were converted to Christianity, and by that means the baptisms of adults were less frequent, the tenderness of children's bodies, especially in the colder countries, not enduring to be dipped in water, the use of sprinkling generally succeeded in the Church, instead of that of dipping. And indeed during the more early ages of the Church, and when adults were frequently baptized, there were some particular cases, when aspersion was used instead of immersion: as in that of some young women, noticed by St. Chrysostom. Our Church with great moderation does not totally lay aside immersion, if the strength of the child will bear it, as indeed it seldom will without danger in our cold country: in which case she admits aspersion only, rather than occasion any injury or danger to the body of a tender babe; wisely considering that in the sight of God "mercy is better than sacrifice." Dr. Nicholls.

Either of these modes of administering baptism is sufficient. For it is not in this spiritual washing, as it is in the bodily, where, if the bath be not large enough to receive the whole body, some parts may be foul, when the rest are cleansed. The soul is cleansed after another manner: a little water can cleanse the believer, as well as a whole river. The old fashion was to dip or sprinkle the person "thrice," to signify the mystery of the Trinity. The Church so appointed then because of some hereticks that denied the Trinity; upon the same ground, afterwards it was appointed to do it but once, (signifying the Unity of Substance in the Trinity,) lest we should seem to agree with the hereticks that did it thrice. This baptizing is to be at the "font." Bp. Sparrow.

[o] — it shall suffice to pour Water upon it,] It should here be noticed that our Church doth not direct sprinkling or aspersion, but affusion or "pouring of water" upon the children to be baptized. It is true the quantity of water to be used is no where prescribed, nor is it necessary that it should be: but, however the quantity be left to the minister's discretion, yet it must be understood to determine itself thus far: first, that the action be such as is properly a "washing," to make the administration correspond with the institution; and this we should observe as ministers of Christ at large; secondly, that the action be such, as is properly a "pouring of water," which is the rubrickal direction to express that washing at all times, when "dipping" is not practised; and this we are bound to observe as ministers of the Church of England in particular; taking it always for granted, that there is a reason for whatever is prescribed in a rubrick, and such an one as is not to be contradicted by our private practice, or rejected for the sake of any modes or customs brought in we know not how.

And we should the rather keep to this rule of affusion, because we have in a manner lost that more primitive way of baptizing by immersion. Custom having "certified" in general, that it is the opinion and judgment of all who bring their children to the font, that they are "too weak to endure dipping." Or, if we would have their sentiments certified more explicitly, there being a rubrick to that purpose, we are sure, as Dr. Wall observes, to find a certificate of the children's weakness in their dress: and to ask for farther satisfaction would be a mighty needless inquiry. I mention this observation of his, as the best apology I know of for our present practice of baptizing by affusion, without any formal declaration being made, according to rubrick, of the danger of "dipping." It is not said we shall ask any questions. And when we are sure beforehand what would be the answer, if the question were asked, we seem under no obligation, as we are under no direction, to put it at all. Archdeacon Sharp.

[p] I baptize thee In the Name &c.] As this form of baptism was given us by our blessed Lord, so the Catholick church has in all ages been very careful not to vary from it. And we learn from passages in the writings of Justin Martyr and Tertullian, that the Christians of their times were careful to baptize in the name of every one of the Persons of the ever-blessed Trinity distinctly. Dr. Nicholls.

When the priest dips or pours water upon the child, he is to say, (calling the child by its name,) "N. I baptize thee," which was always the form of the Western church. The Eastern church useth a little variation, "Let N. be baptized, &c." or else, "The servant of God, such a one is baptized, &c." but the sense is much the same: however, in the next words, that is, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," all orthodox Christians did ever agree; because they are of Christ's own appointment, and for that reason unalterable. Wherefore, when the heretieks presumed to vary from this form, they were censured by the church, and those baptisms declared null, which were not administered "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." Some indeed took liberty to mingle a paraphrase with them, baptizing "in the name of the Father who sent, of the Son that came, and of the Holy Ghost that witnessed;" but our Reformers thought it more prudent to preserve our Lord's own words intire, without addition or diminution.

Now by baptizing in the name of the three Persons, is not only meant that it is done by the commission and authority of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; but also that we are baptized into the faith of the holy Trinity; and are received into that society of men, who are distinguished from all false professions in the world, by believing in three Persons and one God. This is the great fundamental article, on which all the rest depend, and to which they may be referred. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[q] Then the Priest shall say, &c.] Baptism is, by the appointment of Christ Himself, the sacrament of our initiation and admission into his Church; wherefore, when any one is solemnly baptized, it is requisite he should be solemnly declared a member of the visible church, and when God hath received him into his favour, and sealed him with his Spirit, as He ever doth in this mystery where there is no impediment, we may then very justly receive him into our communion, and sign him with the cognizance of Christ's religion, as we do in this form. If we seek any precedent in Scripture for the words which follow, it may be deduced from that solemn proclamation made by God the Father, immediately after the baptism of Jesus Christ, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," Matt. iii. 17. As He by the Master, so we by the servant, are declared to belong to God. He, as his own only-begotten Son; we, as adopted by Him into the family of our heavenly Father. Again, St. Paul, speaking of the Ephesians, who were baptized, which is meant by their being "raised up together in Christ," Eph. ii. 6, declares, that, whereas they were before "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise," ver. 12, they were now become "fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the houshold of God," ver. 19. Our Lord Jesus hath rescued this poor soul from the bondage of Satan; He hath found this strange and straying sheep, and hath sent it home: wherefore let us joyfully receive it. Dean Comber.

[r] — and do sign him with the sign of the Cross.] After the priest hath baptized the child, he receives it into the congregation, by this solemnity declaring that he is by baptism made a member of the Church, 1 Cor. xii. 13. "We are all baptized into one body." And when he thus receives it, he signs it with the sign of the cross, as of old it was wont, according to St. Augustin; and on the forehead, the seat of blushing and shame, that he may not hereafter blush and be ashamed of the disgraced cross of Christ, as St. Cyprian saith. By this badge is the child dedicated to his service, whose benefits bestowed upon him in baptism, the name of the cross in holy Scripture does represent. Whosoever desires to be fully satisfied concerning the use of the cross in baptism, let him read the thirtieth canon of our Church, in the year 1603. Bp. Sparrow.

This rubrick must be expounded by the thirtieth canon of the Church, and by that which followeth: for the signing is not immediately to succeed the formal words of baptism. But the minister is first to say, "We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock;" and then to sign: and so the words "do sign" in the present tense do infallibly import. For the Church, studious to retain this ancient and universal ceremony of the purest primitive times, was also careful to decline all fear of superstitious intendment; as if she thought the sacrament imperfect without it. Therefore, whereas the primitive mode made it to usher in baptism, our Church inverted the order, and made it come after, and so to follow it, as she expressly first declareth, "the child to be received into the congregation of Christ's flock, as a perfect member thereof, and not by any power ascribed to the sign of the cross," Canon 30. And further to assure all distrustful minds, that she maketh it not of the substance of the sacrament, she hath totally omitted it in the office of private baptism. L'Estrange.

The child, being now baptized, is become a member of the Christian church, into which the minister (as a steward of God's family) doth solemnly receive it; and, for the clearer manifestation that it now belongs to Christ, solemnly signs it in the forehead with the sign of the "cross." For the better understanding of which primitive ceremony, we may observe, that it was an ancient rite for masters and generals to mark the foreheads or hands of their servants and soldiers with their names or marks, that it might be known to whom they did belong; and to this custom the angel in the Revelation is thought to allude: "Hurt not the earth, &c., till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads," Rev. vii. 3: thus again, the retinue of the Lamb are said to "have his Father's name written in their foreheads," chap. xiv. 1. And thus, lastly, in the same chapter, as Christ's flock carried his mark on their foreheads, so did his great adversary the beast sign his servants there also: "If any man shall receive the mark of the beast in his forehead, or in his hand, &c." ver. 9. Now that the Christian church might hold some analogy with those sacred applications, she conceived it a most significant ceremony in baptism, (which is our first admission into the Christian profession,) that all her children should be signed with the cross on their foreheads, signifying thereby their consignment up to Christ; whence it is often called by the ancient fathers, the "Lord's signet," and "Christ's seal." Wheatly.

The true sense and intention of the Church of England in appointing this sign appear from Dr. Burgess's sense of the matter, which was accepted by King James the First, and affirmed by the Archbishop of Canterbury to be the sense of the Church. His words in the place being referred to, (see p. 341,) are these which follow: "I know it is not made any part of the sacrament of baptism, which is acknowledged by the canon to be complete without it, and not perfected or bettered by it.

I understand it not as any sacramental, or operative, or efficacious sign bringing any virtue to baptism, or the baptized.

Where the book says, 'and do sign him with the sign of the cross in token &c.;' I understand the book not to mean, that the sign of the cross has any virtue in it to effect or further this duty; but only to intimate and express by that ceremony, by which the ancients did avow their profession of Christ crucified, what the congregation hopeth and expecteth hereafter from the infant; namely, that he shall not be ashamed to profess the faith of Christ crucified, into which he was even now baptized.

And therefore also, when the 30th canon saith, that the infant is 'by that sign dedicated unto the service of Christ,' I understand that dedication to import, not a real consecration of the child, which was done in baptism itself; but only a ceremonial declaration of that dedication, like as the priest is said to make clean the leper, whose being clean he only declared."

The Church's use of the sign of the cross, and her expressions concerning it, are fairly capable of this construction: and so authentick a declaration is sufficient to satisfy any sober inquirer, that this sense not only may be, but ought to be, received. Dr. Bennet.

[u] —to confess the faith of Christ crucified,] The heathens were wont to deride the Christians, and to speak disdainfully of them, as worshippers of a malefactor crucified. To encounter which reproach, and to shew that they "gloried in the cross of Christ," Gal. vi. 14; taking it to be an honour, not an ignominy; they assumed this ceremony of signing themselves with the cross, both in baptism, and at several other times. And this sign being significant of a duty to be elicited by future practice, good reason had our Church to continue it. L'Estrange.

It is, in brief, a mark, by which we, as the primitive Christians did, declare our religion; and no more than that, wherewith we conclude all our prayers and thanksgivings, when we say, through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Clutterbuck.

Upon the whole, the ceremony is exceeding proper, and very innocent; used by most Christians; approved by all the ancients, and by some of the most eminent reformed divines expressly; and condemned by no church; so that, if this ceremony be rejected by any, they ought to consider that the fault is in themselves, not in the thing, at which offence is taken, but none justly given, if the Church be but rightly understood. Dean Comber.

[t] Then shall the Priest say, &c.] After the child is baptized, we conclude all with, first, declaring the benefits of baptism; secondly, praying the child may receive them; thirdly, directions to the sureties in order thereto. First, there is an Exhortation to the congregation, grounded on the benefits which this infant (who, being guilty of no actual sin, could put no bar to God's grace) hath received: so that we doubt not it is inwardly regenerate, and hath obtained a new principle of grace, which will always guide it in holy ways (if it do not afterwards wickedly resist it). And secondly, we are sure it is by this holy rite made a lively member of Christ's Church. Wherefore the priest exhorts all present, first, to praise God for these benefits, and then to pray it may lead the rest of its life in a way answerable to God's mercy, and its own vows. Secondly, the priest begins these devotions, and now can say with and for this infant, being a child of God as well as any of us, "Our Father, &c." And then follows a prayer, wherein we, first, give thanks for the benefits of baptism, blessing God, first, for regenerating this child with his Holy Spirit; secondly, for adopting it in Christ Jesus to be one of his own children, and consequently making it an heir of glory; and thirdly, in order to the obtaining thereof, that he hath by this rite made it one of the members of his Church, one of that body whereof Christ is the head. And because it is possible by its wilful apostasy it may lose these benefits, secondly, we pray for grace to assist it in the whole course of its life, so that what is signified by this rite, may indeed be fulfilled, even that it may forsake all evil, and as it were be dead to all the motions of it, and may be lively and active to all good, so that it may have the benefit of Christ's death and resurrection, and with all faithful Christians may come to inherit the kingdom of glory. Amen. Lastly, we turn to the Godfathers and Godmothers, and we mind them, first, what they have done in entering this bond to God in the child's name; so that it hath promised by them to renounce all evil, to believe all saving truth, and to live in all holiness. Secondly, we shew them what they must do, namely, sincerely endeavour the child may keep this vow, by bringing it to church to be instructed by preaching and catechising in the nature and benefits of this baptismal vow, and by private endeavours with the parents and the child, that it may have a virtuous education. And the reason of this is given also, namely, because the design of baptism is to make us holy, and to oblige us to live agreeable to our religion, and to walk in a manner according to the example of Christ in all purity and virtue: and though they shall not be condemned, who use their best care to make this child keep its vow, though it should fall away; yet it is a great fault in sureties not to look after those they have engaged for, and an occasion that some fall into evil principles, others into wicked practices; which may be prevented in many, if the sureties will do their duty, especially if they will labour, first, to fit them for confirmation, and then bring them to it, for then the child enters the bond in its own name, and the surety is discharged from all but the duty of charity. Dean Comber.

Ps. ciii. 2. Acts iv. 24. nefits, and with one accord make our prayers unto him, that this Child may lead the rest of his life according to this beginning. Gal. v. 7. Phil. i. 3—6. 9—11.

"— that this Child is regenerate,] The former part of this exhortation is very frequently objected against, because it supposes all baptized infants to be "regenerated;" which, the objectors say, we cannot be certain of. But since they are "baptized into Christ's body," 1 Cor. xii. 13; and "into Christ," and have "put on Christ," Gal. iii. 27; and consequently are "new creatures," 2 Cor. v. 17; since they are "baptized for the remission of sins," Acts ii. 38; and since baptism is called "the washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5: therefore the Scripture, as well as the Church, supposes them to be "regenerated," unless the ordinances and promises of God are of none effect towards them. Veneer.

There have been some very unreasonable exceptions taken against this expression: as if all persons, who are baptized, were truly regenerate, whereas several of them prove afterwards very wicked. But this objection is grounded upon a modern notion of the word "regeneration," which neither the ancient fathers of the Church, nor the compilers of our Liturgy, knew any thing of. Indeed some writers of the last century ran into this new-fangled phrase, to denote conversion, or a returning from a lapsed state, after a notorious violation of the baptismal covenant, to an habitual state of holiness. But no ancient writer that I know of, ever expressed this by the word "regeneration." Regeneration, as often as it is used in the Scripture books, signifies the baptismal regeneration. There is but one word which answers to this in the New Testament, and that is παλιγγενεσία; and that παλιγγενεσία refers to baptism is plain, by having the word λουτρὸν joined with it: "According to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5. Our Saviour indeed made use of the like expression, before the apostle, to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God," John iii. 3. But what He means by being born again He explains, ver. 5, by directing it positively to baptism, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." "Regeneration," in the language of the fathers, constantly signifies the participation of the sacrament of baptism. The Greeks have a variety of words to express regeneration by: not only ἀναγέννησις, which is an exact translation of it; but ἀνακαινισμὸς, "renovation;" ἀνάκτισις, "recreation;" ἀνανέωσις, "renewing;" ἀνάστασις, "resurrection;" μεταβολὴ, the "change;" μεταποίησις, the "refitting;" παλιγγενεσία, the being "born again;" παλιντοκία, the "begetting again:" all which expressions are used of baptism, and seldom or never of the rise after a lapse. The language of the Latin fathers is the same. The Latin translator of Irenæus, which undoubtedly is very ancient, expresses the Greek ἀναγέννησις by "regeneration:" "baptism which is a regeneration unto God:" and so likewise calls the ἀναγεννήμενοι, the baptized, "regenerati," the "regenerate." St. Ambrose, speaking of baptism, expresses himself thus: "By baptism we are renewed, by which also we are born again." St. Austin, besides innumerable other passages, within the compass of a few lines has several expressions all to this purpose: he calls baptism "the spiritual regeneration;" he says the baptized person "is born again, because he is regenerated;" and, lastly, he calls baptism "the sacrament of regeneration." And in another place he moves a question, whether the baptism of the schismatical Donatists does confer regeneration or not; but never doubted whether that of the Catholicks did so. But when any of the ancients have occasion to express a returning to God after a state of sin; the Greeks use the word μεταμέλια, μετάνοια, &c.; the Latins, pœnitentia, conversio. The language of the Schools is exactly that of the Latin fathers in this point; they make the effect of baptism to be a "regeneration," or "a generation to a spiritual life;" but the turning to God after a course of sin they call, either "penitence," or "conversion to God." The most eminent divines of the Reformation use these words in the ancient sense. Peter Martyr uses "regeneration" for baptism; and calls the turning to God, after a state of sin, the "conversion and change of a man." Calvin, where he designs to speak with exactness, uses regeneration for the baptismal renovation, as in his catechism; though sometimes he uses it to signify conversion: but this is but seldom; he generally, with the ancient Latin writers, expressing this by "conversion." When the Quinquarticular controversy came afoot, and long treatises were written about the methods of converting grace, the divines, who managed them, being willing sometimes to vary their expressions, to make these discourses, dry enough in themselves, thereby something more pleasant, began to use "regeneration" as a synonymous word with "conversion." But in the Synod of Dort itself, though in some of the particular declarations of the divines of the several countries "regeneration" and "conversion" are used reciprocally; yet in the Synodical resolutions the word "conversion" is always used. In the sermons and books, written about the beginning of the late civil wars, "regeneration," for "repentance" or "conversion," became a very fashionable word: but sometimes oddly expressing it by "regeneration-work," &c., they made sport for vain people. However, by frequent use the word has come to obtain among grave and judicious writers, though the use of it was so very modern; insomuch that some divines, who had their education since the Quinquarticular controversy, and were concerned in the review of the Liturgy at the Restoration,

¶ Then shall be said, all kneeling:

OUR Father, which art in heaven[v], Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, pretended to find fault with the Common Prayer Book for using the word "regeneration" in the ancient sense, which it had kept for sixteen hundred years, in opposition to theirs, which was hardly sixty years old. And this is sufficient to justify the Common Prayer Book expression; and, I hope, to silence all objections under this head. Dr. Nicholls.

The sense of the Church in this passage is so plain, that no more would need to be added, but only that some, with Nicodemus, are apt to say, "How can these these things be?" John iii. 9; judging it impossible, that so great a matter as regeneration can be effected so soon, and by so mean an instrument as they account it: whereas the effect is to be ascribed to the divine power of the Author, not to the intrinsick efficacy of the outward means. Yet in regard we can never bless God heartily for a mercy, unless we believe He hath bestowed it, we must labour to remove these scruples by a fuller account of this baptismal regeneration, that we may not withhold the divine praises, by our doubting and unbelief. The word "regeneration" is but twice, that I know of, used in Scripture: first, Matt. xix. 28; "Ye that have followed me in the regeneration:" where, though by altering the point, "Followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man," &c., it may signify the resurrection; yet, as we read, it signifies the renewing of men by the Gospel and baptism. Secondly, Titus iii. 5, "He saved us by the laver of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost," which is a paraphrase upon that of our Saviour, John iii. "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven," ver. 5.

And because persons, come to age before their conversion, are first taught and persuaded by the word of God, the language of holy writ enlarges the metaphor, and saith, such are "begotten by the word of God," 1 Cor. iv. 15; and then born again or regenerated in baptism. In like manner speak the fathers, who do constantly and unanimously affirm, that we are regenerated in or by baptism. So that we must next inquire wherein this regeneration doth consist.

And first, whereas both children and those of riper years are by nature dead in sin, so that they live under the guilt and power thereof; our gracious Father doth here in baptism seal a covenant with us, wherein He promises to pardon us; and, when this deadly load is removed, the soul receives, as it were, a new life, and takes new hopes and courage, being restored to the divine favour, and being set free from the sad expectations of condemnation for former sin, original in infants, and both it and actual in those of riper years. Before this covenant we were dead in law, and by the pardon of our sins we are begotten again to a lively hope; and herein stands the first particular of our regeneration, namely, in the remission of sins: wherefore both Scripture and antiquity teach us, Luke iii. 3; Acts ii. 38; chap. xxii. 16; that baptism is the means for remission of sin; and hence they join pardon and regeneration commonly together, because this forgiveness puts us into a new estate, and an excellent condition, in comparison of that which our natural birth had left us in.

Secondly, but further, by baptism we gain new relations, and old things being done away all things become new. Hence the Jews called their proselytes "newborn children," because they forsook all their heathen kindred; so we, although we do not renounce our earthly parents, because they also are Christians, yet we gain new alliances; for God hereby doth become our Father, and Jesus our Master, and all the saints both in heaven and earth our brethren; so that it is as if we were born over again, since baptism doth entitle us to this celestial kindred.

But this is not all. For, thirdly, our corrupt nature is changed in baptism, and there is a renovation effected thereby, both as to the mortification of the old affections, and the quickening of the new, by the Holy Spirit, which is hereby given to all that put no bar or impediment unto it. This was the ancients' doctrine, who affirmed a real change to be wrought, and believed the Spirit to be therein bestowed, as God had promised, Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, "That he would sprinkle clean water upon them, and they should be clean from all their filthiness, and then a new heart would he give them, and put a new spirit within them." And it is manifest, that, in the first ages of the Church, there was abundance of gifts and graces miraculously bestowed upon Christians in their baptism; and no doubt, if the catechumens of our days, who are of age, would prepare themselves as strictly by repentance, fasting, and prayer, as they of old did, they should find incomparable effects of this sacred laver, if not in as miraculous measures, yet to as real purposes; that is, they should be truly regenerated, and their hearts changed by the influence of the divine Spirit. But some may doubt whether infants be regenerated in this sense, because they are not capable of giving any evidences of their receiving the Spirit, nor doth there any immediate effects of their regeneration appear: hence the Pelagians denied it; but they are therefore condemned by the Milevitan council, and confuted by St. Augustine. It is confessed they can shew no visible signs of spiritual life in the operations thereof, no more can they of their having a rational soul, for some time; and yet we know they have the power of reason within them: and since all infants are alike, either all do here receive a principle of new life, or none receive it; wherefore I see no reason why we may not believe, as the ancients did, that God's grace, which is dispensed according to the capacity of the suscipient, is here given to infants to heal their nature, and that He bestowed on them such measures of his Spirit as they can receive; for the malignant effects of the first Adam's sin are not larger than the free gift obtained by the second Adam's righteousness, Rom. v. 15. 18. And if it be asked how it comes to pass then that so many children do afterwards fall off to all impurity; I answer, so do too many grown persons also; and neither infants, nor men, are so regenerated in this life, as absolutely to extinguish the concupiscence; for the flesh will still lust against the Spirit: but then God gives the Spirit also to lust against the flesh, Gal. v. He leaves the corruption to try and exercise us, but so that He engageth to enable us to get the better, through this new nature planted in us, if we will improve it, and follow the dictates of his Holy Spirit; but by neglect, or wilful complying with the flesh, we may lose this grace again: our gracious Father hath already done his part, and will do it more and more as the child shall be capable and willing to receive it. And, if this seem strange to any, whose opinions are taken up from later definitions of regeneration, let them dispute with holy Cyprian, not with me, who saith, "The grace of God is equally distributed in baptism, but it may either be diminished or increased afterward, by our acts and conversation."

And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

WE yield thee hearty thanks[x], most merciful Father, that it hath pleased thee to regenerate this Infant with thy holy Spirit, to receive him for thine own Child by adoption, and to incorporate him into thy holy Church. And humbly we beseech thee to grant[y], that he, being dead unto sin, and living unto righteousness, and being buried with Christ in his death, may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin; and that, as he is made partaker of the death of thy Son, he may also be partaker of his resurrection; so that finally, with the residue of thy holy Church, he may be an inheritor of thine everlasting kingdom; through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The sum is, that baptism doth seal a pardon to us for all former transgression, and begets us again to the hope of eternal life; that it restores us to the favour of God, and gives us a new relation to Him; and finally it heals our nature by the Spirit hereby conveyed to us: and, though all this be upon condition of our keeping our part of the covenant, yet that makes not God's mercy less, nor ought it to diminish any of our praises; but only it must make our prayers at present more earnest, and the child's care more strict hereafter to make this its calling and election sure.

This is I hope the sense of our Church, as well as of the primitive; and if so, it will not be material to a judicious Christian for any to say, it doth not agree to some modern systems. Dean Comber.

[y] Our Father, which art in heaven, &c.] The Lord's Prayer having been prescribed by our Saviour to his disciples, as a badge of their belonging to Him; it can never be more reasonable or proper to use it than now, when a new member and disciple is admitted into his church. And therefore, whereas, in other offices, this prayer is generally placed in the beginning, it is here reserved till after the child is baptized, and received solemnly into the Church: when we can more properly call God "our Father," with respect to the infant, who is now by baptism made a member of Christ, and more peculiarly adopted a child of God. And this is exactly conformable to the primitive Church: for the catechumens were never allowed to use this prayer, till they had first made themselves sons by regeneration in the waters of baptism. For which reason this prayer is frequently, by the ancient writers, called "The Prayer of the regenerate," or "believers," as being, properly speaking, their privilege and birthright. Wheatly.

[x] We yield thee hearty thanks, &c.] We begin this form with acknowledgments and praises, in imitation of the Jews; who, when the child is circumcised, use to say, "Blessed be the Lord our God, who hath sanctified us with his precepts, and commanded us to bring this child into the covenant of Abraham:" but this child enters into a better covenant, established upon better promises, so that we have more cause to bless God than they. Hence in the East they sang after baptism the thirty-second Psalm, "Blessed is he whose iniquity is forgiven, &c.:" and, St. Ambrose saith, the priest spoke to the person baptized in this manner, "God the Father Almighty, who hath regenerated thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and forgiven thee thy sins, &c.:" which shews, that the ancients did not question the effect of the sacrament, no, not in persons of age, until their future conversation declared they had broken their covenant. How much more then ought we to believe this in the case of infants, who can put no impediment to the grace of God, and are all alike, so that either all or none receive these blessings? Dean Comber.

[y] — And humbly we beseech thee to grant, &c.] In this second part of the prayer also we have a precedent in the Jewish rites after circumcision: only that our prayers are more spiritual; for inward grace rather than outward blessings; and good reason, for all the benefits of baptism will vanish, unless they be afterwards improved; they will not have their full effect, unless the conditions be performed. Neither we do, nor did the primitive Church, believe them to be so regenerate or so endued with the Spirit, but that by sloth and wilful iniquity they may be deprived of all again: their corruptions are not so mortified, but that by compliance and base negligence they may revive again, so that the last state shall be worse than the first, and it shall be more tolerable for heathens than for vile apostates. Wherefore we beg most humbly and earnestly, that this child may love as one, upon whom such great favours are bestowed. The words of these requests are St. Paul's, Rom. vi. 4—6, and 11—13; and the phrase is frequently used by the fathers in this case. Dean Comber.

[z] Then, all standing up, the Priest shall say to the Godfathers &c.] Because nothing tends more directly to the securing of holiness and religion, than a conscientious performance of this vow of baptism, to our prayers for the fulfilling thereof are here added our endeavours. In the first ages, when those of discretion were baptized, the "applications" were directed to the persons themselves, (as they now are in our "office of baptism for those of riper years,") but since children are now most commonly the subjects of baptism, who are not capable of admonition, here is a serious and earnest exhortation made to the sureties. Wheatly.

It is earnestly to be desired, that sponsors would seriously consider this excellent exhortation: and take due care of practising accordingly in every particular; considering what a dreadful account they must give to God, if they neglect the performance of that duty, which in the face of God and his Church they have so solemnly taken upon themselves. Dr. Bennet.

And this exhortation, if well considered, will shew serve him; ye must remember, that it is your parts and duties to see that this Infant be taught, so soon as he shall be able to learn, what a solemn vow, promise, and profession, he hath here made by you. And that he may know these things the better, ye shall call upon him to hear Sermons; and chiefly ye shall provide that he may learn the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue[a], and all other things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health; and that this Child may be virtuously brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life; remembering always that Baptism doth represent unto us our profession; which is, to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto him; that, as he died, and rose again for us, so should we, who are baptized, die from sin, and rise again unto righteousness; continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living.

¶ Then shall he add and say,

YE are to take care that this Child be brought to the Bishop to be confirmed by him, so soon as he can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue, and be further instructed in the Church-Catechism set forth for that purpose.

IT is certain by God's Word[b], that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.

how improper it is for any to undertake this trust merely in compliment; how absurd to put little children (whose bond is not good in human courts) upon this weighty office; and also how ridiculous for those who have taken this duty upon them, to think they can shake off this charge again, and assign it over to the parents. But yet this is frequently the custom of this licentious age, and the chief occasion of many people's falling into evil principles and wicked practices, which might easily be prevented, if the sureties would do their duty, and labour to fit their God-children for confirmation, and bring them to it; which therefore the minister is in the last place to advertise the sureties of; for till the child by this means enters the bond in his own name, the sureties must answer for all miscarriages through their neglect: whereas, as soon as the child is confirmed, the sureties are freed from that danger, and discharged from all but the duty of charity. Dean Comber, Wheatly,

[a] — in the vulgar tongue,] It stood formerly "in the English tongue." The alteration was made in compliance, as it would seem, with a suggestion of Bishop Cosin, that "suppose, as it often falls out, that children of strangers, which never intend to stay in England, be brought there to be baptized," it would be exceptionable that "they also should be exhorted and enjoined to learn those principles of religion in the English tongue." Edit.

[b] It is certain by God's Word, &c.] Since it has been already shewn, page 348, note u, that infants, rightly baptized, are born again of the Holy Ghost, and put into a state of salvation; it necessarily follows, that children rightly baptized, which is here supposed, are undoubtedly saved, if they die before they commit actual sin. For, without the commission of actual sin, it is impossible that they should forfeit the benefits of the covenant, of which they are made partakers by baptism. Dr. Bennet.

[c] To take away all scruple &c.] The thirtieth canon, here referred to, is as follows: "We are sorry that his Majesty's most princely care and pains taken in the conference at Hampton Court, amongst many other points, touching this one of the cross in baptism, hath taken no better effect with many, but that still the use of it in baptism is so greatly struck at and impugned. For the further declaration therefore of the true use of this ceremony, and for the removing of all such scruple, as might any ways trouble the consciences of them who are indeed rightly religious, following the royal steps of our most worthy King, because he therein followeth the rules of the Scriptures, and the practice of the primitive Church; we do commend to all the true members of the Church of England these our directions and observations ensuing.

First, it is to be observed, that, although the Jews and Ethnicks derided both the apostles and the rest of the Christians, for preaching and believing in Him, who was crucified upon the cross; yet all, both apostles and Christians, were so far from being discouraged from their profession by the ignominy of the cross, as they rather rejoiced and triumphed in it. Yea, the Holy Ghost by the mouths of the apostles did honour the name of the cross (being hateful among the Jews) so far, that under it He comprehended, not only Christ crucified, but the force, effects, and merits of his death and passion, with all the comforts, fruits, and promises, which we receive or expect thereby.

Secondly, the honour and dignity of the name of the cross begat a reverend estimation even in the apostles' times (for ought that is known to the contrary) of the sign of the cross, which the Christians shortly after used in all their actions; thereby making an outward shew and profession, even to the astonishment of the Jews, that they were not ashamed to acknowledge Him for their Lord and Saviour, who died for them upon the cross. And this sign they did not only use themselves with a kind of glory, when they met with any Jews, but signed therewith their children, when they were christened, to dedicate them by that badge to his service, whose benefits bestowed upon them in baptism the name of the cross did represent.

And this use of the sign of the cross in baptism was held in the primitive Church, as well by the Grecks as the Latins, with one consent and great applause. At what time, if any had opposed themselves against it, they would certainly have been censured as enemies of the name of the cross, and consequently of Christ's merits, the sign whereof they could no better endure. This continual and general use of the sign of the cross is evident by many testimonies of the ancient fathers.

Thirdly, it must be confessed, that in process of time the sign of the cross was greatly abused in the church of Rome, especially after that corruption of popery had once possessed it. But the abuse of a thing doth not take away the lawful use of it. Nay, so far was it from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the churches of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like churches, in all things which they held, and practised, that, as the apology of the Church of England confesseth, it doth with reverence retain those ceremonies, which do neither endamage the church of God, nor offend the minds of sober men; and only departed from them in those particular points, wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity, and from the apostolical churches which were their first founders; in which respect, amongst some other very ancient ceremonies, the sign of the cross in baptism hath been retained in this Church, both by the judgment and practice of those reverend fathers and great divines in the days of King Edward the Sixth, of whom some constantly suffered for the profession of the truth: and others, being exiled in the time of Queen Mary, did after their return in the beginning of the reign of our late dread Sovereign continually defend and use the same.

This resolution and practice of our Church hath been allowed and approved by the censure upon the Communion book in King Edward the Sixth's days, and by the harmony of confessions of later years; because indeed the use of this sign in baptism, was ever accompanied here with such sufficient cautions and exceptions against all popish superstition and error, as in the like cases are either fit or convenient.

First, the Church of England, since the abolishing of popery, hath ever held and taught, and so doth hold and teach still, that the sign of the cross used in baptism is no part of the substance of that sacrament: for, when the minister, dipping the infant in water, or laying water upon the face of it, (as the manner also is,) hath pronounced these words, 'I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' the infant is fully and perfectly baptized. So as the sign of the cross, being afterwards used, doth neither add any thing to the virtue and perfection of baptism, nor being omitted doth detract any thing from the effect and substance of it.

Secondly, it is apparent in the Communion book, that the infant baptized is by virtue of baptism, before it be signed with the sign of the cross, received into the congregation of Christ's flock, as a perfect member thereof, and not by any power ascribed unto the sign of the cross. So that for the very remembrance of the cross, which is very precious to all them that rightly believe in Jesus Christ, and in the other respects mentioned, the Church of England hath retained still the sign of it in baptism: following therein the primitive and apostolical churches, and accounting it a lawful outward ceremony and honourable badge, whereby the infant is dedicated to the service of Him that died upon the cross, as by the words used in the Book of Common Prayer it may appear.

Lastly, the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, being thus purged from all popish superstition and error, and reduced in the Church of England to the primary institution of it, upon those true rules of doctrine concerning things indifferent, which are consonant to the word of God, and the judgment of all the ancient fathers, we hold it the part of every private man, both minister and other, reverently to retain the true use of it prescribed by publick authority; considering that things of themselves indifferent do in some sort alter their natures, when they are either commanded or forbidden by a lawful magistrate; and may not be omitted at every man's pleasure, contrary to the law, when they be commanded, nor used when they are prohibited."

The Church in this canon is so exceedingly express and perspicuous in her explanation of the use of the sign of the cross, as nothing can be desired more: which explication, being the product of the conference at Hampton Court, was so abundantly satisfactory to the foreman of those opponents, Dr. Reinolds, as, having once perused it, he ingenuously protested, "he would never gainsay that ceremony any more." L'Estrange.

THE MINISTRATION OF

PRIVATE BAPTISM[d] OF CHILDREN

IN HOUSES.

¶ The Curates of every Parish[e] shall often admonish the people, that they defer not the Baptism of their Children longer than the first or second Sunday next

[d] The Ministration of Private Baptism &c.] Though holy Church prescribes the font for the place, and Sundays and holy-days for the usual times of baptism, that she may conform, as much as conveniently may be, to the usages of primitive antiquity, which is her aim in all her services; and for other reasons mentioned in the first rubrick before baptism; yet in case of necessity she permits and provides, that a child may be baptized in any decent place at any time; in such cases requiring the performance only of the essentials, not the solemnities, of baptism; according to the practice of the apostles, who baptized at any time, as occasion required, and in fountains and rivers; and according to the use of succeeding ages. Nor can I see what can be reasonably objected against this tender and motherly love of the Church to her children, who chooses rather to omit solemnities, than hazard souls; which indulgence of hers cannot be interpreted any irreverence or contempt of this venerable sacrament, but a yielding to just necessity, which defends what it constrains, and to God's own rule, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice," Matt. xii. 7. Bp. Sparrow.

Our Saviour Himself hath said, that "except a man be born again of water and of the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," John iii. 5; and He makes baptism as well as faith necessary to salvation, Mark xvi. 16. Whereupon the ancient Christians did constantly affirm, that there could be no salvation in an ordinary way without baptism; and whosoever died without it, their estate was believed doubtful, unless it were in such a case as that of the emperor Valentinian, who St. Ambrose hopes might be saved by the desire of baptism, because he had no opportunity. Upon the stock of this principle grew that great care, that no person might die unbaptized, insomuch that it was allowed in danger of death to baptize them who had not passed through all their preparations; provided that they should answer more fully if God restored them. The like care hath our Church taken of little children: for, though she require that they should be speedily and publickly baptized in the house of God, yet in cases of extremity she admitteth of that which is done in private houses, even without ceremony; upon condition there may be added more of the solemnity afterwards, when it is published in the church. And, that it may not be neglected, we are taught, that "it is certain by God's word, that children baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." For it is certain by God's word, that baptism is appointed for "remission of sins," Acts xxii. 16; ii. 38: and it is also certain, that all they, whose sins are forgiven, are undoubtedly saved, Ps. xxxii. 1. But infants have no other sin but their original corruption, which being remitted in baptism, they are undoubtedly saved. And it is plain from numerous passages that the first Christians believed the same doctrine. Wherefore let no parents, who love their own or their children's souls, upon pretence of God's power or mercy, presume to neglect that, which is so certainly a means of salvation: neither let them think it indifferent, whether their children be baptized or no; for this springs from a dangerous mistake. If children be weak, the parent must immediately endeavour to procure their baptism: but, if notwithstanding all possible care they die before, we must not then confine the Almighty to the outward means; but believe He may save without, where He did not give the opportunity. And in such case the parent may take comfort in his having done what he could, and ought to hope in the divine mercy. Dean Comber.

[e] The Curates of every Parish &c.] By this rubrick the curate is required to "admonish the people not to delay the baptism of their children, nor cause them without necessity to be baptized privately in their houses." As it is not said whether these monitions shall be from the desk, or the pulpit, or given in private as need requires, so we are at liberty, as I judge, to execute this direction in such a manner as we think will most effectually serve the end designed.

The former admonition against deferring baptism there is perhaps seldom occasion for: and the latter concerning private baptism is always most reasonable, when the thing itself is proposed to us without the rubrickal warrant of a great and reasonable cause to justify it. It is the curate's part on such occasions to declare and explain the rule, by which he is to act. But when he hath done this, I will not say how far he is authorized to refuse private baptism, when seriously desired, though he be not altogether satisfied in the greatness and sufficiency of the cause. For he cannot always be a proper judge of it. He must for the most part trust to the judgment and integrity of others. But as he can, generally speaking, distinguish between reasons and pretences, between an accidental extraordinary cause and a cause of mere humour or private interest, he will do well, and as he ought, never to after their birth, or other Holy-day falling between, unless upon a great and reasonable cause, to be approved by the Curate.

¶ And also they shall warn them, that without like great cause and necessity they procure not their Children to be baptized at home[f] in their houses. But when need shall compel them so to do, then Baptism shall be administered on this fashion[g]:

¶ First, let the Minister of the Parish (or, in his absence, any other lawful Minister[h] that can be procured) with them that are present call upon God, sacrifice the rules of his ministration, and the orders of the Church, to any man's fancies, or domestick conveniences. Archdeacon Sharp.

[f] — without like great cause and necessity they procure not their Children to be baptized at home &c.] The cause of the necessity of baptizing in private houses ought to be expressed: as, "When the child is in sudden danger of death, and not likely to live so long a time, that it may be brought to publick baptism in the church:" lest otherwise all persons take upon them to judge of this cause and necessity at their pleasure. Bp. Cosin.

[g] — then Baptism shall be administered on this fashion:] So that, whenever baptism is administered in a private house, this private office only must be used: and the Church must be understood to forbid the use of the office of publick baptism upon such occasions. Archdeacon Yardley.

[h] First, let the Minister of the Parish (or, in his absence, any other lawful Minister &c.)] The person, who baptizeth, ought to be a lawful minister: for Christ gave this commission only to the apostles, Matt. xxviii. 19; joining the office of preaching together with it: so that unordained persons may as well presume to preach as to baptize. And therefore the Church of old forbade women to baptize; and Epiphanius accounts it ridiculous in Marcion and his followers, to permit women to do this office: so that our Church requires it to be done by a lawful minister. I know there are some allegations out of antiquity, which seem to allow of a layman to baptize in cases of great necessity. But there are others of the fathers, who disallow that practice. And certainly it is a great presumption for an ordinary person to invade the ministerial office without any warrant. And, as to the pretence that a child may be in danger, I suppose the salvation of the child may be as safe upon the stock of God's mercy without any baptism, as with a baptism which is not commanded by God, and to which He hath made no promises. So that where God gives not opportunity of a person who may do it aright, it seems better to leave it undone. Dean Comber.

The admission of persons by baptism into the Church is an act of authority which none should pretend to, but those who are thereunto empowered by Christ the head of it: and in his name it is, that they on God's part promise remission of sins and spiritual regeneration, which came primarily and originally from God, and are never conveyed to man in the sacraments, but by those whom He hath been pleased to make his instruments. That this is the opinion of our Church is plain from her declaration in the twenty-third Article, where she saith, "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of publick preaching or ministry of the sacraments in the congregation, before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same:" and in her twenty-sixth Article she discovers the grounds, on which she passeth this judgment, because "Those, who have authority in the ministration of the word and sacraments, do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and authority." Archdeacon Yardley.

When necessity requires that baptism be privately administered, "the minister of the parish, or (in his absence) some other lawful minister, is to be procured." This is an order which was not made till after the conference at Hampton Court, upon the accession of King James I. to the throne. In both Common Prayer Books of King Edward, and in that of Queen Elizabeth, the rubrick was only this: "First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Prayer, if the time will suffer; and then one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words, N. I baptize thee, &c." Now this, it is plain from the writings and letters of our first Reformers, was originally designed to commission lay-persons to baptize in cases of necessity; being founded upon an error which our Reformers had imbibed in the Romish church, concerning the impossibility of salvation without the sacrament of baptism: which therefore being in their opinion so absolutely necessary, they chose should be administered by any body that was present, in cases of extremity, rather than any should die without it.

But afterwards, when they came to have clearer notions of the sacraments, and perceived how absurd it was to confine the mercies of God to outward means; and especially when they came to consider that the salvation of the child might be as safe in God's mercy, without any baptism, as with one performed by persons not duly commissioned to administer it: when the governours of our Church, I say, came to be convinced of this, they thought it proper to explain the rubrick above mentioned in such a manner, as should exclude any private persons from administering baptism. Accordingly, when some articles were passed by both Houses of Convocation, in the year 1575, the Archbishop and Bishops (who had power and authority in their several dioceses "to resolve all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in the Book of Common Prayer") unanimously resolved, that "even private baptism, in case of necessity," was only to be administered by a lawful minister or deacon; and that all other persons should be inhibited to intermeddle with the ministering of baptism privately, as being no part of their vocation. Bishop Gibson tells us, this Article was not published in the printed copy: but whether on the same account that the fifteenth Article was left out, (which was, that marriage might be solemnized at any time of the year, provided the banns were duly published, and no impediment objected,) namely, because disapproved by the crown, he cannot certainly tell: but it seems by the account that Mr. Collier gives us, as if it was published; for after all the Articles he only remarks from the journal of the Convocation, that the Queen refused to assent to the last Article, (that is, the fifteenth above mentioned,) for which reason, saith he, it was not published with the rest, which seems plainly to imply that all the rest were published. However, whether it was published or not, the bare "publishing of it in writing in every parish-church of every diocese in the province of Canterbury" by order of the Bishops, who had un-

N. I baptize thee In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

¶ Then, all kneeling down, the Minister shall give thanks unto God, and say,

WE yield thee hearty thanks, most merciful Father, that it hath pleased thee to regenerate this Infant with thy holy Spirit, to receive him for thine own Child by adoption, and to incorporate him into thy holy Church. And we humbly beseech thee to grant, that as he is now made partaker of the death of thy Son, so he may be also of his doubted authority to explain the rubrick, was sufficient to restrain the sense of the rubrick in such a manner as should inhibit all persons not ordained from presuming to intermeddle with the administering of baptism. But besides this, Mr. Collier tells us, that notwithstanding none but the Archbishop and Bishops are mentioned for their concurrence in these Articles, yet in the Archbishop's mandate for the publication, they are said to be agreed, settled, and subscribed by both Houses of Convocation. So that from this time, notwithstanding the rubrick might continue in the same words, it is certain it gave no licence or permission to lay-persons to baptize. On the contrary, the Bishops, in their visitations, censured the practice, and declared that the rubrick inferred no such latitude.

However, upon the accession of King James I. to the throne, the matter was again debated in the Hampton Court conference: the result of which was, that instead of those words, "Let them that be present call upon God, &c." the rubrick should be, "Let the lawful minister, and them that be present, &c." And instead of what follows, namely, "Then one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying;" it was ordered, that, "the child being named by some one that is present, the said lawful minister shall dip it in water, &c." And thus the rubrick stood till the review at the Restoration, when it only underwent some small variation; "the minister of the parish" being first named as the most proper person to be sent for, if not out of the way; but "in his absence any other lawful minister is to be called in that can be procured." The Church only provides that none but a "minister," or one "duly ordained," presume to intermeddle in it: well knowing that the persons, by whom baptism is to be administered, are plainly as positive a part of the institution, as any thing else relating to that ordinance; and consequently that the power of administering it must belong to those only whom Christ hath authorized by the institution. It is true, there are some few of the primitive writers, who allow laymen to baptize in case of necessity: but there are more and earlier of the fathers, who disallow that practice: and upon mature consideration of the several passages, it will generally be found that these latter, for the most part, speak the judgment of the Church, whilst the former only deliver their private opinion. And therefore certainly it is a great presumption for an unordained person to invade the ministerial office without any warrant. What sufficient plea the church of Rome can pretend, for suffering even midwives to perform this sacred rite, I am wholly ignorant. For as to the pretence of the child's danger, we may be sure that its salvation may be as safe in God's mercy without any baptism, as with such a one as He has neither commanded nor made any promises to: so that where God gives no opportunity of having baptism administered by a person duly commissioned, it seems much better to leave it undone.

If it be asked, whether baptism, when performed by an unordained person, be, in the sense of our Church, "valid" and "effectual?" I answer, that, according to the best judgment we can form from her publick acts and offices, it is not. For she not only supposes, in the sixty-ninth Canon, that a child will die unbaptized, if the regular minister does not come time enough to baptize it; but in the abovesaid determination of the Bishops and Convocation, she expressly declares, that even in "cases of necessity," baptism is only to be administered by a "lawful" minister or deacon, and directly inhibits all other persons from intermeddling with it, though ever so "privately, as being no part of their vocation:" a plain intimation that no baptism, but what is administered by persons duly ordained, is valid or effectual. For if baptism administered by persons not ordained be valid and sufficient to convey the benefits of it, why should such persons be prohibited to administer it in cases of real necessity, when a regular minister cannot be procured? It would surely be better for the child to have it from any hand, if any hand could give it, than that it should die without the advantage of it. Our Church therefore, by prohibiting all from intermeddling in baptism but a "lawful" minister, plainly hints, that when baptism is administered by any others, it conveys no benefit or advantage to the child, but only brings upon those who pretend to administer it the guilt of usurping a sacred office: and consequently that persons so pretendedly baptized (if they live to be sensible of their state and condition) are to apply to their lawful minister or bishop for that holy sacrament, of which they only received a profanation before. Wheatly.

[i] — say the Lord's Prayer, and so many of the Collects &c.] Of which it is much to be desired, that the prayer, appointed for the consecration of the water, be never, unless absolutely necessary, omitted. For, besides the propriety of this prayer to beg a blessing upon the administration in general, it has already been shewn how important a part of the Office of Baptism the primitive Christians esteemed the consecration of the water. Wheatly.

[j] — the Minister shall pour Water upon it.] All the old Common Prayers say, he shall either "dip it in water, or pour water upon it:" but baptism in private being never allowed, but when the child is weak, the rubrick was properly altered at the last review, and the order for dipping left out; it being not to be supposed, that the child in its sickness should be able to endure it. Wheatly.

resurrection; and that finally, with the residue of thy Saints, he may inherit thine everlasting kingdom; through the same thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ And let them not doubt[k], but that the Child so baptized is lawfully and sufficiently baptized, and ought not to be baptized again. Yet nevertheless, if the Child, which is after this sort baptized, do afterward live, it is expedient that it be brought into the Church, to the intent that, if the Minister[l] of the same Parish did himself baptize that Child, the Congregation may be certified of the true Form of Baptism, by him privately before used; In which case he shall say thus[m],

I Certify you, that according to the due and prescribed Order of the Church, at such a time and at such a place, before divers witnesses I baptized this Child.

¶ But if the Child were baptized by any other lawful Minister, then the Minister of the Parish where the Child was born or christened, shall examine and try whether the Child be lawfully baptized, or no. In which case, if those that bring any Child to the Church do answer, that the same Child is already baptized, then shall the Minister examine them further, saying[n],

BY whom was this Child baptized?

Who was present when this Child was baptized?

Because some things essential to this Sacrament may happen to be omitted through fear or haste, in such times of extremity; therefore I demand further of you,

With what matter was this Child baptized?

With what words was this Child baptized[o]?

[k] And let them not doubt, &c.] The Church adds this by way of explanation, lest any one should imagine, that the sacrament, administered in this short and concise manner, is not complete, and the child hereby not made a Christian, or should be apt to think or say, that the child is only half-christened, as too many ignorant people foolishly and absurdly express themselves. Archdeacon Yardley.

[l] — to the intent that, if the Minister &c.] In King Edward's and Queen Elizabeth's books, the former part of this and the latter part of the next rubrick were joined together, and made but one between them: "to the intent that the priest may examine and try whether the child, &c." All between was first added in King James's book after the conference at Hampton Court, except that the particular form of certification, in case that the minister of the same parish baptized it himself, was inserted at the Restoration. Wheatly.

[m] — In which case he shall say thus,] In this office a doubt may offer itself to the minister, as to the manner of certifying a baptism, which he himself administered. When he certifies upon the answer to the interrogatories, that the baptism was duly administered by another lawful hand, the form of the certificate, which is the same that stood in the old Prayer Books, is clear and unexceptionable, in which there is a proper transition to the Gospel or connexion of the certificate with the following part of the office. But, when he certifies his own act, by a form, that was put in at the last revisal for that purpose, it doth not appear either by the words themselves, or by the rubrick relating to these certificates, whether that form is complete as it stands, or whether it was designed only as a different preamble to be prefixed to that part of the other certificate which will connect it with the Gospel: or rather whether they are not both to be looked upon as one and the same form of certifying, with this only difference, that their respective introductions are a little diversified, mutatis mutandis, as the case to be certified requires.

In Bishop Cosin's scheme of alterations and amendments, drawn up at the Restoration, the new form of certifying, then designed to be added, stands thus:

"I certify you, that according to the due and prescribed order of the Church, in cases of necessity, at such a time, and in such a place before divers witnesses, I baptized this child, who being born in original sin," &c. referring to the remainder of the old form as a proper transition to the Gospel; by which it is plain that his design and meaning was, that, when a man certified his own act, the two forms should be thus joined or incorporated. But as neither such direction, nor such reference, is to be found in our present books, it seems a matter of discretion which method we take. We cannot be said to transgress rule by omitting that clause in the second form of certifying: nor can we be charged with altering or adding to the office, if we complete the first form by the second, as Bishop Cosin judged we ought to do, and as the natural construction of the office intimates we should. Archdeacon Sharp.

[n] — then shall the Minister examine them further, saying, &c.] When a child is brought to be received, which was baptized by some other hand, we ought to be punctual in putting the interrogatories relating to that private baptism, and in requiring the parties that are interrogated, to be clear and explicit in their answers.

Bishop Cosin's note at this place which he designed for a rubrick was this, "To every one of these questions must answers be directly given by those who bring the child:" and with good reason; because upon these answers depends our direction, either first, "to certify that in this case all is well done, and according to due order," &c.; or secondly, to use the publick office of baptism, with the hypothetical form; or, thirdly, to remit the child to those who brought it, without either hypothetical baptism, or reception into the congregation. Archdeacon Sharp.

[o] With what words was this Child baptized?] The essential words of Christ's institution are, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." For, though mention be made in the Acts of the Apostles of baptizing "in the name of Christ," ii. 38; xix. 5; yet must not the apostles be supposed to have baptized as excluding the other two Persons. For in truth, as Beza hath well observed, St. Luke doth not there describe the rite and formular of baptism, but the end and scope of initiating persons into Christianity thereby. The express precept of our Saviour obliged

¶ And if the Minister shall find[p] by the answers of such as bring the Child, that all things were done as they ought to be; then shall not he christen the Child again, but shall receive him as one of the flock of true Christian people[q], saying thus,

I Certify you, that in this case all is well done, and according unto due order, concerning the baptizing of this Child; who being born in original sin, and in the wrath of God, is now, by the laver of Regeneration in Baptism, received into the number of the children of God, and heirs of everlasting life; for our Lord Jesus Christ doth not deny his grace and mercy unto such Infants, but most lovingly doth call them unto him, as the holy Gospel doth witness to our comfort on this wise.

St. Mark x. 13.

THEY brought young children to Christ, that he should touch them; and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little even the Apostles themselves, and all their ecclesiastical derivatives, to such a form of baptism, as might distinctly and nominally mention the three Persons of the glorious Trinity, which was so indispensably necessary, as the omission of any one constituted the baptism null. L'Estrange.

[p] And if the Minister shall find &c.] Some direction is wanted in what manner we are to use this office, when there is one or more children to be baptized, as well as one or more children to be received by it into the congregation. The greatest part of each office being word for word, the same may reasonably and consistently be applied to both cases, and be used in common; provided those parts of each office which are particular and appropriate to the different cases be also used separately. And this I take to be the usual practice. Nor doth it seem liable to censure, though it is not authorized by any rubrick. And all the ends and uses of both offices are as completely answered this way as if they were to be performed distinctly.

But this indeed is said upon a supposition that the questions to be put to the sponsors are put on behalf of each child. For the third question in the first office cannot possibly be made an interrogatory in the second.

And I may here further remark, that we are to observe the same rule in certifying the private baptisms of those with whom the second office is to be used. That is to say, when there are more than one to be received into the congregation, we must certify the baptism of each of them distinctly, whether baptized by ourselves or by others: as appears from the manner in which these certificates are printed, if compared with the rest of the office. Archdeacon Sharp.

[q] — shall receive him as one of the flock of true Christian people,] Which, after he has certified the people that all was well done, and declared the benefits which the child has received by virtue of its baptism, he is directed to do in much the same form as is appointed for publick baptism. He reads the Gospel there appointed, and the Exhortation that follows it. After which he repeats the Lord's Prayer, and the Collect that in the office for publick baptism follows the Exhortation. Then "demanding the name of the child," he proceeds to examine the Godfathers and Godmothers, "whether, in the name of the child, they renounce the devil and all his works, &c.; whether they believe all the articles of the Christian Faith," and "whether they will obediently keep God's will and commandments, &c." For though the child was baptized without Godfathers at first, (when, being more likely to die than to live, there seemed no occasion for any to undertake for its future behaviour;) yet if it lives and is brought to church, it is fit there should be some to give security, that it shall be well educated and instructed. As soon as this is done therefore, the child is "received into the congregation of Christ's flock," and is "signed with the sign of the cross." After which the service concludes with the Thanksgiving and Exhortation that close the office for publick baptism. Wheatly.

At the end of this office there is a want of a direction, which we have in the former office of publick baptism, to admonish the sureties "that they take care to bring the children to be confirmed by the bishop."

To say how this comes to pass is not easy. In all the old Prayer Books before the Restoration there was a rubrick in the first office requiring the minister to admonish the sponsors to this effect; but leaving him to his own manner of expressing himself. Which rubrick was not repeated at the end of this office, but was referred to by these words, "and so forth as in publick baptism." Which reference was as good as the repetition of the rubrick; for it made the direction equally clear. But now, at the revisal, what had been a rubrick at the end of the former office was changed into a prescribed form of admonition, and what had been a reference at the end of this office was quite omitted. By what means I know not. But it was not an oversight, at least, not in all the revisors. For in Bishop Cosin's copy, where all the designed amendments stand added in the margin, there is a reference made at the end of this office to the form of admonition then newly added to the former office: which reference is thus expressed: "Then shall he add and say, Furthermore I require you to take care, &c."

What I collect from hence is, that it seems most likely to have been the design of the revisors, that this direction should be given in the same words at the end of both the offices, the reason of it being the same in both cases. But, as this design is not expressed in our printed copies, it remains yet a question with any man who guides himself by the letter of rubrick, whether he should on mere presumption of such design take upon him to add this supplement out of the former office or no. Surely no minister can be blamed for not doing what he is not commanded. But my own resolution of the doubt should rather be this. Though the admonition is not made part of the authorized form in our printed books, and is not necessary for completing the office: yet, as it is nevertheless a proper one, and the omission of it, or of a direction about it, was probably accidental and not designed, therefore to use it as an admonition from ourselves, or at least to give a direction to the same effect and purpose, as was done before the form of admonition was prescribed. And thus we shall keep up to the supposed intention of the Church, without transgressing any written rule. Archdeacon Sharp.

children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily, I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

¶ After the Gospel is read, the Minister shall make this brief Exhortation upon the words of the Gospel.

BELOVED, ye hear in this Gospel the words of our Saviour Christ, that he commanded the children to be brought unto him; how he blamed those that would have kept them from him; how he exhorted all men to follow their innocency. Ye perceive how by his outward gesture and deed he declared his good will toward them; for he embraced them in his arms, he laid his hands upon them, and blessed them. Doubt ye not therefore, but earnestly believe, that he hath likewise favourably received this present Infant; that he hath embraced him with the arms of his mercy; and (as he hath promised in his holy Word) will give unto him the blessing of eternal life, and make him partaker of his everlasting kingdom. Wherefore, we being thus persuaded of the good will of our heavenly Father, declared by his Son Jesus Christ towards this Infant, let us faithfully and devoutly give thanks unto him, and say the Prayer which the Lord himself taught us:

OUR Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, heavenly Father, we give thee humble thanks that thou hast vouchsafed to call us to the knowledge of thy grace, and faith in thee; Increase this knowledge, and confirm this faith in us evermore. Give thy holy Spirit to this Infant, that he, being born again, and being made an heir of everlasting salvation, through our Lord Jesus Christ, may continue thy servant, and attain thy promise; through the same our Lord Jesus Christ thy Son, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Priest demand the Name of the Child; which being by the Godfathers and Godmothers pronounced, the Minister shall say, DOST thou, in the name of this Child, renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of this world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow, nor be led by them?

Answer. I renounce them all.

Minister.

DOST thou believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth?

And in Jesus Christ his only-begotten Son our Lord? And that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost; born of the Virgin Mary; that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; that he went down into hell, and also did rise again the third day; that he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; and from thence shall come again at the end of the world, to judge the quick and the dead?

And dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholick Church; the Communion of Saints; the Remission of sins; the Resurrection of the flesh; and everlasting life after death?

Answer. All this I stedfastly believe.

Minister.

WILT thou then obediently keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of thy life?

Answer. I will.

¶ Then the Priest shall say,

WE receive this Child into the congregation of Christ's flock *, and do sign him with the sign of the Cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner, against sin, the world, and the devil; and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

SEEING now, dearly beloved brethren, that this Child is by Baptism regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church, let us give thanks unto Almighty God for these benefits, and with one accord make our prayers unto him, that he may lead the rest of his life according to this beginning.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

WE yield thee most hearty thanks, most merciful Father, that it hath pleased thee to regenerate this Infant with thy holy Spirit, to receive him for thine own Child by adoption, and to incorporate him into thy holy Church. And humbly we beseech thee to grant, that he, being dead unto sin, and living unto righteousness, and being buried with Christ in his death, may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of sin; and that as he is made partaker of the death of thy Son, he may also be partaker of his resurrection; so that finally, with the residue of thy holy Church, he may be an inheritor of thine everlasting kingdom; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ Then, all standing up, the Minister shall make this Exhortation to the Godfathers and Godmothers.

FORASMUCH as this Child hath promised by you his sureties to renounce the devil and all his works, to believe in God, and to serve him; ye must remember, that it is your parts and duties to see that this Infant be taught, so soon as he shall be able to learn, what a solemn vow, promise, and profession, he hath made by you. And that he may know these things the better, ye shall call upon him to hear Sermons; and chiefly ye shall provide, that he may learn the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue, and all other things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health; and that this Child may be virtuously brought up to lead a godly and a Christian life; remembering alway, that Baptism doth represent unto us our profession; which is, to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto him; that, as he died, and rose again for us, so should we, who are baptized, die from sin, and rise again unto righteousness; continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living.

¶ But if they which bring the Infant to the Church do make such uncertain answers to the Priest's questions, as that it cannot appear that the Child was baptized with Water, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, (which are essential parts of Baptism,) then let the Priest baptize it in the form before appointed for Publick Baptism of Infants; saving that at the dipping of the Child in the Font, he shall use this form of words.

IF thou art not already baptized, N. I baptize thee In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

THE MINISTRATION OF BAPTISM
TO SUCH AS ARE OF RIPER YEARS[q], AND ABLE TO ANSWER FOR THEMSELVES.

¶ When any such Persons, as are of riper years, are to be baptized[r], timely notice shall be given to the Bishop, or whom he shall appoint for that purpose, a week before at the least, by the Parents, or some other discreet persons; that so due care may be taken for their Examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian Religion; and that they may be exhorted to prepare themselves with Prayers and Fasting for the receiving of this holy Sacrament.

¶ And if they shall be found fit[s], then the Godfathers and Godmothers (the people being assembled upon the Sunday or Holy-day appointed) shall be ready to present them at the Font immediately after the second Lesson, either at Morning or Evening Prayer, as the Curate in his discretion shall think fit.

[q] The Ministration of Baptism to such as are of Riper Years, &c.] We had no office in our Liturgy for the baptism of persons of "riper years" till the last review. For though in the infancy of Christianity adult persons were generally the subjects of baptism; yet after the several nations that have been converted were become Christian, baptism was always administered to children. So that when the Liturgy of the Church of England was first compiled, an office for "adult persons" was not so necessary. But by the growth of Anabaptism and Quakerism, during the grand Rebellion, the want of such an office was plainly perceived. For which reason the commissioners appointed to review the Common Prayer drew up this which I am now going to make some remarks upon, which is very useful for the baptizing of natives in our plantations, when they shall be converted to the faith, and of such unhappy children of those licentious sectaries I just now named, as shall come to be sensible of the errors of their parents. Wheatly.

This office was thought to be composed by Dr. George Griffith, bishop of St. Asaph. Anthony Wood says, in the Athenæ Oxonienses, "In 1662, in a convocation of the clergy then held, he concurred effectually, in drawing up the Act of Uniformity, and making certain alterations in the Common Prayer then set out; and it is thought the form of baptizing those of riper years was of his composing." Collis.

[r] When any such Persons, as are of riper years, are to be baptized, &c.] In the baptism of persons who are of age and understanding, there is more required than in that of infants. For, they being capable to receive instruction, to declare their faith, and to exercise an actual repentance, our Church commands that they be first taught and catechised: which of old lasted all the forty days of Lent: and then that they be examined concerning their faith and repentance, Luke iii. 8—11. Finally, the persons themselves are advised, according to the primitive discipline, to prepare themselves for this seal of remission by fasting, and prayer, and a serious consideration of the covenant, into which they are about to enter. This difference between their duty and that of infants hath occasioned the compiling of a peculiar office. Dean Comber.

This office is so seldom used, that, whenever it is, more than ordinary care is commonly taken about it. The persons are beforehand examined, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and able to answer for themselves when they take this great charge upon them.

All sureties are equally obliged to be thus qualified, who take upon themselves the trust of answering for others; as these are required to be, when they come to answer for themselves.

The Gospel is the discourse, which our Saviour had with Nicodemus touching the necessity of baptism: and it is followed by an admirable exhortation of the same nature, taken out of several parts of Scripture.

It would be very useful for all persons to read this ministration carefully over, before they come to be confirmed. Collis.

[s] And if they shall be found fit, &c.] In this case the minister is to baptize them in the same manner and order as is appointed before for the baptism of infants; except that the Gospel is concerning our Saviour's discourse with Nicodemus touching the necessity of baptism, which is followed by an exhortation suitable and proper. Again, the persons to be baptized being able to make the profession that is requisite, in their own persons, the minister is ordered to put the questions to them. There are Godfathers and Godmothers indeed appointed to be present, but they are only appointed as witnesses of the engagement, and undertake no more than to remind them hereafter of the vow and profession which they made in their presence, and to call upon them to be diligent in instructing themselves in God's word, &c., the chief part of the charge being delivered at last by the priest to the persons that are baptized. Wheatly.

¶ And standing there the Priest shall ask, whether any of the persons here presented be baptized, or no: If they shall answer, No; then shall the Priest say thus,

DEARLY beloved, forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin, (and that which is born of the flesh is flesh,) and they that are in the flesh cannot please God, but live in sin, committing many actual transgressions; and that our Saviour Christ saith, None can enter into the kingdom of God, except he be regenerate and born anew of Water and of the Holy Ghost; I beseech you to call upon God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that of his bounteous goodness he will grant to these persons that which by nature they cannot have; that they may be baptized with Water and the Holy Ghost, and received into Christ's holy Church, and be made lively members of the same.

John iii. 6. Rom. viii. 7, 8.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

Let us pray.

(¶ And here all the Congregation shall kneel.)

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, who of thy great mercy didst save Noah and his family in the ark from perishing by water; and also didst safely lead the children of Israel thy people through the Red Sea, figuring thereby thy holy Baptism; and by the Baptism of thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ, in the river Jordan, didst sanctify the element of water to the mystical washing away of sin; We beseech thee, for thine infinite mercies, that thou wilt mercifully look upon these thy servants; wash them and sanctify them with the Holy Ghost, that they, being delivered from thy wrath, may be received into the ark of Christ's Church; and being stedfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity, may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally they may come to the land of everlasting life, there to reign with thee world without end; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ALMIGHTY and immortal God, the aid of all that need, the helper of all that flee to thee for succour, the life of them that believe, and the resurrection of the dead; We call upon thee for these persons, that they, coming to thy holy Baptism, may receive remission of their sins by spiritual regeneration. Receive them, O Lord, as thou hast promised by thy well-beloved Son, saying, Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: So give now unto us that ask; let us that seek find; open the gate unto us that knock; that these persons may enjoy the everlasting benediction of thy heavenly washing, and may come to the eternal kingdom which thou hast promised by Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ Then shall the people stand up, and the Priest shall say,

Hear the words of the Gospel, written by Saint John, in the third Chapter, beginning at the first Verse.

THERE was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews. The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? Jesus answered, Verily, verily I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof; but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

¶ After which he shall say this Exhortation following.

BELOVED, ye hear in this Gospel the express words of our Saviour Christ, that except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Whereby ye may perceive the great necessity of this Sacrament, where it may be had. Likewise, immediately before his ascension into heaven, (as we read in the last Chapter of Saint Mark's Gospel,) he gave command to his disciples, saying, Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. Which also sheweth unto us the great benefit we reap thereby. For which cause Saint Peter the Apostle, when upon his first preaching of the Gospel many were pricked at the heart, and said to him and the rest of the Apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do? replied and said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is to you and your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. And with many other words exhorted he them, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation. For (as the same Apostle testifieth in another place) even Baptism doth also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Doubt ye not therefore, but earnestly believe, that he will favourably receive these present persons, truly repenting, and coming unto him by faith; that he will grant them remission of their sins, and bestow upon them the Holy Ghost; that he will give them the blessing of eternal life, and make them partakers of his everlasting kingdom.

Mark xvi. 16.

Acts ii. 37—40.

1 Pet. iii. 21.

Wherefore we being thus persuaded of the good will of our heavenly Father towards these persons, declared by his Son Jesus Christ; let us faithfully and devoutly give thanks to him, and say,

ALMIGHTY and everlasting God, heavenly Father, we give thee humble thanks, for that thou hast vouchsafed to call us to the knowledge of thy grace, and faith in thee: Increase this knowledge, and confirm this faith in us evermore. Give thy holy Spirit to these persons, that they may be born again, and be made heirs of everlasting salvation; through our Lord Jesus Christ, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen.

¶ Then the Priest shall speak to the persons to be baptized on this wise:

WELL-beloved, who are come hither desiring to receive holy Baptism, ye have heard how the congregation hath prayed, that our Lord Jesus Christ would vouchsafe to receive you and bless you, to release you of your sins, to give you the kingdom of heaven, and everlasting life. Ye have heard also, that our Lord Jesus Christ hath promised in his holy Word to grant all those things that we have prayed for; which promise he, for his part, will most surely keep and perform.

Wherefore, after this promise made by Christ, ye must also faithfully, for your part, promise in the presence of these your Witnesses, and this whole congregation, that ye will renounce the devil and all his works, and constantly believe God's holy Word, and obediently keep his commandments.

¶ Then shall the Priest demand of each of the persons to be baptized, severally, these Questions following:

Question.

DOST thou renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow, nor be led by them?

Answer. I renounce them all.

Question.

DOST thou believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth?

And in Jesus Christ his only-begotten Son our Lord? And that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost; born of the Virgin Mary; that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; that he went down into hell, and also did rise again the third day; that he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; and from thence shall come again at the end of the world, to judge the quick and the dead?

And dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholick Church; the Communion of Saints; the Remission of sins; the Resurrection of the flesh; and everlasting life after death?

Answer. All this I stedfastly believe.

Question.

WILT thou be baptized in this faith?

Answer. That is my desire.

Question.

WILT thou then obediently keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of thy life?

Answer. I will endeavour so to do, God being my helper.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

O Merciful God, grant that the old Adam in these persons may be so buried, that the new man may be raised up in them. Amen.

Grant that all carnal affections may die in them, and that all things belonging to the Spirit may live and grow in them. Amen.

Grant that they may have power and strength to have victory, and to triumph, against the devil, the world, and the flesh. Amen.

Grant that they, being here dedicated to thee by our office and ministry, may also be endued with heavenly virtues, and everlastingly rewarded, through thy mercy, O blessed Lord God, who dost live, and govern all things, world without end. Amen.

ALMIGHTY, everliving God, whose most dearly beloved Son Jesus Christ, for the forgiveness of our sins, did shed out of his most precious side both water and blood, and gave commandment to his disciples, that they should go teach all nations, and baptize them In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; Regard, we beseech thee, the supplications of this congregation; sanctify this Water to the mystical washing away of sin; and grant that the persons now to be baptized therein may receive the fulness of thy grace, and ever remain in the number of thy faithful and elect children; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Priest take each person to be baptized by the right hand, and placing him conveniently by the Font, according to his discretion, shall ask the Godfathers and Godmothers the name; and then shall dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying,

N. I baptize thee In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

WE receive this person into the congregation of Christ's flock *, and do sign him with the sign of the Cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner, against sin, the world, and the devil; and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end. Amen.

* Here the Priest shall make a cross upon the person's forehead.

¶ Then shall the Priest say,

SEEING now, dearly beloved brethren, that these persons are regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church, let us give thanks unto Almighty God for these benefits, and with one accord make our prayers unto him, that they may lead the rest of their life according to this beginning.

¶ Then shall be said the Lord's Prayer, all kneeling.

OUR Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

WE yield thee humble thanks, O heavenly Father, that thou hast vouchsafed to call us to the knowledge of thy grace, and faith in thee: Increase this knowledge, and confirm this faith in us evermore. Give thy holy Spirit to these persons; that, being now born again, and made heirs of everlasting salvation, through our Lord Jesus Christ, they may continue thy servants, and attain thy promises; through the same Lord Jesus Christ thy Son, who liveth and reigneth with thee, in the unity of the same Holy Spirit, everlastingly. Amen.

Gal iii. 27—29. 1 Thess. v. 23.

¶ Then all standing up, the Priest shall use this Exhortation following; speaking to the Godfathers and Godmothers first.

FORASMUCH as these persons have promised in your presence to renounce the devil and all his works, to believe in God, and to serve him; ye must remember that it is your part and duty to put them in mind, what a solemn vow, promise, and profession they have now made before this congregation, and especially before you their chosen witnesses. And ye are also to call upon them to use all diligence to be rightly instructed in God's holy Word; that so they may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and live godly, righteously, and soberly in this present world.

Eccles. v. 4. Heb. iii. 13. 1 Tim. vi. 12. Col. iii. 16. 2 Thess. ii. 13. 2 Pet. i. 5; iii. 18. Tit. ii. 12.

(¶ And then, speaking to the new baptized persons, he shall proceed, and say,)

AND as for you, who have now by Baptism put on Christ, it is your part and duty also, being made the children of God and of the light, by faith in Jesus Christ, to walk answerably to your Christian calling, and as becometh the children of light; remembering always that Baptism representeth unto us our profession; which is, to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto him; that as he died, and rose again for us; so should we, who are baptized, die from sin, and rise again unto righteousness; continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living.

Gal. iii. 27. Gal. iii. 26. Eph. v. 8. Eph. iv. 1.

¶ It is expedient that every person, thus baptized, should be confirmed by the Bishop so soon after his Baptism as conveniently may be; that so he may be admitted to the holy Communion.

¶ If any persons not baptized in their infancy shall be brought to be baptized before they come to years of discretion to answer for themselves; it may suffice to use the office for Publick Baptism of Infants, or (in case of extreme danger) the Office for Private Baptism; only changing the word [Infant] for [Child or Person] as occasion requireth.

A CATECHISM[t],

THAT IS TO SAY,

AN INSTRUCTION TO BE LEARNED OF EVERY PERSON, BEFORE HE BE BROUGHT TO BE CONFIRMED[u] BY THE BISHOP.

Question. WHAT is your name[x]?
Answer. N. or M.

Quest. Who gave you this name[y]?
Answ. My Godfathers and Godmothers[z] in my Baptism[a]; wherein [t] A Catechism, &c.] Since children in their baptism engage "to renounce the devil and all his works, to believe in God, and to serve him;" it is fit that they be "taught, as soon as they are able to learn, what a solemn vow, promise, and profession" they have made. Accordingly, after the offices appointed for baptism, follows, "A CATECHISM, that is to say, An Instruction to be learned of every person, before he be brought to be confirmed by the Bishop." Wheatly.

Catechism is derived from a Greek term, and signifies instruction in the first rudiments of any art or science, communicated by asking questions, and hearing and correcting the answers. From the earliest ages of the Church the word has been employed by ecclesiastical writers in a more restrained sense, to denote instruction in the principles of Christian religion by means of questions and answers. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

The catechizing of children is enjoined by God, Deut. vi. 7; Prov. xxii. 6; Ephes. vi. 4; and was always practised by pious men, Gen. xviii. 19; 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 5; and it is Christ's especial charge to ministers, to feed his lambs, John xxi. 15. The Jewish doctors took care of this, Luke ii. 42. And in the Christian churches there was a peculiar officer who was the catechist; and all the new converts, who were to be baptized at Easter, were catechized all the forty days of Lent. But since we have few such now, and generally baptize infants, who cannot at that time understand the covenant which is entered into, therefore we are bound to take more care to make them understand it afterward, by instructing them in the "Catechism of the Church;" which is drawn up according to the primitive forms, by way of question and answer, Acts viii. 37; 1 Pet. iii. 21: being not a large system of divinity to puzzle the heads of young beginners, but like those of the ancients, a short and full explication of the baptismal vow; teaching them, first, what their baptismal vow is, namely, what were the benefits promised on God's part, Quest. I, II. And what were the duties promised on their part, to renounce all evil, to believe all divine truth, and to keep God's commandments, Quest. III; together with their grateful owning of this covenant, Quest. IV. Secondly, The parts of the vow are explained: first, as to the matter of them, in repeating and expounding the Creed, Quest. V, VI, and repeating and explaining the Ten Commandments, Quest. VII, VIII, IX, X, XI. Secondly, as to the means to enable them to keep them, which are prayer and the holy sacraments: and the duty of prayer is taught them in the Lord's Prayer and the explication thereof, Quest. XII, XIII. The due sense of the sacraments is taught them, first in general, as to their number, nature, and necessity, Quest. XIV, XV. Secondly in particular, baptism, Quest. XVI—XX; and the Lord's Supper, Quest. XXI—XXV. This is all that is absolutely necessary to be known in order to salvation, and all that the primitive church did teach their catechumens. And if children be but made to repeat this perfectly, and understand it fully, they will increase in knowledge as they grow in years. Dean Comber.

It is the peculiar glory of Christianity to have extended religious instruction, of which but few partook at all before, and scarce any in purity, through all ranks and ages of men, and even women. The first converts to it were immediately formed into regular societies and assemblies; not only for the joint worship of God, but the further "edifying of the body of Christ," Eph. iv. 12: in which good work, some of course were stated teachers, or, to use the apostle's own expression, "catechizers in the word:" others taught or catechized, Gal. vi. 6. For catechizing signifies in Scripture, at large, instructing persons in any matter, but especially in religion. And thus it is used, Acts xviii. 25; where we read, "This man was instructed in the way of the Lord;" and Luke i. 4; where again we read, "That thou mayest know the certainty of those things, wherein thou hast been instructed." The original word, in both places, is catechized.

But as the different advances of persons in knowledge made different sorts of instructions requisite: so in the primitive church, different sorts of teachers were appointed to dispense it. And they who taught so much only of the Christian doctrine, as might qualify the hearers for Christian communion, had the name of catechists appropriated to them; whose teaching being usually, as was most convenient, in a great measure by way of question and answer; the name of Catechism hath now been long confined to such instruction, as is given in that form. But the method of employing a particular set of men in that work only, is in most places laid aside. And I hope the people will not be losers, if they, who are appointed to the higher ministers of the Church, attend to this also.

1 Cor. xii. 27. Eph. v. 30. Gal. iii. 26. Rom. viii. 17.

I was made[b] a member of Christ[c], the child of God[d], and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven[e].

Quest. What did your Godfathers and Godmothers then for you[f]?

Answ. They did promise and vow

Under the darkness of popery almost all religious instruction was neglected. "Very few," to use the words of one of our Homilies, "even of the most simple people, were taught the Lord's Prayer, the Articles of the faith, or the Ten Commandments, otherwise than in Latin, which they understood not;" so that one of the first necessary steps taken towards the Reformation, in this country, was a general injunction, that parents and masters should first learn them in their own tongue, then acquaint their children and servants with them: which three main branches of Christian duty, comprehending the sum of what we are to believe, to do, and to petition for, were soon after formed, with proper explanations of each, into a Catechism. To this was added, in process of time, a brief account of the two sacraments; altogether making up that very good, though still improveable, "form of sound words," 2 Tim. i. 13, which we now use. Abp. Secker.

As to the form of our Catechism, it is drawn up after the primitive manner by way of question and answer: so Philip catechized the eunuch, Acts viii. 37; and so the persons to be baptized were catechized in the first ages. And indeed the very word Catechism implies as much; the original Κατηχέω, from whence it is derived, being a compound of Ἠχώ, which signifies an Echo, or repeated sound. So that a Catechism is no more than an instruction first taught and instilled into a person, and then repeated upon the catechist's examination.

2. As to the contents of our Catechism, it is not a large system or body of divinity, to puzzle the heads of young beginners; but only a short and full explication of the baptismal vow. The primitive Catechisms indeed (that is, all that the catechumens were to learn by heart before their baptism and confirmation) consisted of no more than the Renunciation, or the repetition of the Baptismal Vow, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer: and these, together with the Ten Commandments, at the Reformation, were the whole of ours. But it being afterwards thought defective as to the doctrine of the Sacraments, (which in the primitive time were more largely explained to baptized persons,) King James I. appointed the bishops to add a short and plain explanation of them, which was done accordingly in that excellent form we see; being penned by Bishop Overall, then Dean of St. Paul's, and allowed by the bishops. So that now (in the opinion of the best judges) it excels all Catechisms that ever were in the world; being so short that the youngest children may learn it by heart; and yet so full that it contains all things necessary to be known in order to salvation.

In this also its excellency is very discernible, namely, that as all persons are baptized not into any particular church, but into the Catholick church of Christ; so here they are not taught the opinion of this or any other particular church or people, but what the whole body of Christians all the world over agree in. If it may any where seem to be otherwise, it is in the doctrine of the Sacraments: but even this is here worded with so much caution and temper, as not to contradict any other particular church; but so as that all sorts of Christians, when they have duly considered it, may subscribe to every thing that is here taught or delivered. Wheatly.

[b] — to be learned of every person, before he be brought to be confirmed &c.] At the time of confirmation, every one, in the presence of God, and of the congregation, renews with his own mouth and consent the promises and vows made in his name when he was baptized: he ratifies and confirms the same in his own person, acknowledging himself "bound to believe and to do all those things which at his baptism his Godfathers and Godmothers" undertook for him. In this open awful manner must every one, before he can be confirmed, take upon himself the profession of the Christian religion. It is reasonable therefore, that he be well instructed in its principles, and understand aright the nature of those doctrines and duties, which he so solemnly declares himself to believe and engages to perform. Shepherd.

There was some difference between the persons, who were catechized in the primitive times, and those whom we instruct now. For there the catechumens were generally such as were come to years of discretion; but, having been born of heathen parents, were not yet baptized. So that they catechized them before their baptism, as we also do those who are not baptized till they come to "riper years." But as to the children of believing parents, it is certain that, as they were baptized in infancy, they could not then, any more than now, be admitted catechumens till after baptism. Nor is there any necessity of doing it before, if so be we take care that due instruction be given them, so soon as they are capable of receiving it. For our Saviour Himself in that commission to his Apostles, "Go ye, make disciples of all nations, baptizing them, &c.—teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you," seems to intimate that converts may first be entered into his Church by baptism, and afterwards instructed in the fundamentals of their religion. And indeed we read, that, when St. Basil was baptized, the bishop kept him in his house some time afterwards, that he might instruct him in the things pertaining to eternal life. And a learned writer affirms, that all baptized persons in the primitive times (although they had been catechized before) were yet wont to stay several days after their baptism, to be more fully catechized in all things necessary to salvation. And therefore there is much more reason for us to catechize children after baptism, who are naturally incapable of being instructed beforehand. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[c] What is your name?] The Catechism begins with a prudent condescension and familiarity, by asking the introductory questions, "What is your name?" and "Who gave you this name?" which lead very naturally the person catechized to the mention of his baptism, at which time it was given him. Not that giving a name is any necessary part of baptism; but might have been done either before or afterwards, though it hath always been done then, as indeed it was likely that the first publick opportunity would be taken for that purpose. But besides, it was no uncommon thing in ancient times, that, when a person entered into the service of a new master, he had a new name bestowed on him. Whence perhaps the Jews might derive the practice of naming the child, when it was circumcised; it being then devoted to the service of God. The first Christians in imitation of them would of course do the same thing, for the same reason, when it was baptized: and no wonder that we continue the practice. For it might be a very useful one, if persons would but remember, what it tends to remind them of, that they were dedicated to Christ, when their Christian name was given them; and would make use of that circumstance frequently three things[g] in my name. First, that I should[h] renounce the devil and all his works[i], the pomps and vanity of this wicked world[k], and all to recollect those promises, which were then solemnly made for them; and which they have since confirmed, or are to confirm and make personally for themselves. Without performing these, we are Christians, not in deed, but in name only; and shall greatly dishonour that name, while we bear it and boast of it. Abp. Secker.

[f] Who gave you this name?] Our baptismal name is given us, not by our parents, as we read in Scripture the name of Jewish children was; but by our Godfathers and Godmothers. And this custom also may have a double advantage. It may admonish them, that having conferred the title of Christians upon us, they are bound to endeavour that we may behave worthily of it. And it may admonish us, that, our name having been given us by persons who were our sureties, we are bound to make good their engagement. Abp. Secker.

[g] My Godfathers and Godmothers] Our Christian name is given by our Godfathers; because, baptism being a new and spiritual birth, which has no relation to our natural parents, it is, not without prudence, ordained by our Church, that our name, which we receive then, should be given us by our Godfathers, who do, as it were, supply God's stead, and are his instruments to make us partake of this new birth. The reason, why the Church requires Godfathers and Godmothers in baptism, is partly to conform herself to the usage of God's Church, not only in the earliest ages of Christianity, but even among the Jews, who had their witnesses of the covenant in circumcision, Isa. viii. 2: but chiefly to be sureties or vouchers for the children that are to be baptized: to transact that momentous business of entering into covenant with God in their names, which, by reason of their infancy, they cannot perform themselves; and to promise for them, that when they come to years of discretion, they shall be instructed in, and make profession of, that holy religion, into which through their engagement they are admitted. The reason, why the Church does not think parents so proper to do this, is, because in case the parents should either die before the children are brought up, or should apostatize from the Christian faith, or be negligent in the education of their children, the suretyship of several other good persons will, in all probability, supply the part, which the parents should have taken. Dr. Nicholls.

[h] — in my Baptism; &c.] Baptism being our first entrance into the Christian church, by which we become intitled to certain privileges, and obliged to certain duties; religious instruction begins very properly by teaching young persons what both of them are. And, in order to recommend the duties to us, the privileges are mentioned first. Abp. Secker.

[i] — wherein I was made &c.] The privileges, thus conditionally secured to us in baptism, we find in our Catechism very fitly reduced to these three heads: that the person who receives it, is "therein made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven." Abp. Secker.

[k] — a member of Christ.] The first privilege, and the foundation of others, is, that he is "made a member of Christ." This figure of speech all persons may not immediately understand: but when it is understood, they will perceive in it great strength and beauty. It presupposes, what we must be sensible of, more or less, that we are every one originally prone to sin, and actually sinners; liable thence to punishment; and without hope of preserving ourselves, by our own strength, either from guilt or from misery. It further implies, what the Scripture clearly teaches, that Jesus Christ hath delivered us from both, in such manner as shall hereafter be explained, on the most equitable terms of our becoming his, by accepting Him from the hand of God for our Saviour, our Teacher, and our Lord. This union to Him in order to receive these benefits from Him, our Catechism, in conformity with the language of holy writ, compares with that of the members of the body to the head. And how proper the comparison is, will easily appear, by carrying it through the several particulars, in which the similitude holds.

As, in every living creature, perception and motion proceed from the head; so, to every Christian, knowledge of God's will, and power to obey it, flow from Christ. As the head governs and directs each limb, so Christ is the Sovereign and Lawgiver of each believer. As being joined to the head makes the whole body one animal frame; so being joined to Christ makes the whole number of Christians one spiritual society. As communication with the head preserves our natural life; so communion with Christ supports our religious life. He therefore is to the Church what the head is to the body: and each person who belongs to the Church, is a member of that body, or, in the language of the Catechism, "a member of Christ." For He, as St. Paul expresses it, is "the Head: from which all the body, having nourishment ministered, and knit together by joints and bands, increaseth with the increase of God," Col. ii. 19.

And this manner of speaking is frequently repeated in Scripture, as it well deserves; being not only, as we have seen, admirably fitted to represent the happy relations, in which we stand to our Redeemer, but also to remind us of the duties, which are derived from them: of the honour and obedience due to Him, who is "Head over all things to his body, the Church;" Eph. i. 22, 23; of our continual dependence on Him, "since he is our life;" Col. iii. 4; and of the tenderness and kindness, which we owe to our fellow-Christians, and they to us, being all united, through Him, so intimately to each other. For since, as the apostle argues, "by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body:" as in the natural body, "the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee," nor any one member to the rest, I have no need of you; but even the "more feeble and less honourable members are necessary," 1 Cor. xii 13. 21—23; so in the spiritual body, they, who in any respect may seem to excel others, ought by no means to despise them; since every good Christian is, in his proper degree and place, both a valuable and useful "member of Christ." And again: as, in the natural body, there is a connexion and sympathy of the several parts; by which the good state of one preserves the others in health and ease, or its bad state gives them pain and disorder; so should there be in the spiritual body, and there is in all true members of it, a mutual caution not to do harm to each other, and a mutual desire of each other's benefit. "If one member suffer, all the other members" should by a compassionate temper "suffer with it;" and "if one member be honoured, all" the rest should sincerely "rejoice with it," 1 Cor. xii. 26. Let us think then, Do we feel in our hearts this good disposition, as a mark of being members of Christ? If not, let us study to form ourselves to it without delay. Abp. Secker.

[l] — the child of God,] The second privilege of baptism is, that by it "we are made the children of God," in a sense and manner, in which by nature we are not so.

Our blessed Saviour indeed is called in Scripture "the only-begotten Son of God." Nor can the highest of creatures claim God for his Father by the same right that He doth. But in a lower sense God is the Father of angels and men; whom He hath created in their several degrees of likeness to his own image. Adam, our first parent, was the son of God by a strong resemblance to his heavenly Father in original uprightness. But as this similitude was greatly obscured both in him and in his descendants by the fall, though preserved by the covenant of the promised seed from being utterly effaced; so in time it was almost entirely lost amongst men, by the prevalence of sin; and they became in general "enemies" of God, Rom. v. 10; Col. i. 21, and "children of the devil," 1 John iii. 10.

But our gracious Maker, pitying us notwithstanding, and treating us like children, even when thus degenerated, hath mercifully appointed a method for adopting us into his family again, after we have cast ourselves out of it; and for restoring and raising us gradually to the same and greater likeness to Him and favour with Him, than even our first parents ever enjoyed. Now this inestimable blessing was procured for mankind through the means of Jesus Christ; and we become entitled to it by taking Him for our Head, and becoming his members, in such manner as hath been briefly explained. For "to as many as receive him, to them gives he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name," John i. 12. Being therefore thus united to Him, who is in the highest sense the Son of God; and claiming not in our own name, but under Him; we are admitted again into such a degree of sonship as we are capable of; and made "the children of God, by faith in Jesus Christ," Gal. iii. 26.

Indeed not only Christians, but the Jews, are called in Scripture "the children of God," Deut. xiv. 1; and such they really were; being first, as Christians were afterwards, the "children of his covenant," Acts iii. 25. But still, as theirs was a state of less knowledge, more burthensome precepts, and stricter government; the apostle speaks of them, compared with us, only as servants in his family. "Now I say, that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all. Even so we," speaking of the Jewish nation, "when we were children," unqualified for any great degrees of liberty, "were in bondage under the elements of the world. But when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son to redeem them, that were under the law. Wherefore we are no more servants but sons," Gal. iv. 1. 3, 4. 7. "Behold" then, as St. John expresses it, "what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called," in this distinguished sense, "the sons of God," 1 John iii. 1; especially considering the consequence drawn by St. Paul, "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 17. Abp. Secker.

[c] — and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven.] The consequence, noticed under the former head, is the third and last privilege of baptism, and completes the value of it, that by entering into the Christian covenant we are "made inheritors of the kingdom of heaven;" that is, entitled to perfect and endless happiness in body and soul. Had we continued in the primitive uprightness of our first parents, and never sinned at all, we could have had no claim, but from God's free promise, to any thing more than that our being should not be worse to us than not being. But as we are originally depraved, and have actually sinned, far from having any claim to happiness, we are liable to just punishment for ever. And least of all could we have any claim to such happiness, as eternal life and glory. But "blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who of his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us," 1 Pet. i. 3, 4.

These then are the privileges of the Christian covenant: and for these we must give due "thanks to the Father, who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light," Col. i. 12; and be duly careful to "walk worthy of God, who hath called us to his kingdom and glory," 1 Thess. ii. 12. For we have a right to the privileges of the covenant, only on the supposition and presumption of our performing the obligations of it. Children indeed of believers, who are taken out of the world before they become capable of faith and obedience, we doubt not, are happy. For the general declarations of holy writ plainly comprehend their case: and our Saviour hath particularly declared, "that of such is the kingdom of God," Mark x. 14; Luke xviii. 16. But all, who live to maturer years; as, on the one hand, they may entitle themselves, through God's bountiful promise, though not their own merit, to higher degrees of future felicity, in proportion as their service hath been considerable; so on the other, they are entitled to no degree at all, any longer than they practise that "holiness," in which they have engaged to live, and "without" which "no man shall see the Lord," Heb. xii. 14. We shall be acknowledged as children, only whilst we obey our heavenly Father: and "the baptism, which saveth us, is not the" outward "putting away the filth of the flesh, but the" inward "answer of a good conscience towards God," 1 Pet. iii. 21. Abp. Secker.

[f] What did your Godfathers and Godmothers then for you?] After the privileges to which our baptism gives us a claim, our Catechism proceeds to set forth the duties, to which it binds us: those things, "which our Godfathers and Godmothers promised and vowed in our name." For, without the performance of these conditions, neither hath God engaged, nor is it consistent with the holiness of his nature and the honour of his government, to bestow such benefits upon us: nor indeed shall we be capable of receiving them. For a virtuous and religious temper and behaviour here is absolutely requisite, not only to intitle, but to qualify and prepare us for a virtuous and religious blessedness hereafter, such as that of heaven is. Abp. Secker.

[g] They did promise and vow three things &c.] These conditions, or obligations on our part, are three: that we renounce what God forbids; that we believe what He teaches; and do what He commands: or, in other words, repentance, faith, and obedience. These things are plainly necessary: and they are plainly all that is necessary; for as, through the grace of God, we have them in our power; so we have nothing more. And therefore they have been constantly, and without any material variation, expressed in baptism from the earliest ages of the church to the present. Abp. Secker.

[h] — First, that I should renounce &c.] The first thing is, that we renounce what God forbids, every sin of every kind. And this is put first because it opens the way for the other two. When once we come to have a due sense that we are sinners, as all men are, and perceive the baseness, the guilt, the mischief of sin, we shall fly from it, with sincere penitence, to the remedy of faith which God hath appointed. And when we in earnest resolve to forsake whatever is wrong, we shall gladly embrace all such truths as will direct us right, and do what they require. But whilst we retain a love to any wickedness, it will make us, with respect to the doctrine of religion, backward to receive them, or unwilling to think of them, or desirous to interpret them unfairly: and with respect to the duties of religion, it will make our conduct unequal and inconsistent; perplexing us with silly attempts to reconcile vice and virtue, and to atone perhaps by zeal in little duties for indulgence of great faults; till at last we shall either fall into an open course of transgression, or, which is equally fatal, contrive to make ourselves easy in a secret one. The only effectual method therefore is to form a general resolution at once, though we shall execute it but imperfectly and by degrees, of following in every thing the Scripture rule, "cease to do evil, learn to do well," Isa. i. 16, 17.

Now the evil, from which we are required to cease, is also ranged in our Catechism under three heads. For whatever we do amiss, proceeds either from the secret suggestions of an invisible enemy, from the temptations thrown in our way by the visible objects around us, or from the bad dispositions of our own nature: that is, from the devil, the world, or the flesh. And though every one of these, in their turns, may incline us to every kind of sin; and it is not always either easy or material to know, from which the inclination proceeded originally: yet some sins may more usually flow from one source, and some from another. Abp. Secker.

[i] — renounce the devil and all his works,] This, in the primitive ages, was the only renunciation made: the works of the devil being understood to signify, as they do in Scripture, every sort of wickedness: which being often suggested by him, always acceptable to him, and an imitation of him, was justly considered as so much service done him, and obedience paid him. But the method now taken, of renouncing the devil, the world, and the flesh separately, is more convenient, as it gives us a more particular account of our several enemies. Abp. Secker.

The devil is the common name given in Scripture to those wicked spirits; who, having rebelled against God, and being thereupon justly cast off from that glorious state in which they were created by Him, do make it their constant business and endeavour, to draw as many off as they can into the same rebellion, and thereby into the same state of misery with themselves. Matt. xiii. 39; Luke viii. 12; John viii. 44; Eph. iv. 27; vi. 11; 1 Tim. iii. 6, 7; Heb. ii. 14; James iv. 7; 1 John iii. 8—10; 1 Pet. v. 8. Abp. Wake.

By renouncing the devil is meant, declaring a defiance to, and utterly forsaking the cause and empire of, that wicked spirit, the prince of the fallen angels, Matt. ix. 34; and the declared enemy of God, and all good men, Job i. 6; 2 Cor. ii. 11; Eph. vi. 11; 1 Pet. v. 8; who has set up a kingdom of wicked men and unbelievers, Matt. xii. 25; Eph. ii. 2; which it is the design of the religion of Jesus Christ to overthrow, 1 John iii. 8. By the works of the devil are to be understood, first, all those horrible sins, to which the devil makes those poor unbelievers, who are under his vassalage, slaves: such as idolatry, Rom. i. 25; witchcraft, and abominable superstitions, Deut. xviii. 10. Secondly, Those sins of a spiritual nature, which are ascribed more immediately to the influence of the devil; such as falsehood, pride, envy, malice, murder, &c. John viii. 44; Acts xiii. 9, 10; 1 Tim. iii. 6; James iii. 14, 15; 1 John v. 19. 21. Thirdly, all other wicked practices, which all men commit through the instigation of the devil, 1 John iii. 8; Luke viii. 12; 1 Tim. iii. 7; Eph. vi. 11. Dr. Nicholls.

[k] — the pomps and vanity of this wicked world,] By "renouncing the pomps and vanity of the world" is meant, not to set our hearts on any of the fine things which this world affords, Col. iii. 2; 1 John ii. 15; such as riches, honours, and pleasures, 1 Cor. vii. 31; 1 Tim. vi. 17; not to be eager in the pursuit of them; but, if it shall please God to give us a greater share of them, to use them sparingly and with humility: and, when it shall please God to take them from us, to bear the loss with patience, and with a modest resignation to his divine will and pleasure, Phil. iv. 6; Luke xxi. 19; 1 Thess. iv. 13. It is called "this wicked world," because the generality of the world are wicked, 1 John v. 19; and Christians are elected out of the world, to be a chosen generation, and a peculiar people, Eph. iv. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 9. Dr. Nicholls.

The world is called a wicked world, to shew how far, and in what respect, we are to renounce it: namely, in all such cases, in which it would draw us into any wickedness, for the sake of any thing, which we desire or enjoy in it. Abp. Wake.

[l] — and all the sinful lusts of the flesh.] "The sinful lusts of the flesh," which we here "renounce," are all those sensual desires and inclinations, whereby we are disposed to those sins, which are, in a peculiar manner, called in Holy Scripture "the works of the flesh:" such as uncleanness, drunkenness, &c. See Gal. v. 19; Rom. viii. 13; Col. iii. 5; 1 John ii. 16. Abp. Wake.

It should be observed, concerning each of the things, which we renounce in baptism, that we do not undertake what is beyond our power: that the temptations of the devil shall never beset and molest us; that the vain shew of the world shall never appear inviting to us; that our own corrupt nature shall never prompt or incline us to evil: but we undertake, what, through the grace of God, though not without it, is in our power; that we will not, either designedly or carelessly, give these our spiritual enemies needless advantages against us; and that, with whatever advantage they may at any time attack us, we will never yield to them, but always resist them with our utmost prudence and strength. This is the renunciation here meant: and the office of baptism expresseth it more fully: where we engage "so to renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, that we will not follow nor be led by them." Abp. Secker.

[m] Dost thou not think that thou art bound &c.] Before the Catechism proceeds to the second and third things, promised in our name when we are baptized, it puts a fourth question, and a very natural one, considering that children do not, as they cannot, promise these things for themselves, but their Godfathers and Godmothers in their names. It asks them therefore, "whether they think they are bound to believe and to do, as they have promised for them." And to this the person instructed answers, "Yes, verily." Abp. Secker.

We are bound by our sureties' promise, because they were our proxies, or agents, who acted in our stead: so that what they did on our behalf we are obliged to stand to, especially when the promise is in itself so reasonable, and so highly beneficial to us. Dr. Nicholls.

Certainly we are not bound to do, whatever any other person shall take upon him to promise in our name. But if the thing promised be part of an agreement advantageous to us, we are plainly bound in point of interest; and indeed of conscience too: for we ought to consult our own happiness. Even by the laws of men, persons, unable to express their consent, are yet presumed to consent to what is for their own good: and obligations are understood to lie upon them from such presumed consent ever after: especially if there be a representative acting for them who is empowered so to do. And parents are empowered by nature to act for their children; and by Scripture to do it in this very case: and therefore may employ others to do it under them. But further still: the things promised in baptism would have been absolutely incumbent on us, whether they had been promised or not. For it is incumbent on all persons to believe and do what God commands. Only the tie is made stronger by the care then taken, that we shall be taught our duty. And when we have acknowledged ourselves to have learned it, and have solemnly engaged ourselves to perform it, as we do when we are confirmed, then the obligation is complete. Abp. Secker.

[n] — and by God's help so I will.] As our acting according to the engagement made for us depends on two things; our own resolution, and assistance from above: so both are expressed in the following words of the answer, "and by God's help so I will." Further: because our own resolution is best supported by our sense of the advantage of keeping it; therefore the person instructed goes on, in the same answer, to acknowledge that the state, in which he is placed by baptism, is a "state of salvation:" and because assistance from above is best obtained by thankfulness for God's mercy hitherto, and prayer for it hereafter, he concludes by "thanking our heavenly Father, for calling him to this state; and praying for his grace, that he may continue in the same to his life's end." Abp. Secker.

[o] — hath called me to this state of salvation,] By calling us to a state of salvation is meant, God's admitting us at our baptism into that holy religion, which we profess, and by which we enjoy all the necessary means of salvation, Rom. i. 16; 2 Tim. iii. 15. Dr. Nicholls.

The state to which God hath called us, is a "state of salvation;" a state of deliverance from the present slavery of sin, and the future punishment of it; a state of the truest happiness, that this life can afford, introducing us to perfect and everlasting happiness in the next. Such is the condition, in which, through the mercy of God, we Christians are placed; and in which, by a Christian behaviour, we may secure ourselves; and not only preserve, but continually enlarge, our share of its blessings. But if we now neglect to do for ourselves what we ought; all, that hath been done for us by others, will be of no avail. Neither our baptism, nor our instruction; nor our learning ever so exactly, or understanding ever so distinctly, or remembering ever so particularly, what we were instructed in, can possibly have any effect, but to increase our condemnation, unless we faithfully "continue in" the practice of every part of it "to our life's end." This therefore let us all determine to make our constant and most earnest care, with humble gratitude to God, "our heavenly Father," for his undeserved mercy to us; and with sure confidence, that if we be not wanting to ourselves, "he that hath begun a good work in us, will perform it, until the day of Jesus Christ," Phil. i. 6. Abp. Secker.

[p] — through Jesus Christ our Saviour.] We are said to be "called to a state of salvation through Jesus Christ," because, unless it were for the merits and intercession of Jesus Christ, we could not be saved: for it is his blood alone, Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; which has made an infinite satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, Rom. v. 10; 1 John ii. 2; so that we are redeemed from everlasting punishment; and it is by his pleading with the Father his merits in our behalf, Heb. ix. 24; vii. 25; xii. 24, that we are capable of being made partakers of eternal happiness. Dr. Nicholls.

[q] — I pray unto God to give me his grace,] By "the grace of God," which we here pray for, is meant that influence and assistance of God's Holy Spirit, which He has promised to give us, upon our devout prayer to Him for it: which grace, concurring with our own diligent endeavours, doth render the conditions of the Gospel, not only possible, but in some measure easy to be performed. We pray for God's grace to "continue us in the state of salvation;" because, unless God's grace doth remain with us, we may fall into a total apostasy and unbelief of our Saviour; and so be debarred even of the means of salvation: or, if He doth not afford us grace to perform the conditions required by the Gospel, we can have no pretence to the promises of it. Dr. Nicholls.

[r] Rehearse the Articles of thy Belief.] After the things, which Christians by the covenant of their baptism renounce, follow, first, those which they are to believe; and then those, which they are to do. For all reasonable practice must be built on some belief, or persuasion, which is the ground of it: virtuous practice, on a persuasion, that what we do is fit and right; religious practice, on a persuasion, that it is the will of God. Abp. Secker.

The general parts, of which this Creed consists, are these four. 1. It shews us what is most needful to be believed and professed by us, concerning God the Father; secondly, concerning our Lord Jesus Christ; thirdly, concerning the Holy Ghost; and fourthly, concerning the Church of Christ; its duties and privileges here, and the blessings and glory which God has prepared for it hereafter. Abp. Wake.

Quest. What dost thou chiefly learn in these Articles of thy Belief?

Answ. First, I learn to believe[y] in God the Father, who hath made me, and all the world. Heb. i. 2.

Secondly, in God the Son[z], who hath redeemed me, and all mankind. 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.

Thirdly, in God the Holy Ghost[a], who sanctifieth me, and all the elect people of God. 1 Pet. i. 1, 2.

persuasion that there doth, ever did, and ever will exist, one Being, of unbounded power and knowledge, perfect justice, truth, and goodness, the Creator and Preserver, the Sovereign Lord and Ruler of all things. With this article therefore our Creed begins. And, as all the rest are built upon it, so the truth and certainty of it is plain to every man, when duly proposed to his consideration, how unlikely soever some men would have been to discover it of themselves. Abp. Secker.

[t] And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, &c.] "To believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth," is the universal creed of nature and reason. But divine revelation adds further professions to it; of which the first is that of faith in our ever-blessed Redeemer; whose direction was, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me," John xiv. 1. Therefore, that we may believe in Him as we ought, He is described in the Creed by his name and offices, his relation to God and to us. Abp. Secker.

[u] I believe in the Holy Ghost; &c.] The former articles having expressed the belief of Christians concerning the two first Persons of the sacred Trinity, the Father and the Son: our Creed proceeds in this to the third object of our baptismal faith, the Holy Ghost. Abp. Secker.

[x] — The holy Catholick Church; &c.] The most ancient creeds of all went no farther than a declaration of faith in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in whose name we are baptized. For in this profession all those other points of doctrine were understood to be implied, which it was very soon after found most convenient to express by additional articles. Abp. Secker.

[y] What dost thou chiefly learn in these Articles of thy Belief? A. First, I learn to believe &c.] In the divine essence, which is but one, there are three distinct persons, Matt. iii. 16, 17; namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Matt. xxviii. 19, who are distinguished by their properties.

It is the property of the Father, to have begotten the Son, Ps. ii. 7. It is the property of the Son, to be begotten of the Father, John i. 14. It is the property of the Holy Ghost, to proceed from the Father and the Son, John xv. 26.

The creation of the world is ascribed to the Father, who made all things by the Son, Heb. i. 2; and the efficacy of the Holy Ghost, Ps. civ. 30.

The redemption of mankind is ascribed to the Son, as the person that became a ransom for them, 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6.

The sanctification of God's elect people is ascribed to the Holy Ghost, as the spirit of holiness, by whose operation they are made holy, 1 Pet. i. 2. Oxford Catechism. For the sense of "the elect," or "chosen people of God," see page 35, note c.

[z] Secondly, in God the Son, &c.] That Christ has the same divine nature with the Father, and so has been from all eternity "God," together with Him, we must believe, if we believe the Scriptures to give a true account of the nature of Christ: for we find the same evidences in them of the Godhead of Christ, that we do of that of the Father.

First, they give the NAME of God to Him, Ps. xlv. 6, 7; Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6; Acts xx. 28: and that in such a manner as plainly shews it is to be understood in its most proper import and signification; John i. 1; xx. 28; Rom. ix. 5; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Phil. ii. 6; 1 John v. 20.

Secondly, they ascribe the most proper and incommunicable ATTRIBUTES of God to Him. Such as omnipotence, John v. 17, 18; Rev. i. 8; xi. 17. Omniscience, John xvi. 30; xxi. 17; Luke vi. 8: compare John ii. 24, 25; Rev. ii. 23. Immensity, Matt. xviii. 20; xxviii. 20; John iii. 13. Immutability, Heb. i. 11, 12; xiii. 8. And even Eternity itself, Rev. i. 8. 17; xxii. 13; Prov. viii. 22; Mic. v. 2; Isa. ix. 6, 7.

To Him, thirdly, they ascribe such WORKS, as can belong to none that is not God. The creation of the world, John i. 3. 10; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2. 10. The preservation of it, Heb. i. 3. The power of miracles, even to the raising of the dead, John v. 21. 26; vi. 40. The mission of the Holy Ghost, John xv. 26; xvi. 7. 14. And, in short, all the works of grace and regeneration, John v. 21; x. 16; xiii. 18; Acts xvii. 31; xx. 28; Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3; Eph. i. 2, &c.

Add to this, fourthly, that He is there shewn to be HONOURED as God, John v. 23; Heb. i. 6. Prayer is made to Him, Acts vii. 59; 1 Cor. i. 2. Faith and hope are directed to be put in Him, John xiv. 1; Ps. ii. 12. Praises and thanksgivings are given to Him, glory and honour are rendered to Him, Rev. v. 13. Compare iv. 11.

And no wonder; since, lastly, the NATURE of God is therein also expressly ascribed to Him, Heb. i. 3; Phil. ii. 6; Col. ii. 9. Compare Col. i. 15. 19. Abp. Wake.

[a] Thirdly, in God the Holy Ghost, &c.] The Holy Ghost is not merely an attribute or power of the Father, but hath a real subsistence, distinct both from the Father and the Son. For the New Testament expressly and repeatedly uses the word, "he," concerning Him, mandments[b]. Tell me how many there be?

Answer. Ten.

Question. Which be they?

John xiv. 26; xv. 26; xvi. 13; which is never used in that manner of a mere attribute or power. It ascribes to Him will and understanding, Rom. viii. 27; Heb. ii. 4; comp. 1 Cor. xii. 11: it speaks of Him as being sent by the Father, coming and acting on various occasions, relative both to the Son and to others; nay, as shewing "himself in a bodily shape, like a dove," Luke iii. 22.

Further: the Holy Ghost is, truly and strictly speaking, God. For the language of Scripture concerning Him is such, as cannot belong to any created being. He is there called "the eternal Spirit," Heb. ix. 14; "the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 17: said to "quicken" or "give life," 1 Pet. iii. 18; to be every where present with all good Christians, John xiv. 16, 17; to "search all things, yea, the deep things of God, even as the things of a man are known by his own spirit, which is in him," 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. Christ, being conceived by Him, became "the Son of God," Luke i. 35. Christians, by his dwelling in them, become "the temples of the Holy Ghost," 1 Cor. vi. 19; or, as another place expresses it, "the temples of God," 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. Ananias, by lying to Him, "lied not unto men, but unto God," Acts v. 3, 4. He is said to distribute spiritual and miraculous gifts, "dividing to every man severally, as he will," 1 Cor. xii. 11. "And as the disciples ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them," Acts xiii. 2. He is represented by our Saviour, as able fully to supply the want of his personal presence with the apostles, John xvi. 7. And lastly He is joined with the Father and the Son, on equal terms, both in the form of baptism, where his name and theirs are used alike, Matt. xxviii. 19; and in the solemn form of blessing, where "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost" is placed on a level with "the love of God, and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

These, and many other Scripture expressions, are surely such as cannot be used of any creature; but prove the Spirit, as others, already mentioned, prove the Son, to partake of the same authority and perfections, and therefore the same nature, with the Father. Yet we know, that though in holy writ, men and angels are, sometimes on account of their extensive power, sometimes as representatives of the Deity, called gods, yet in literal propriety of speech there is but one God, and not either three supreme Beings, or a superior and inferior object of adoration. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," Deut. vi. 4. "Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no God: I know not any," Isa. xliv. 8. "Before me was no God formed: neither shall there be after me," Isa. xliii. 10. "I am the Lord,—and my glory will I not give to another," Isa. xlii. 8. "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," Matt. iv. 10. Since then there is not a plurality of Gods: and yet the Son and Spirit are each of them God, no less than the Father: it plainly follows, that they are, in a manner by us inconceivable, so united to Him, that "these three are one," 1 John v. 7; but still, in a manner equally inconceivable, so distinguished from Him, that no one of them is the other. Abp. Secker.

[b] You said, that your Godfathers—that you should keep God's Commandments. &c.] The whole duty of man consists in three points: renouncing what God hath forbidden, believing what He hath taught us, and doing what He hath required of us: which accordingly are the things promised in our name at our baptism. The two former having been noticed, we here proceed to the third.

Now the things, which God requires to be done, are of two sorts: either such, as have been always the duty of all men: or such, as are peculiarly the duty of Christians. And our Catechism very properly treats of the former sort first, comprehending them under those Ten Commandments, which were delivered by the Creator of the world, on mount Sinai, in a most awful manner, as we read in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Exodus. For though indeed they were then given to the Jews particularly, yet the things contained in them are such, as all mankind from the beginning were bound to observe. And therefore, even under the Mosaick dispensation, they, and the tables on which they were engraven, and the ark in which they were put, were distinguished from the rest of God's ordinances by a peculiar regard, as containing the covenant of the Lord, Exod. xxxiv. 28; Deut. iv. 13; ix. 9. 11. 15; Josh. iii. 11; 1 Kings viii. 9. 21; 2 Chron. v. 10; vi. 11. And though the Mosaick dispensation be now at an end, yet concerning these moral precepts of it our Saviour declares, that "one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the Law, till all be fulfilled," Matt. v. 18. Accordingly we find both Him, and his apostles, quoting these Ten Commandments, as matter of perpetual obligation to Christians: who are now, as the Jews were formerly, "The Israel of God," Gal. vi. 16.

Indeed the whole New Testament, and especially the sermon of our blessed Lord on the mount, instructs us to carry their obligation farther, that is, to more points, than either the Jews, a people of gross understanding and carnal dispositions, commonly took into consideration; or their prophets were commissioned distinctly to represent to them; the wisdom of God foreseeing, that it would only increase their guilt: and farther indeed, than the words of the Commandments, if taken strictly, express. But the reason is, that being visibly intended for a summary of human duty, they both may, and must, be understood, by those who are capable of penetrating into the depth of their meaning, to imply more than they express. And therefore, to comprehend their full extent, it will be requisite to observe the following rules. Where any sin is forbidden in them, the opposite duty is implicitly enjoined: and where any duty is enjoined, the opposite sin is implicitly forbidden. Where the highest degree of any thing evil is prohibited; whatever is faulty in the same kind, though in a lower degree, is by consequence prohibited. And where one instance of virtuous behaviour is commanded, every other, that hath the same nature, and same reason for it, is understood to be commanded too. What we are expected to abstain from, we are expected to avoid, as far as we can, all temptations to it, and occasions of it: and what we are expected to practise, we are expected to use all fit means, that may better enable us to practise it. All, that we are bound to do ourselves, we are bound, on fitting occasions, to exhort and assist others to do, when it belongs to them: and all, that we are bound not to do, we are to tempt nobody else to do, but keep them back from it, as much as we have opportunity. The Ten Commandments, excepting two that required enlargement, are delivered in few words: which brief manner of speaking hath great majesty in it. But explaining them according to these rules; which are natural and rational in themselves, favoured by ancient Jewish writers, authorized by our blessed Sa-

Answer.

THE same which God spake in the twentieth Chapter of Exodus, saying, I am the Lord thy God[c], who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

I.

Thou shalt have none other gods but me.

II.

Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, and visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and shew mercy unto thousands in them that love me, and keep my commandments.

III.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his Name in vain.

IV.

Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath-day. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all that thou hast to do; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no manner of work, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, thy cattle, and the stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it.

V.

Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

VI.

Thou shalt do no murder.

VII.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

VIII.

Thou shalt not steal.

IX.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

X.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his servant, nor his maid, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is his.

Question.

What dost thou chiefly learn by these commandments?

vicur, and certainly designed by the makers of the Catechism to be used in expounding it: we shall find, that there is no part of the moral law, but may be fitly ranked under them. Abp. Secker.

[c] — I am the Lord thy God, &c.] Before all these Ten Commandments is placed a general preface, expressing, first, the authority of Him who gave them, "I am the Lord thy God:" secondly, his goodness to those whom He enjoined to observe them; "who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Now the authority of God over us Christians is as great, as it could be over the Jews. And his goodness is much greater, in freeing us from the bondage of sin, and opening to us the heavenly land of promise, than it was in leading them, from Egyptian slavery, to the earthly Canaan; though indeed this deliverance, having made so fresh and so strong an impression on them, was the fittest to be mentioned at that time. Abp. Secker.

For the purport of the several Commandments, see the notes, pages 283—285.

[d] What dost thou chiefly learn by these commandments? A. I learn two things: &c.] The Ten Commandments being originally written, by the finger of God Himself, on two tables of stone; and consisting of two parts, our duty to our Maker, and to our fellow-creatures; which we can never perform as we ought, if we neglect that we owe to ourselves; the four first are usually called duties of the first table; the six last of the second. And our Saviour, in effect, divides them accordingly, when He reduces them to these: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart: and thy neighbour as thyself," Matt. xxii. 37. 39. Abp. Secker.

[e] What is thy duty towards God?] Our duty towards God is, to think so of Him, and to behave so to Him, as his infinite perfection, and our absolute dependence on Him, require: which general duty our Catechism very justly branches out into the following particulars.

First, that we "believe in him." "For he that cometh to God must believe that he is," Heb. xi. 6. The great thing in which this belief consists, is, that we fix firmly in our minds, recal frequently to our memories, and imprint deeply upon our hearts, an awful persuasion of the being and presence, the power and justice, the holiness and truth, of this great Lord of all. The consequence of this will be,

Secondly, that we "fear him." For such attributes as these, duly considered, must fill the most innocent

Answ. My duty towards God, is to believe in him, to fear him, and to love him with all my heart, with all my mind, with all my soul, and with all my strength; to worship him, to give him thanks, to put my whole trust in him, to call upon him, to honour his holy Name and his Word, and to serve him truly all the days of my life.

creatures with reverence and self-abasement. But sinful and guilty ones, as we know ourselves to have been, have cause to feel yet stronger emotions in their souls from such a meditation: apprehensions of his displeasure, and solicitude for his pardon; leading us naturally to that penitent care of our hearts, and lives, on which He hath graciously assured us, that, through faith in Christ Jesus, we shall be forgiven. And then, gratitude for his mercy will prompt us to the Third duty towards Him, which our Catechism specifies, that we "love him: the fear of the Lord" being, as the Son of Sirach declares, "the beginning of his love," Ecclus. xxv. 12. For whenever we come to reflect seriously on that goodness, which hath given us all the comforts that we enjoy; that pity which offers pardon, on most equitable terms, for all the faults that we have committed; that grace, which enables us to perform every duty acceptably; and that infinite bounty, which rewards our imperfect performances with eternal happiness: we cannot but feel ourselves bound to love such a benefactor, "with all our heart, and with all our mind, with all our soul, and all our strength:" to rejoice in being under his government; "make our boast of him all the day long," Ps. xliv. 8; and choose Him for "our portion for ever," Ps. lxxiii. 25, 26. A mind, thus affected, would be uneasy, without paying the regard set down in the Fourth place, which is, "to worship him:" to acknowledge our dependence, and pay our homage to Him; both in private, to preserve and improve a sense of religion in ourselves; and in publick, to support and spread it in the world. The first part of worship, mentioned in the Catechism, and the first in a natural order of things, is "giving him thanks." God originally made and fitted all his creatures for happiness: if any of them have made themselves miserable, this doth not lessen their obligation of thankfulness to Him: but his continuing still good, and abounding in forgiveness and liberality, increases that obligation unspeakably. With a grateful sense of his past favours is closely connected, "putting our trust in him" for the time to come. And justly doth the Catechism require it to be our "whole trust." For his power and goodness are infinite: those of every creature may fail us; and all, that they can possibly do for us, proceeds ultimately from Him. Now a principal expression of reliance on God is, petitioning for his help. For if we "pray in faith," James i. 6; v. 15, we shall live so too. And therefore trusting in Him, which might have been made a separate head, is included in this of worship; and put between the first part of it, "giving thanks to him;" and the second, "calling upon him;" according to that of the Psalmist: "O Lord, in thee have I trusted: let me never be confounded," Ps. xxxi. 1. To call upon God is to place ourselves in his presence; and there to beg of Him, for ourselves and each other, with unfeigned humility and submission, such assistance in our duty, such provision for our wants, and such defence against our enemies, of every kind, as infinite wisdom sees fit for us all. After this evident obligation, follows a

Fifth not less so: "to honour his holy name and word:" not presuming even to speak of the great God in a negligent way; but preserving, in every expression and action, that reverence to Him, which is due: paying, not a superstitious, but a decent and respectful regard, to whatever bears any peculiar relation to Him; his day, his church, his ministers: but especially honouring his holy word, the law of our lives, and the foundation of our hopes, by a diligent study and firm belief of what it teaches; and that universal obedience to what it commands, which our Catechism reserves for the Sixth and last, as it is undoubtedly the greatest, thing: "to serve him truly all the days of our life." Obedience is the end of faith and fear: the proof of love; the foundation of trust; the necessary qualification to make worship, and honour of every kind, acceptable. This therefore must complete the whole, that we "walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless," Luke i. 6; not thinking any one so difficult, as to despair of it; or so small, as to despise it; and never be "weary in well-doing: for we shall reap in due season, if we faint not," Gal. vi. 9: and "he" alone "shall be saved, that endureth to the end," Matt. xxiv. 13. Abp. Secker.

[f] What is thy duty towards thy Neighbour?] The whole law, concerning our several obligations one to another, "is briefly comprehended," as St. Paul very justly observes, "in this" one "saying, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," Rom. xiii. 9. Our "neighbour" is every one with whom we have at any time any concern, or on whose welfare our actions can have any influence. For whoever is thus within our reach, is in the most important sense near to us, however distant in other respects. To "love our neighbour," is to bear him good-will; which of course will dispose us to think favourably of him, and behave properly to him. And to "love him as ourselves," is to have, not only a real, but a strong and active good-will towards him; with a tenderness for his interests duly proportioned to that, which we naturally feel for our own. Such a temper would most powerfully restrain us from every thing wrong, and prompt us to every thing right; and therefore is "the fulfilling of the law," so far as it relates to our mutual behaviour.

But because, on some occasions, we may either not see, or not confess we see, what is right, and what otherwise; our Saviour hath put the same duty in a light somewhat different, which gives the safest and fullest, and clearest direction for practice, that any one precept can give. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye unto them." Behaving properly depends on judging truly; and that, in cases of any doubt, depends on hearing with due attention both sides. To our own side we never fail attending. The rule therefore is, give the other side the same advantage, by supposing it your own; and after considering carefully and fairly, what, if it were indeed your own, you should not only desire (for desires may be unreasonable) but think you had an equitable claim to, and well-grounded expectation of, from the other party, that do in regard to him. Would we but honestly take this method, our mistakes would be so exceeding few, and slight, and innocent, that Answ. My duty towards my Neighbour, is to love him as myself, and to do to all men, as I would they should do unto me: To love, honour, and succour, my father and mother: To honour and obey the Queen, and all that are put in authority under her: To submit myself to all my governours, teachers, spiritual pastors and masters: To order myself lowly and reverently to all my betters: To hurt no body by word nor deed: To be true and just in all my dealing: To bear no malice nor hatred in my heart: To keep my hands from picking and stealing, and my tongue from evil-speaking, lying, and slandering: To keep my body in temperance, soberness, and chastity: Not to covet nor desire other men's goods; but to learn and labour truly to get mine own living, and to do my duty in that state of life, unto which it shall please God to call me.

My good Child, know this, that thou art not able to do these things of thyself, nor to walk in the Commandments of God, and to serve him, without his special grace; which thou must learn at all times to call for by diligent prayer. Let me hear therefore, if thou canst say the Lord's Prayer[g].

well might our blessed Lord add, "For this is the law and the prophets."

Yet, after all, there might be difficulty sometimes, especially to some persons, in the application of a rule so very general. And therefore we have, in the Commandments, the reciprocal duties of man to man branched out into six particulars. Abp. Secker.

[g] — Let me hear therefore, if thou canst say the Lord's Prayer.] The Mediator, through whom our Maker hath appointed that we may "come boldly to the throne of his grace," Heb. iv. 16, hath not only procured us the privilege, but hath instructed us how to use it, by delivering to us a prayer of his own composition; which might be at once a form for us frequently to repeat, and a pattern for us always to imitate.

That the Lord's Prayer was designed as a form, appears from his own words: "After this manner pray ye:" or, translating more literally, "Thus pray ye," Matt. vi. 9; and, which is yet more express, "When ye pray, say, Our Father," &c. Luke xi. 2. Besides, it was given by Him to his disciples on their request, that He would "teach them to pray, as John also taught his disciples," ver. 1: which undoubtedly was, as the great rabbis amongst the Jews commonly taught theirs, by a form. And accordingly this prayer hath been considered and used as such, from the earliest ages of Christianity down to the present.

Yet our Saviour's design was not, that this should be the only prayer of Christians: as appears both from the precepts and the practice of the apostles, as well as from the nature and reason of the thing. But when it is not used as a form, it is however of unspeakable advantage as a model. He proposes it indeed more particularly as an example of shortness. Not that we are never to make longer prayers: for He Himself "continued all night in prayer to God," Luke vi. 12: and we have a much longer, made by the apostles, in the fourth chapter of the Acts. But his intention was, to teach by this instance, that we are not to affect unmeaning repetitions, or any needless multiplicity of words, as if we "thought that we should be heard for our much speaking," Matt. vi. 7. And not only in this respect, but every other, is our Lord's Prayer an admirable institution and direction for praying aright. Abp. Secker.

[h] Our Father, &c.] The prayer, which our blessed Saviour taught his disciples, doth not need to be explained, as being, in itself, and originally, obscure. For no words could be more intelligible to his apostles, than all those, which He hath used throughout it. And even to us now there is nothing that deserves the name of difficult; notwithstanding the distance of time, the change of circumstances, and the different nature and turn of the Jewish tongue from our own. But still, in order to apprehend it sufficiently, there is requisite some knowledge of religion, and the language of religion. Besides, as we all learnt it when we were young, whilst we had but little understanding, and less attention: it is not impossible, but some of us may have gone on repeating it to an advanced age, without considering it near so carefully as we ought. And this very thing, that the words are so familiar to us, may have been the main occasion, that we have scarce ever thought of their import. Now we are sensible it would be a great unhappiness to have our devotions, as the church of Rome have the principal part of theirs, in a language that we could not understand. But surely it is as great a fault, if, when we may so easily understand them, we do not; or if, though we do understand them, when we think of the matter, we think about it so little, that, as to all good purposes, it is much the same with praying in an unknown tongue. The Lord's Prayer, in itself, is very clear, very expressive, very comprehensive. But all this is nothing to us, if we say it without knowing, or without minding, what we say. For how excellent words soever we use; if we add no meaning to them this can be no praying. And therefore to make it really beneficial to us, we must fix deeply in our thoughts what it was intended by its Author to contain. Abp. Secker.

heavenly Father, who is the giver of all goodness, to send his grace unto me, and to all people; that we may worship him, serve him, and obey him, as we ought to do. And I pray unto God, that he will send us all things that be needful both for our souls and bodies; and that he will be merciful unto us, and forgive us our sins; and that it will please him to save and defend us in all dangers ghostly and bodily; and that he will keep us from all sin and wickedness, and from our ghostly enemy, and from everlasting death. And this I trust he will do of his mercy and goodness, through our Lord Jesus Christ. And therefore I say, Amen, So be it. 2 Cor. i. 20.

Question.

HOW many Sacraments hath Christ ordained[i] in his Church?

Answ. Two[k] only[l], as generally

[i] How many sacraments hath Christ ordained &c.] The far greater part of the duties, which we owe to God, flow, as it were, of themselves, from his nature and attributes, and the several relations to Him in which we stand, whether made known to us by reason or Scripture. Such are those which have been hitherto explained: the ten Commandments: and prayer for the grace which our fallen condition requires, in order to keep them. But there are still some other important precepts peculiar to Christianity, and deriving their whole obligation from our Saviour's institution of them: concerning which it is highly requisite that our Catechism should instruct us, before it concludes. And these are the two Sacraments. Abp. Secker.

[k] Two] It appears, that the two ordinances of "Baptism" and "the Supper of the Lord" are properly sacraments, because the whole nature of a sacrament, as about to be described, does belong to them. For, first, there is in both these "an outward and visible sign;" namely, water, in Baptism; bread and wine, in the Lord's Supper.

Secondly, There is "an inward and spiritual grace," signified and conveyed by these signs. "The washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5, by the one: "the body and blood of Christ" by the other, 1 Cor. x. 16.

Thirdly, There is for both a divine institution. For baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them, &c:" for the Lord's Supper, Luke xxii. 19, 20, "This do in remembrance of me." See 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25.

Fourthly, they were both ordained as means, whereby to convey their several graces to us, and as a pledge to assure us of them. Baptism, to regenerate us, John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5. The Lord's Supper, to communicate to us the body and blood of Christ, 1 Cor. x. 16.

For which reason, lastly, they are generally necessary to salvation. All Christians have a right to them: nor may any, without hazard of missing of these graces, refuse to use them, who have the opportunity of being partakers of them. See John iii. 5; Mark xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xi. 24. Abp. Wake.

[l] Two only,] There are two only that are truly such: and these two are plainly sufficient; one for our entrance into the Christian covenant; the other, during our whole continuance in it: "Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord." The papists reckon no less than seven sacraments. And though this number was not named for above 100 years after Christ, nor fixed by the authority of even their own church till 200 years ago, that is, since the Reformation; yet now they accurse us, for not agreeing with them in it, but acknowledging only two.

The first of these five is Confirmation. And if this be a sacrament, we administer it as well as they, indeed much more agreeably to the original practice; and are therefore intitled, at least, to the same benefit from it. But though Christ did indeed "put his hands on children, and bless them," Mark x. 16; yet we do not read, that He appointed this particular ceremony for a means of conveying grace. And though the apostles did use it after Him, as others had done before Him; yet there is no foundation to ascribe any separate efficacy to the laying on of hands, as distinct from the prayers that accompany it: or to look upon the whole of Confirmation as any thing else than a solemn manner of persons taking upon themselves the baptismal vow, followed by the solemn addresses of the bishop and the congregation, that they may ever keep it: in which addresses, laying on of hands is used, partly as a mark of good-will to the person for whom the prayers are offered up; and partly also as a sign, that the fatherly hand of God is over all who undertake to serve Him: yet without any claim of conveying his grace particularly by it; but only with intention of praying for his grace along with it: which prayers however we have so just ground to hope He will hear, that they who neglect this ordinance, though not a sacrament, are greatly wanting both to their interest and their duty.

Another sacrament of the church of Rome is penance; which they make to consist of particular confession to the priest of every deadly sin, particular absolution from him, and such acts of devotion, mortification, or charity, as he shall think fit to enjoin. But no one part of this being required in Scripture, much less any outward sign of it appointed, or any inward grace annexed to it; there is nothing in the whole that hath any appearance of a sacrament; but too much suspicion of a contrivance to gain an undue influence and power.

A third sacrament of theirs is extreme unction. But their plea for it is no more than this. St. James, at a time when miraculous gifts were common, directed "the elders of the church," who usually had those gifts, to "anoint the sick with oil," James v. 14, 15; as we read the disciples did, whilst our Saviour was on earth, Mark vi. 13; in order to obtain by the "prayer of faith," (that "faith" which could "remove mountains," Matt. xvii. 20; xxi. 21; Mark xi. 23,) the recovery, if God saw fit, of their bodily health; and the forgiveness of those sins for which their disease was inflicted, if they had committed any such. And upon this the church of Rome, now all such miraculous gifts are ceased, continues notwithstanding to anoint the sick, for a quite different purpose; not at all for the recovery of their health; for they do not use it till they think them very nearly, if not quite, past recovery; nor indeed for the pardon of their sins; for these, they say, are pardoned upon confession, which commonly is made before it; but chiefly, as themselves own, to necessary to salvation, that is to say, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord.

Quest. What meanest thou by this word Sacrament[m]?

Answ. I mean an outward and visible sign[n] of an inward and spiritual grace[o] given unto us, ordained by Christ himself[p], as a means whereby we receive the same[q], and a pledge to assure us thereof[r].

Quest. How many parts are there in a Sacrament?

Answ. Two; the outward visible procure composedness and courage in the hour of death: a purpose not only unmentioned by St. James, but inconsistent with the purpose of recovery, which he doth mention, and very often impossible to be attained. For they frequently anoint persons after they are become intirely senseless. And yet, in spite of all these things, they will needs have this practice owned for a sacrament: which indeed is now, as they manage it, a mere piece of superstition.

Another thing, which they esteem a Christian sacrament, is matrimony: though it was ordained, not by Christ, but long before his appearance on earth, in the time of man's innocency; and hath no outward sign appointed in it, as a means and pledge of inward grace. But the whole matter is, that they have happened most ridiculously to mistake their own Latin translation of the New Testament; where St. Paul, having compared the union between the first married pair, Adam and Eve, to that between Christ the second Adam, and his spouse the Church; and having said that "this is a great mystery," Eph. v. 32; a figure, or comparison, not fully and commonly understood: the old interpreter, whose version they use, for "mystery" hath put "sacrament:" which in his days signified any thing in religion that carried a hidden meaning: and they have understood him of what we now call a sacrament. Whereas if every thing, that once had that name in the larger sense of the word, were at present to have it in the stricter sense; there would be a hundred sacraments, instead of the seven, which they pretend there are.

The fifth and last thing, which they wrongly insist on our honouring with this title, is, holy orders. But, as there are three orders in the Church, bishops, priests, and deacons; here would be three sacraments, if there were any: but indeed there is none. For the laying on of hands in ordination is neither appointed, nor used, to convey or signify any spiritual grace: but only to confer a right of executing such an office in the church of Christ. And though prayers, for God's grace and blessing on the person ordained, are indeed very justly and usefully added; and will certainly be heard, unless the person be unworthy: yet these prayers, on this occasion, no more make what is done a sacrament, than any other prayers for God's grace on any other occasion.

However, as I have already said of confirmation, so I say now of orders and marriage, if they were sacraments, they would be as much so to us, as to the Romanists, whether we called them sacraments, or not. And if we use the name ever so erroneously, indeed if we never used it at all; as the Scripture hath never used it: that could do us no harm; provided, under any name, we believe but the things which Christ hath taught; and do but the things which He hath commanded; for on this, and this alone, depends our acceptance, and eternal salvation. Abp. Secker.

[m] What meanest thou by this word Sacrament?] The word "sacrament," by virtue of its original in the Latin tongue, signifies any sacred or holy thing or action: and among the heathens was particularly applied to denote, sometimes a pledge, deposited in a sacred place; sometimes an oath, the most sacred of obligations; and especially that oath of fidelity, which the soldiery took to their general. In Scripture it is not used at all. By the early writers of the Western church it was used to express almost any thing relating to our holy religion: at least any thing that was figurative, and signified somewhat further than at first sight appeared. But afterwards a more confined use of the word prevailed by degrees: and in that stricter sense, which hath long been the common one, and which our Catechism follows, the nature of a sacrament comprehends the following particulars. Abp. Secker.

[n] I mean an outward and visible sign] 1. There must be "an outward and visible sign:" the solemn application of some bodily and sensible thing or action to a meaning and purpose, which in its own nature it hath not. In common life, we have many other signs to express our meanings, on occasions of great consequence, besides words. And no wonder then, if, in religion, we have some of the same kind. Abp. Secker.

[o] — of an inward and spiritual grace] 2. In a sacrament, the outward and visible sign must denote "an inward and spiritual grace given unto us:" that is, some favour freely bestowed on us from heaven; by which our inward and spiritual condition, the state of our souls, is made better. Most of the significative actions, that we use in religion, express only our duty to God. Thus kneeling in prayer is used to shew our reverence towards Him to whom we pray. And signing a child with the cross, after it is baptized, declares our obligation not to be ashamed of the cross of Christ. But a sacrament, besides expressing, on our part, duty to God, expresses, on his part, some grace or favour towards us. Abp. Secker.

[p] — ordained by Christ himself,] 3. In order to intitle any thing to the name of Sacrament, a further requisite is, that it be "ordained by Christ himself." We may indeed use, on the foot of human authority alone, actions, that set forth either our sense of any duty, or our belief in God's grace. For it is certainly as lawful to express a good meaning by any other proper signs as by words. But then, such marks as these, which we commonly call ceremonies, as they are taken up at pleasure, may be laid aside again at pleasure; and ought to be laid aside, whenever they grow too numerous, or abuses are made of them, which cannot easily be reformed: and this hath frequently been the case. But sacraments are of perpetual obligation: for they stand on the authority of Christ; who hath certainly appointed nothing to be for ever observed in his church, but what He saw would be for ever useful. Abp. Secker.

[q] — as a means whereby we receive the same,] Nor doth every appointment of Christ, though it be of perpetual obligation, deserve the name of a sacrament, but those, and no other, which are, 4. not only signs of grace, but "means" also, "whereby we receive the same." None but our blessed Lord could appoint such means: and which of his ordinances should be such, and which not, none but Himself could determine. From his word, therefore, we are to learn it: and then, as we hope to attain the end, we must use the means. But when it is said, that the sacraments are means of sign, and the inward spiritual grace.

Quest. What is the outward visible sign or form in Baptism[s]?

Answ. Water; wherein the person is baptized[t] In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost[u]. Acts x. 47.

grace; we are not to understand, either that the performance of the mere outward action doth, by its own virtue, produce a spiritual effect in us; or that God hath annexed any such effect to that alone: but that He will accompany the action with his blessing, provided it be done as it ought; with those qualifications which He requires. And therefore, unless we fulfil the condition, we must not expect the benefit.

Further; calling the sacraments means of grace, doth not signify them to be means by which we merit grace: for nothing but the sufferings of our blessed Saviour can do that for us; but means, by which what He hath merited is conveyed to us.

Nor yet are they the only means of conveying grace: for reading, and hearing, and meditating upon the word of God, are part of the things which He hath appointed for this end: and prayer is another part, accompanied with an express promise, that, if we "ask, we shall receive," John xvi. 24. But these, not being such actions as figure out, and represent, the benefits which they derive to us, though they are means of grace, are not signs of it; and therefore do not come under the notion of sacraments. Abp. Seeker.

[r] —and a pledge to assure us thereof.] But, 5. A sacrament is not only a sign or representation of some heavenly favour, and a means whereby we receive it, but also "a pledge to assure us thereof." Not that any thing can give us a greater assurance, in point of reason, of any blessing from God, than his bare promise can do: but that such observances, appointed in token of his promises, affect our imaginations with a stronger sense of them; and make a deeper and more lasting, and therefore more useful, impression on our minds. For this cause, in all nations of the world, representations by action have ever been used, as well as words, upon solemn occasions: especially upon entering into and renewing treaties and covenants with each other. And therefore, in condescension to a practice, which being so universal among men, appears to be founded in the nature of man; God hath graciously added to his covenant also the solemnity of certain outward instructive performances; by which He declares to us, that as surely as our bodies are washed by water, and nourished by bread broken and wine poured forth and received; so surely are our souls purified from sin by the baptism of repentance; and strengthened in all goodness, by partaking of that mercy, which the wounding of the body of Christ, and the shedding of his blood, hath obtained for us. And thus these religious actions, so far as they are performed by God's minister, in pursuance of his appointment, are an earnest or pledge on his part, which was one ancient signification of the word sacrament: and so far as we join in them, they are an obligation, binding like an oath, on our part: which was the other primitive meaning of the word. Abp. Secker.

[s] What is the outward visible sign or form in Baptism?] Baptism is the sacrament of our new and spiritual birth, John iii. 4, 5; the seal of our adoption, Rom. iv. 11; and the solemn means of our admission into the communion of the Christian church, Acts ii. 41. By the outward washing whereof, our inward washing from our sins by the blood and Spirit of Christ is both clearly exhibited, and certainly sealed to us, Acts ii. 38, 39; Tit. iii. 5. Compare Heb. ix. 13, 14.

The necessary parts of this sacrament are water and the word: the one to represent our spiritual washing and cleansing by the blood of Christ; the other to declare the faith, into which we are baptized, and by which we hope to be saved; namely, of God "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." Abp. Wake.

[t] Water; wherein the person is baptized] The element of water is a part of this sacrament, of divine institution; and was designed to signify our spiritual cleansing by Christ's blood: that, as our bodies are washed with, and cleansed from their pollution by, water; so are our souls purified from sin by the blood of Christ. And for both these reasons it is a necessary and immutable part of this holy sacrament. Abp. Wake.

Baptism being intended for the sign and means of our purification from sin; water, the proper element for purifying and cleansing, is appointed to be used in it. There is indeed a sect, sprung up amongst us within a little more than an hundred years, that deny this appointment; and make the Christian baptism signify only the pouring out of the gift of the Holy Ghost upon a person. But our Saviour expressly requires that we be "born of water," as well as "of the Spirit," to "enter into the kingdom of God," John iii. 5. And not only John, his forerunner, "baptized with water," Matt. iii. 11; but his "disciples" also, by his direction, "baptized" in the same manner, even "more than John." John iv. 1, 2. When therefore He bad them afterwards "teach all nations, baptizing them," Matt. xxviii. 19; what baptism could they understand, but that, in which He had employed them before? And accordingly, we find, they did understand that. Philip, we read, baptized the Samaritans, Acts viii. 12: not with the Holy Ghost, for the apostles went down some time after to do that themselves, verse 14, &c.; but with water undoubtedly, as we find, in the same chapter, he did the eunuch: where the words are, "Here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptized? And they went down to the water: and he baptized him," verse 36, 38. Again, after Cornelius, and his friends, had received the Holy Ghost, and so were already baptized in that sense, Peter asks, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Acts x. 47. When therefore John says, that "he baptized with water, but Christ should baptize with the Holy Ghost," Matt. iii. 11: he means, not that Christians should not be baptized with water, but that they should have the Holy Ghost poured out upon them also, in a degree that John's disciples had not. When St. Peter says, "The baptism, which saveth us, is not the putting away of the filth of the flesh," 1 Pet. iii. 21; he means, it is not the mere outward act, unaccompanied by a suitable inward disposition. When St. Paul says, that "Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel." 1 Cor. i. 17; he means, that preaching was the principal thing he was to do in person: to baptize, he might appoint others under him; and it seems, commonly did: as St. Peter did not baptize Cornelius and his friends himself, but "commanded them to be baptized." Acts x. 48: and we read in St. John, that "Jesus baptized not, but his disciples," John iv. 2.

Water-baptism therefore is appointed. And why the Church of Rome should not think water sufficient in baptism, but aim at mending what our Saviour hath [u] — In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.] Washing with water is not the whole outward part of this sacrament. For our Saviour commanded his apostles, not only to "baptize all nations," but to "baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," Matt. xxviii. 19. Sometimes indeed the Scripture speaks of baptism, as if it were administered only "in the name of the Lord Jesus," Acts ii. 38; x. 48; xix. 5. But it fully appears, Acts xix. 2, 3, that the name of the Holy Ghost was used at the same time: and therefore that of the Father, we may be sure. Now being baptized "in the name" of these three, may signify being baptized by virtue of their authority. But the exacter translation is, "into the name:" and the fuller import of the expression is, by this solemn action taking upon us their name; (for servants are known by the name of their master;) and professing ourselves devoted to the faith, and worship, and obedience of these three; our Creator, our Redeemer, our Sanctifier. In this profession the whole of Christianity is briefly comprehended: and on this foundation therefore the ancient creeds are all built. Abp. Secker.

This form of baptism is necessary to the administration of this sacrament: nor can it be duly administered by any other. Abp. Wake.

[x] A death unto sin, &c.] By dying unto sin, which is the great benefit conferred by baptism, in Scripture language is understood, that baptism does free us from the guilt and punishment of sin, and confers good dispositions and tendencies to live better for the future. Dr. Nicholls.

The phrase refers to the old custom of "baptizing" by dipping: though the precise manner, in which water shall be applied in baptism, Scripture hath not determined. For the word, "baptize," means only to wash: whether that be done by plunging a thing under water, or pouring the water upon it. The former of these, burying, as it were, the person baptized, in the water, and raising him out of it again, without question was anciently the more usual method: on account of which, St. Paul speaks of baptism, as representing both the death, and burial, and resurrection of Christ, and what is grounded on them, our being "dead and buried to sin;" renouncing it, and being acquitted of it; and our rising again, to "walk in newness of life," Rom. vi. 4. 11; Col. ii. 12; being both obliged and enabled to practise, for the future, every duty of piety and virtue. But still the other manner of washing, by the pouring or sprinkling of water, sufficiently expresses the same two things: our being by this ordinance purified from the guilt of sin, and bound and qualified to keep ourselves pure from the defilement of it. Besides, it very naturally represents that "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ," 1 Pet. i. 2; to which our salvation is owing. And the use of it seems not only to be foretold by the prophet Isaiah, speaking of our Saviour, "He shall sprinkle many nations," Isa. lii. 15; that is, many shall receive his baptism; and by the prophet Ezekiel, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean," Ezek. xxxvi. 25: but to be had in view also by the apostle, where he speaks of "having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water," Heb. x. 22. And though it was less frequently used in the first ages, it must almost of necessity have been sometimes used: for instance, when baptism was administered, as we read in the Acts it was, to several thousands at once, Acts ii. 41; when it was administered on a sudden in private houses, as we find it, in the same book, to the gaoler and all his family, the very night in which they were converted, Acts xvi. 33: or when sick persons received it; in which last case, the present method was always taken, because the other, of dipping them, might have been dangerous. And from the same apprehension of danger in these colder countries, pouring the water is allowed, even when the person baptized is in health. And the particular manner being left at liberty, that is now universally chosen, which is looked on as safer: because were there more to be said for the other, than there is; God "will have mercy, and not sacrifice," Hos. vi. 6; Matt. ix. 13; xii. 7. Abp. Secker.

[y] — for being by nature born in sin, &c.] All men are by nature born in sin, ever since that by the transgression of our first parents sin entered into the world, Ps. li. 5; Rom. v. 12; nor was ever any exempt from this unhappy state, but He only, who knew no sin, the Lord Jesus Christ. And, being "born in sin," all men must of necessity be also "children of wrath," Eph. ii. 3: seeing all sin is both hateful to God and worthy of punishment. But those who are baptized are thereby made "children of grace," as by baptism they are taken into covenant with God; are regenerated by the Holy Spirit; are sanctified and cleansed from their sins by the blood of Christ; are intitled to God's favour; and made heirs of his heavenly kingdom: so that should they die before they commit any actual sin, we are assured by God's word, that they shall certainly be saved. Mark xvi. 16; Acts ii. 38, 39; xxii. 17; Gal. iii. 27; Eph. ii. 4, 5; v. 26; Tit. iii. 5; 1 Pet. iii. 21.

But, though all persons are by baptism put into a state of salvation, and become children of grace; those only continue in this state, and hold fast their right to those benefits, who take care to live according to the Gospel of Christ; and to fulfil those promises, which either themselves made, or which were by others made in their name, and on their behalf, at their baptism. Abp. Wake. By being "made children of grace" we understand that by baptism, as an initiatory rite, we enter into covenant with God; are members of Christ's mystical body, the Church; are partakers of all his gracious promises; and also do thereby receive sufficient strength to enable us to perform the precepts of the Gospel. For, 1. this is the federal rite, by which we are initiated into the Christian body or society, Rom. vi. 3; Matt. xxviii. 19; and by which, from strangers and aliens to God, we become members of the family of Christ, Eph. i. 22, 23; v. 23; and enter into the communion of the saints, Heb. xii. 22, 23. Hereby we are freed from the empire of the devil and the society of wicked men: we are listed under Christ's banner, and are made denizens of his kingdom; are fellow-subjects with all the great apostles and glorious martyrs in Christ's kingdom; and have a title to all his glorious promises, Mark xvi. 16, if we square our lives according to his laws. Secondly, by baptism we have sufficient strength afforded us, to practise the rules of the Gospel, by the grace of God's Holy Spirit then conveyed unto us, working in us. This is clear from many passages of Scripture, such as John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5; Rom. vi. 6, 7. By all which it is plain, that by baptism we do receive the advantage and assistance of God's Holy Spirit, to enable us to encounter all the wiles and malice of the devil, and the temptations of the world; and have courage afforded us manfully to discharge our duty, whatever difficulties and dangers beset us in the performance of it. Dr. Nicholls.

[z] What is required of persons to be baptized?] The mere outward act of being baptized is, as St. Peter, in the words already mentioned, very truly expresses it, the mere "putting away of the filth of the flesh;" unless it be made effectual to save us, as he teaches in the same place it must, by "the answer of a good conscience towards God," 1 Pet. iii. 21; that is, by the sincere stipulation and engagement of "repentance, whereby we forsake sin; and faith, whereby we believe the promises of God made to us in that sacrament." For it is impossible that He should forgive us our past sins, unless we are sorry for them, and resolved to quit them: and it is as impossible that we should quit them effectually, unless a firm persuasion of his helping and rewarding us excite and support our endeavours. These two things therefore we see our Catechism justly mentions as necessary in answer to the question, "What is required of persons to be baptized?" Abp. Secker.

[a] Repentance whereby they forsake sin;] The first qualification for baptism is repentance. For every person, in order to be baptized, must engage to forsake every known sin, however near and dear to him, Acts ii. 38. 41; James ii. 10: to suffer no vicious habit to remain within him, Rom. vi. 6; or any thing else that is contrary to the commands of the blessed Lord, whose religion he doth then solemnly espouse, resolving wholly to give himself up to his directions. Dr. Nicholls.

[b] —and Faith, whereby they stedfastly believe &c.] The second qualification is faith: and that is to believe all that God has expressly revealed to us by his holy word, Acts viii. 37. And upon this account it is, that the Church has all along required of persons to be baptized, to give an assent to all the articles of the Christian faith, by repeating the Creed at the time of their baptism. Dr. Nicholls.

[c] Why then are Infants baptized, &c.] There is an objection against faith and repentance being qualifications for baptism: for we allow children to be baptized, and yet it is very plain, that they neither believe nor repent. To this we answer, that the sureties of the children promise, that they shall discharge both these duties, when they come to a competent age. And this they are obliged to, though they do not actually consent to their sureties' promise: which, as a beneficial act, binds them, as the acts of a guardian for the good of his ward bind such an orphan. And, by being brought into the Christian covenant by this stipulation of their sureties, they are as much obliged to the performance of the articles of it, as the Jewish children, who were admitted by circumcision into the Mosaical covenant at eight days old, Dent. xix. 10—12; Gen. xvii. 12, were tied up to perform the precepts of that law. Dr. Nicholls.

We are not to consider what we think best, but what God has directed us to do. Now God expressly ordered the children of the Jews to be admitted into covenant with him at eight days old, Gen. xvii. 12, 13; Deut. xxix. 10—12. Into the place of circumcision baptism has succeeded, Col. ii. 11, 12; as the Gospel has into the place of the law. There is therefore the same reason, why our children should from the beginning be admitted into the Christian, as why the Jews' children should have been entered into the legal covenant. God has made no exception in this particular: our infants are as capable of covenanting as theirs were: and, if God thought fit to receive them into the legal covenant, and did not account the incapacity, which their age put them under, any bar to hinder them from circumcision; neither ought we to think the same defect any sufficient obstacle, to keep our infants from being baptized, and admitted thereby into that of the Gospel. Abp. Wake.

[d] Why was the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper ordained?] As by the sacrament of baptism we enter into the Christian covenant, so by that of the Lord's Supper we profess our thankful continuance in it: and therefore the first answer of our Catechism concerning this ordinance tells us, that it was appointed "for the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and of the benefits which we receive thereby." Abp. Secker.

It is called the Lord's Supper, because it was both instituted by our Lord at supper, and was designed to succeed into the place of the paschal supper of the Jews. Matt. xxvi. 26, &c.; Mark xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xi. 23—25, &c. Abp. Wake.

[e] For the continual remembrance of the sacrifice &c.] The design of our Saviour in this institution was to leave to his church a perpetual, solemn, and sacred memorial of his death for us: that as often as we come to the Lord's table, and there join in the celebration of this holy sacrament, we might be moved by what is there done, at once both to call to our remembrance all the passages of his passion, to consider Him as there set forth crucified before our eyes; and to meditate upon the love of Christ thus dying for us, and upon the mighty benefits and advantages, which have accrued to us thereby; and to have our hearts affected after a suitable manner towards Him. Abp. Wake.

It is said to be "for a continual remembrance," because it is a remembrance, which is not to determine after a certain time, as that of the paschal supper did; but is to continue to be kept up by this holy sacrament, to the very end of the world. 1 Cor. xi. 26; compare Acts i. 11; John xiv. 3.

By this expression it is also intimated, that this sacrament ought not to be celebrated only once in the year, as the passover was; but to be administered from time of Christ[f], and of the benefits which we receive thereby.

to time, so as to keep up a constant lively remembrance in our minds of the sacrifice of the death of Christ. Abp. Wake.

[f] — of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, &c.] The death of Christ is called a "sacrifice," because Christ, by his dying, became an expiatory sacrifice for the sins of mankind: Heb. ix. 12. 24. 28; x. 10; 1 Pet. ii. 21. 24; iii. 18: Christ having taken upon Him our sins, and died for them; that by his death we might be freed, both from the guilt, and punishment of them. Rom. iv. 25; v. 20; viii. 32; 2 Cor. v. 21; Col. i. 21, 22. Abp. Wake.

[g] Bread and Wine, &c.] Christ instituted this sacrament in both these: He first took bread, &c.; and then, after the same manner, He took the cup, &c.: see 1 Cor. xi. 23—25. And for what end He appointed these outward signs of this sacrament, the words of his institution plainly shew; namely, that those, who celebrate this sacrament, might eat of the one, and drink of the other, at his table. So that it is necessary, that every communicant should receive this sacrament in both kinds, because our Saviour has so appointed it. Thus He gave it to his disciples, and thus they received it at his hands, 1 Cor. xi. 27—29. And it is certain that the apostles gave the cup to the lay communicants in their churches: or else St. Paul would never have argued with the Corinthians against communicating with idolaters, as he does, 1 Cor. x. 15, &c.: nor have spoken of this sacrament, as he does in the next chapter, ver. 26—29. In every one of which he takes notice of their drinking of the sacramental cup, as well as of their eating of the sacramental bread. Abp. Wake.

[h] The Body and Blood of Christ, &c.] That, which is given by the priest in this sacrament, is, as to its substance, bread and wine; as to its sacramental nature and signification, it is the figure or representation of Christ's body and blood, which was broken and shed for us. The very body and blood of Christ, as yet, it is not. But, being with faith and piety received by the communicant, it becomes to him by the blessing of God, and the grace of the Holy Spirit, the very body and blood of Christ; as it entitles him to a part in the sacrifice of his death, and to the benefits thereby procured to all his faithful and obedient servants. Abp. Wake.

[i] — which are verily and indeed taken &c.] These words are intended to shew, that our Church as truly believes the strongest assertions of Scripture concerning this sacrament, as the church of Rome doth; only takes more care to understand them in the right meaning: which is, that, though in one sense, all communicants equally partake of what Christ calls his body and blood, that is, the outward signs of them; yet in a much more important sense, "the faithful" only, the pious and virtuous receiver, eats his flesh and drinks his blood; shares in the life and strength derived to men from his incarnation and death; and through faith in Him, becomes, by a vital union, one with Him; "a member," as St. Paul expresses it, "of his flesh and of his bones," Eph. v. 30; certainly not in a literal sense, which yet the Romanists might as well assert, as that we eat his flesh in a literal sense; but in a figurative and spiritual one. In appearance, the sacrament of Christ's death is given to all alike: but "verily and indeed," in its beneficial effects, to none besides the faithful. Even to the unworthy communicant he is present, as He is wherever we meet together in his name: but in a better and most gracious sense, to the worthy soul; becoming by the inward virtue of his Spirit, its food and sustenance.

This real presence of Christ in the sacrament, his church hath always believed. But the monstrous notion of his bodily presence was started 700 years after his death: and arose chiefly from the indiscretion of preachers and writers of warm imaginations, who, instead of explaining judiciously the lofty figures of Scripture-language, heightened them, and went beyond them: till both it and they had their meaning mistaken most astonishingly. And when once an opinion had taken root, that seemed to exalt the holy sacrament so much, it easily grew and spread; and the more for its wonderful absurdity, in those ignorant and superstitious ages: till at length 500 years, ago, and 1200 years after our Saviour's birth, it was established for a Gospel-truth by the pretended authority of the Romish church. And even this had been tolerable in comparison, if they had not added idolatrous practice to erroneous belief: worshipping, on their knees, a bit of bread for the Son of God. Nor are they content to do this themselves, but with most unchristian cruelty, curse and murder those, who refuse it.

It is true, we also kneel at the sacrament as they do: but for a very different purpose: not to acknowledge "any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood;" as our Church, to prevent all possibility of misconstruction, expressly declares: adding, that "his body is in heaven, and not here:" but to worship Him, who is every where present, the invisible God. And this posture of kneeling we by no means look upon, as in itself necessary: but as a very becoming appointment: and very fit to accompany the prayers and praises, which we offer up at the instant of receiving; and to express that inward spirit of piety and humility, on which our partaking worthily of this ordinance, and receiving benefit from it, depend. Abp. Secker.

[k] The strengthening and refreshing of our souls &c.] By nourishing our faith, and assurance that our sins are remitted; by giving us increase of grace to lead a godly life; and by confirming our hope, that we shall hereafter come to life eternal: which are all the true food of our souls, and without which they are dead, having no true spiritual life in them at all. Bp. Cosin.

The receiving of this holy sacrament strengthens our souls, as it adds a new confirmation to us, every time we receive it, of God's mercy towards us, through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ; and thereby fortifies and corroborates us more and more, both in the discharge of our duty; and in the resistance of all such temptations, as may be likely to draw us away from it.

Besides which, being thus secured of a part in Christ's sacrifice for us, we are thereby fortified against all doubts and fears of our salvation: are confirmed against the apprehension of any present dangers, or sufferings, for righteousness' sake, which we shall "reckon not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us:" and finally are strengthened against the fear of death itself, which we are hereby taught to look upon as a passage only to a most blessed and everlasting life. Abp. Wake.

[l] What is required of them who come to the Lord's Supper?] What qualifications and dispositions are required of them who come to the Lord's Supper, the Scripture hath not particularly expressed: for they are easily collected from the nature of this ordinance. But our Catechism, in its fifth and last answer concerning it, hath reduced them very justly to three: repentance, faith, and charity. Abp. Secker.

Under these three heads the principal subjects of our examination are comprehended. But as to any particular method to be taken, or time to be spent in it, or in any other further preparation subsequent to it, we have no command: it is left to every one's prudence and voluntary piety. They who live in a constant practice of religion and virtue, are always fit for the sacrament; and may, if the call be sudden, by reflecting for a few moments, sufficiently know that they are fit. Persons who live in any sin, may as easily and quickly know that they are not. And it is only in doubtful cases, that any length of consideration is necessary to satisfy us about this matter. But it must be extremely useful for all persons, not only to be attentive to their ways constantly, but to look back upon them frequently; much more frequently than almost any one receives the sacrament. And as things, which have no certain season fixed for them, are very apt to be neglected; we should fix upon this, as one certain season for as particular an inspection into the state of our hearts and lives as we can well make, and can hope to be the better for; joining with it suitable meditations, resolutions, and devotions. But then in the whole of this work we must be careful, neither to hurry over any part thoughtlessly, or lengthen it wearisomely. And in our examination we must be especially careful, neither to flatter nor yet to affright ourselves: but observe impartially what is right in us, thank God, and take the comfort of it; acknowledge what is wrong, beg pardon, and amend it. For, without amendment, being ever so sorry will avail nothing. Abp. Secker.

[m] To examine themselves, &c.] This examination must be performed by a careful and diligent search into our lives and actions; so that we may, if possible, know the true state of our souls in all those particulars, concerning which we are here directed to examine ourselves. And this accompanied with earnest prayer to God, for his assistance in, and blessing upon, our endeavours. Abp. Wake.

[n] — whether they repent them—a new life.] Of this we can only judge by the present frame and disposition of our souls. If we are heartily sorry for and ashamed of our sins: if we earnestly desire God's forgiveness of them: if we are instant with God in our prayers for pardon; and, where we have done any injury to our neighbour, are ready to ask his forgiveness also, and to make all reasonable satisfaction to Him: if, lastly, as far as we can judge of ourselves, we do all this uprightly and sincerely; if we reserve no secret affection for any sin in our souls, but universally resolve to forsake all our evil ways, and in every thing to follow the rules of our duty: we may then justly conclude, that our repentance and resolutions are hearty and without deceit; and, as such, will qualify us for the worthy receiving of this holy sacrament. Abp. Wake.

[o] — have a lively faith &c.] This is the second head of examination, namely, "whether we have a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ:" that is, do stedfastly believe, that, if we truly repent us of our sins, God will not only most certainly forgive them; but, as an earnest of it, does here, in this very sacrament, ratify and seal anew his covenant with us; and make us partakers of the benefit of that redemption, which our blessed Saviour purchased for us by the sacrifice of his own body and blood. And this faith is called "a lively faith," to shew, that our faith is then only acceptable unto God, and profitable to our salvation, when it is lively and active; and works in us such a sincere repentance of our past sins, and such a constant and uniform obedience to God's commandments, as our Saviour in his Gospel requires of us. For otherwise to know, and assent to, the truths of our religion, without living agreeably thereunto, will carry us no farther than the worst of men may go, and even the devils themselves, as St. James says, do go. James ii. 19. Abp. Wake.

The rule of judging, both in the Catechism and the Scripture, is not by the positiveness, but the liveliness, of our faith; that is, the fruits of a Christian life, which it produceth: for "faith without works is dead," James ii. 17. If we cannot shew the evidence of these, the highest confidence will do us no good: and, if we can, we need have no doubts concerning our spiritual condition; and though we have ever so many, provided we perceive no sufficient reason for them, we may celebrate this holy ordinance very safely. For such weaknesses in our natural temper and spirits are no way inconsistent with having, in our fixed and deliberate judgment, that "full trust in God's mercy," which the Communion-service requires: and we cannot take a more likely method, either to perfect our repentance or to strengthen our faith, than receiving the Sacrament frequently. Abp. Secker.

[p] — with a thankful remembrance &c.] Farther; this faith is to be accompanied "with a thankful remembrance of Christ's death," which in the holy communion is designed to be set forth and shewn to us. We are to examine ourselves therefore, whether we are truly sensible of the infinite love of God, and condescension of Jesus Christ, thereby declared to us: whether we are always careful to keep up in our minds a lively memory of his death and passion; and do, by the sincerity of our love to God, and the zeal we have for our duty, endeavour in some measure to testify, how hearty a sense we have of those unspeakable mercies, which He has been pleased thereby to favour us withal. Abp. Wake.

¶ The Curate of every Parish[r] shall diligently upon Sundays and Holy-days, after the second Lesson at Evening Prayer, openly in the Church instruct and

Our Catechism teaches us, that our faith in Christ must be accompanied "with a thankful remembrance of his death." And surely, if we believe, that He died to save us, we must be thankful for it. But then the measure of our thankfulness must be taken from the goodness and constancy of its effects, not from that sensible warmth and fervency, which we cannot, ordinarily speaking, feel so strongly in spiritual things as in temporal; and of which bad persons may at times have very much, and good persons little. For that is the true thankfulness, which produces love. And "this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments," 1 John v. 3.

But there is one commandment peculiarly connected with this ordinance. And therefore our Catechism specifies it separately, and in express terms, by requiring, that we "be in charity with all men." Abp. Secker.

[q] — and be in charity with all men.] This is the last thing, concerning which we are to examine ourselves: namely, whether we do not only freely forgive whatsoever injuries any may chance to have done us; but are so intirely friends with them, as to be ready to do them all the kindness we can; and that as sincerely, and heartily, as if they had never offended us, or otherwise done us the least injury. Abp. Wake.

We can have no share in the love of our Creator, our Redeemer, and Sanctifier, unless, in imitation of it, we love one another: and, as the goodness of God is universal, so must ours be. Receiving the Holy Communion was indeed intended to increase the degree of it: but the reality we must have, before we are worthy to receive. And we must shew it is real, by "forgiving them who trespass against us;" by assisting, as far as can be reasonably expected, those who need assistance in any kind; by our hearty prayers for those, whom we can help no other way; by faithfully performing the duties of our several stations and relations in life; and by condescension, mildness, and humanity towards every person, as occasion offers.

These then being the dispositions requisite for receiving the Holy Sacrament, as indeed they are for obtaining eternal happiness: we are all greatly concerned to examine ourselves, whether we have them or not: and should have been concerned to do it, though this ordinance had never been appointed. But we are now more especially bound to it with a view to this ordinance; both from the nature of it, and from St. Paul's positive injunction: "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup," 1 Cor. xi. 28. Abp. Secker.

[r] The Curate of every Parish &c.] Our first book required the curate once in six weeks at least, on some Sunday or holy-day, to instruct such children as should be sent to him, half an hour before even-song, in some part of the Church Catechism. Bucer objected that the interval of six weeks was too long: in Germany he remarked many churches exercised the children in the Catechism three days in a week, of which Sunday was one; and he recommended that in England it should be taught on every Sunday and holy-day. Accordingly the rubrick in Edward's second book was modelled, as it stands at present, excepting only that the time of catechizing was, at the last review, appointed to be after the second lesson at Evening prayer, instead of half an hour before.

Bishop Cosin has observed, that the rubrick is couched in indefinite terms, and he is of opinion that a parochial clergyman is not obliged by it to catechize the children on every Sunday and holy-day, but only as often as is necessary, according to the number of his parishioners, who may stand in need of catechetical instruction. And this is one of the rubricks, which, according to Archdeacon Sharp, require to be understood with limitations, or at least will fairly admit of them. "No obligation," he observes, "can be urged from hence, that ministers should catechize on all Sundays and holy-days; but that, if they do it as often as the occasions of their parishes require, and do it on such days and at such times as are here specified, and shew their diligence therein, so far as their diligence is necessary in this respect to the faithful discharge of their duty in the place where they officiate; then they fulfil both the intention and letter of the rubrick."

The canon, however, is more explicit than the rubrick. It enjoins, that "the minister, upon every Sunday and holy-day, shall, for half an hour or more, examine and instruct the youth and ignorant persons of his parish in the Ten Commandments, the Articles of Belief, and the Lord's Prayer: and shall diligently hear and teach them their Catechism set forth in the Book of Common Prayer."

The rubrick of 1662, which is now to be adhered to, where it differs from the canon, orders the catechizing to be performed after the second lesson, that is, nearly in the middle of the Evening service. One principal object of the alteration was, it has been said, that persons more advanced in years might, as well as the youth, receive benefit from the minister's exposition, and that servants and children might be excited by the presence of their masters and parents, to pay more diligent attention to his instructions. These good intentions, however, have been generally disappointed, and at present catechizing youth must be either too frequently neglected, or many of the churches in the evening will be deserted. In the early ages of Christianity, catechizing was never performed in the church, neither did it in England, till after the Restoration, interfere with the publick worship. Were a separate time allotted for catechizing, as was formerly done, the youth would be free from the embarrassment, which they experience, when called upon by the minister to answer interrogatories in the midst of a numerous congregation: and it is perhaps desirable, that the practice of catechizing children and servants early in the afternoon, or before the Evening service, should be again revived.

After all, I conceive, that what we have to complain of, is not so much the awkwardness of the time in some particular places, as the too general neglect of the duty. The early Fathers insist much upon the importance and necessity of catechizing: and the extreme care that was taken in the primitive church to instruct the catechumens in the principles of Christianity is generally known. Its beneficial effects were as generally experienced. It was principally by catechizing that the religion of Jesus, as Hegesippus observes, was in a few years spread over the greater part of the known world: and, however individuals or societies may have differed in other points, on the utility and necessity of catechizing all have agreed; both ancients and moderns; Europeans, Asiatics, and Africans; Greeks and Latins; Papists and Protestants, Lutherans and Calvinists; Church of England men and Dissenters. Luther, in the beginning of the Reformation, wrote two Catechisms. The duty, which he prescribed to others, he examine so many Children of his Parish sent unto him, as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism.

¶ And all Fathers, Mothers, Masters, and Dames[s], shall cause their Children, Servants, and Apprentices, (which have not learned their Catechism,) to come to the Church at the time appointed, and obediently to hear, and be ordered by the Curate, until such time as they have learned all that is here appointed for them to learn.

likewise performed himself; and assures us, that catechizing afforded him more delight than any other ministerial duty. The same care was taken by Calvin, and other eminent Reformers abroad. Nothing contributed more to the enlargement of the Protestant faith, than the diligent catechizing of the reformed divines. To the truth of this the Romanists themselves bear witness. In their preface to the Catechism, set forth by order of the council of Trent, they complain, that "the age is sadly sensible what mischief they (the Protestants) have done the church (of Rome) not only by their tongues, but especially by those writings called Catechisms." The council was sensible that catechizing was the most efficacious mode of preserving their religion, and therefore they composed the Roman Catechism, which they enjoined the Priests to teach to the people. Shepherd.

[s] And all Fathers, Mothers, Masters, and Dames, &c.] The laws, which require parents, and masters and mistresses of families, to send their children and servants to be instructed in the Catechism, mean evidently, unless they make some other more convenient provision, to answer the same end. Abp. Secker.

[t] So soon as Children are come to a competent age, &c.] The things, required of them who come to the Lord's Supper, are mentioned at the end of the Catechism: but there is another thing, not there mentioned, namely, that they be first confirmed by the bishop; it being ordained by our Church, "That none shall be admitted to the holy Communion, until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready, and desirous, to be confirmed." Rubrick at the end of the Confirmation Office. By Confirmation is meant, the solemn laying on of the hands of the bishop, upon such as have been baptized, and are come to years of discretion. Abp. Wake.

What is meant by "a competent age" in this rubrick, or, as the title of the office expresses it, "years of discretion," the Church has no where defined. Our diocesans, I believe, generally recommend, that none under full fourteen years of age at least be presented for confirmation. Some children arrive at years of discretion sooner than others. Much depends upon the capacity of the child, and more upon the mode of its education. The Church requires, that such, as are brought to be confirmed, be well instructed in the Catechism. At their baptism their sponsors promised for them, and they themselves are now called upon solemnly to engage, that they will renounce all evil, believe the Articles of the Christian faith, and keep God's commandments. It is therefore indispensably requisite, that they understand the reasonableness and propriety of this renunciation, the truths of the Creed, and the meaning of the Commandments, together with the use and import of prayer, and of the two sacraments. Shepherd.

What is required of persons to be confirmed is, 1. That they be "of years of discretion;" that is to say, of a capacity to understand the nature of their baptismal covenant: what God therein promises to us; and what we are thereby obliged to believe, and to do, in obedience to his will. Secondly, That they be not only capable of this knowledge, but be actually instructed in these things. Thirdly, That being hereby brought to a clear sense of what was done for them by their Godfathers and Godmothers at their baptism, they be now ready and desirous, in their own persons, to ratify and confirm the same. And lastly, that in testimony of their sincere resolutions to make good what they here promise and vow, they do now truly repent of all their sins, and stedfastly resolve, by the grace of God, to go on in a constant obedience to God's commands unto their lives' end. Abp. Wake.

[u] — And every one shall have a Godfather, or a Godmother, &c.] These are required at the confirmation of a youth, for the same reasons as they are at the baptism of a person who is an adult. In both cases they are witnesses of the engagements, which the persons, so baptized or confirmed, lay themselves under; and consequently will be proper and continued monitors to check or reclaim them, should they at any time hereafter be tempted to abandon the interest of Christ, and take part with his enemies. And, to prevent any one entering upon this trust, who will not be careful to discharge the duties of it, the Church provides, that "no person be admitted Godfather or Godmother to any child at christening or confirmation, before the said person so undertaking hath received the holy Communion." Canon xix. Wheatly.

[x] And whensoever the Bishop shall give knowledge &c.] Persons properly prepared for confirmation (see above, note t) are to be confirmed at such times as the bishop appoints for this office. Only, if it be possible, they should endeavour to be confirmed, and thereby fully take upon themselves the first sacrament, before they proceed to the participation of the second. Abp. Wake.

[y] — the Curate of every Parish &c.] It is earnestly to be desired, that the clergy should consider seriously the weight and excellence of these directions; and of what unspeakable advantage it would be for the promotion of Christian piety, if confirmation were duly administered, and none but such, as are sufficiently prepared, were admitted to it. It is impossible that the bishops should be able personally to examine every one that is offered, and to rectify those disorders which are but too common in relation to this most useful solemnity. They can only refuse to admit such, as the minister does not either bring or send in an account of, with his hand subscribed as the rule requires. But the parochial clergy have this matter almost wholly in their own power; and may very easily secure the due performance of this office. Let me beseech them therefore by the mercies of God and the love of souls, to take especial pains when the times of confirmation approach; and to use their influence with parents and other guardians of children, to second their endeavours, that the persons to be confirmed may be sufficiently instructed in the nature of their baptismal covenant; and be thoroughly convinced of the necessity of their taking it personally upon themselves, and of the obligations they lie under to lead suitable lives for the future. Dr. Bennet.

[z] — And if the Bishop approve of them, he shall confirm them &c.] From the history, contained in the eighth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, ver. 12—17, it appears, that Philip the Deacon, ordained at the same time with St. Stephen, had converted and baptized the people of Samaria: which the apostles at Jerusalem hearing, sent down to them Peter and John, two of their own body: who, by prayer, accompanied with imposition of hands, obtained for them a greater degree, than they had yet received, of the sacred influences of the Divine Spirit: which undoubtedly was done on their signifying in some manner, so as to be understood, their adherence to the engagement, into which they had entered at their baptism.

From this and the like instances of the practice of the apostles, is derived, what bishops, their successors, though every way beyond comparison inferior to them, have practised ever since, and which we now call Confirmation. Preaching was common to all ranks of ministers: baptizing was performed usually by the lower rank; but, perhaps to maintain a due subordination, it was reserved to the highest, by prayer and laying on of hands, to communicate further measures of the Holy Ghost. It was indeed peculiar to the apostles, that, on their intercession, his extraordinary and miraculous gifts were bestowed; which continued in the Church no longer, than the need of them did; nor can we suppose, that all were partakers of them. But unquestionably by their petitions they procured, for every sincere convert, a much more valuable, though less remarkable blessing, of universal and perpetual necessity, his ordinary and saving graces.

For these therefore, after their example, trusting that God will have regard, not to our unworthiness, but to the purposes of mercy which He hath appointed us to serve, we intercede now, when persons take upon themselves the vow of baptism. Abp. Secker.

THE ORDER OF

CONFIRMATION[a],

OR LAYING ON OF HANDS UPON THOSE THAT ARE BAPTIZED AND COME TO YEARS OF DISCRETION[b].

¶ Upon the day appointed, all that are to be then confirmed, being placed, and standing in order, before the Bishop; he (or some other Minister appointed by him) shall read this Preface following[c].

[a] The Order of Confirmation, &c.] When children are well instructed in the vow made for them at baptism, by the Church Catechism, it is then required they should take it upon themselves, and be confirmed by the bishop: which holy rite of "Confirmation," though it were not instituted by Christ, and so be not properly a sacrament, yet the apostles did lay their hands on such as had been before baptized by an inferior minister, Acts viii. 14—17; and xix. 6. This custom the primitive church imitated in the bishops laying on their hands, with holy prayers, upon persons that had been baptized; which was believed to convey the Holy Spirit to them for enabling them to keep their vow. And this holy rite is still retained in the Eastern and Western churches, and in all Protestant churches where they have bishops. And we have an excellent office for it, containing, first, the preparation for it by a serious admonition to all that come to it, a solemn engagement from the parties to keep their vow, with some acts of praise and prayer suited to the occasion. Secondly, the rite itself consists of the ceremony, which is the laying on of the bishop's hands, and his benediction. Thirdly, the office is concluded with prayers; general, as the Lord's Prayer; and peculiar to the occasion, as the two Collects: and with a final blessing.

2. The person who doth confirm is a bishop, to which order the ancient church did always reserve the dispensing of this rite, because the apostles only did this, Acts viii. 14; and therefore the bishops are highly obliged to take care that all in their dioceses, who need and desire it, may not want the opportunity of coming to it. The persons who are to be confirmed are all that have been baptized from the time they come to years of discretion, or however to be able to understand the nature of their baptismal vow, which they are here to take upon themselves; and since we baptize infants, it is more necessary to bring them to confirmation, and their Godfathers can no way better acquit themselves of the charge they have undertaken, than by taking care, as the Church in this exhortation requires, that they may learn their Catechism, and understand their vow, and here solemnly, before God and many witnesses, renew it in their own name. For secondly, the bishop doth particularly inquire, if they do here in God's presence, and before all the congregation, renew that solemn vow in their own names made at their baptism; and if they do engage to perform and do what was promised for them by their sureties: to which they must every one answer with great reverence and serious consideration that "they do." Thirdly, the bishop and the priests that are present begin their devotions, encouraging the parties who have promised this, by minding them that they shall have "help" from Him that made heaven and earth, Ps. cxxiv. 7. And praising God for bringing these persons into so blessed a condition, Ps. cxiii. 2. Finally, desiring Him to hear the prayers now to be made for them. Fourthly, there is a larger form of prayer made by the bishop, wherein he first acknowledges God's mercy in granting them regeneration and pardon of their sins in their baptism: and now that they are to exercise that warfare they then engaged themselves to, he prays for a larger supply of God's Holy Spirit with its sevenfold gifts, Isa. xi. 2, so that they may be made so wise as to understand their duty, and so strong as to perform it, desiring they may by his ministry have these gifts conveyed to them now, and by their diligent improving of them, keep them for ever.

3. Being thus prepared, the rite itself is now to be administered by the ancient ceremony of laying the bishop's hand on the head of each person, used by the apostles as the means of conveying the Holy Spirit, Acts viii. 17; whence the whole office is called laying on of hands, Heb. vi. 2 (yet the papists omit this apostolical ceremony, and use the anointing with chrism, which came later into the Church). The bishop also gives a solemn blessing to every one, desiring God to defend that person with his heavenly grace, from forsaking his faith, or breaking God's commandments, that is, to take him for his own, and seal him with his Spirit, so that he may ever after look on him as one of his own children: and praying that he may daily increase in grace and grow wiser and better, until he be fit for that heavenly kingdom which God hath promised to him in baptism: and this prayer thus offered up by a holy man, and one of the chief officers of Christ's church, shall be effectual to the obtaining of the Spirit for all that have duly prepared themselves, and do sincerely make and renew this vow. And now the bishop concludes the office, first with the usual form, desiring God may be with them to assist them in these prayers, as they also desire He may be with his spirit who is to offer them;

TO the end that Confirmation may be ministered to the more edifying of such as shall receive it, the Church hath thought good to order, that none hereafter shall be Confirmed, but such as can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments; and can also answer to such other Questions, as in the short Catechism are contained: which order is very convenient to be observed; to the end, that children, calling also upon God as the common Father of all that are confirmed, and so in covenant with Him: to which is joined the proper Collect, beginning with a preface which confesseth, that this good desire and resolution of these persons to keep their vow came from God, and by Him they must have grace acceptably to perform it. And then here are petitions for them, first, that as the bishop's hand was over them, so the good hand of his providence signified thereby, may be ever over them to preserve them: secondly, that the Holy Spirit now imparted to them by this holy rite, may be ever with them, the blessed effect of which is here declared to be, that this will make them understand God's word, and enable them to obey it, so that at the end of their lives they may be certainly saved through Jesus Christ; to whom, with the whole Trinity, for these means of salvation we offer up our praises and acknowledgments: and to this is added a devout Collect out of the Communion Service, that God who hath sealed these his vowed servants with his Spirit, will direct, sanctify, and govern their souls and bodies in the ways of his laws, so that they may ever be holy, safe, and happy. Finally, the office is concluded with the bishop's blessing, who now in the name of God wishes the blessing of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, may be now bestowed on you, and remain upon you for ever. Thus our Church appoints this necessary and pious office shall be done; and the due administration thereof would highly conduce to make the benefits of baptism more visible, to increase knowledge and piety in the younger sort, and to secure them from being seduced by papists or sectaries; it would make the Church to flourish and be at unity, and convey mighty blessings to all that reverently and devoutly receive it: wherefore as the bishops are ready to do their part, let all that want it be willing and very desirous to come, and let parents and masters, and especially Godfathers and Godmothers, encourage them to come to it, and labour to fit them for it, that it may be done to God's glory and their comfort. Dean Comber.

[b] — and come to years of discretion.] Before the Reformation here in England, parents might have their children confirmed at seven years old; that is, between the ages of seven and fourteen. Our Church has not settled any particular time; but only limits it to "years of discretion," which in several persons are sooner or later. Dr. Nicholls. See page 384, note t.

[c] — this Preface following.] The preface, with which the office begins, was only a rubrick in all the old Common Prayer Books: but at the last review was changed into a preface, to be directed to those that shall offer themselves to be confirmed; that so the Church might be sure they are apprized of the qualifications that are requisite to this holy ordinance, and of the solemn engagements under which they are going to enter themselves by it. Wheatly.

The Church of England is so far from esteeming ignorance to be the mother of devotion, that she employs every possible endeavour to make each of her offices properly understood. The present, like most other of her forms, begins with a preface, composed with great plainness and simplicity, and addressed to those who are to be confirmed. In it they are taught, what are the two great objects of the rite of confirmation: first, that they may "with their own mouths and consent ratify and confirm" their baptismal covenant; and secondly, that they solemnly engage evermore to endeavour faithfully to perform their part of the covenant. Shepherd, Dean Comber.

In this preface, directed in the first place to be read, notice is given, that "for the more edifying of such as shall receive confirmation," it shall be administered to none but those, "who can answer to the questions of the Catechism" preceding: that so "children" may "come to years of" some "discretion," and "learn what the promise" made for them in baptism was, before they are called upon to "ratify and confirm it before the Church with their own consent," and to engage "that they will evermore observe it."

Prayers may be offered up for infants with very good effect. Promises may be made in their name by such as are authorized to act for them; especially when the things promised are for their interest, and will be their duty; which is the case of those in baptism. But no persons ought to make promises for themselves, till they reasonably well understand the nature of them, and are capable of forming serious purposes. Therefore, in the present case, being able to say the words of the Catechism is by no means enough, without a competent general knowledge of their meaning, and intention of behaving as it requires them; which doubtless they are supposed to have at the same time. And if they have not, making a profession of it is declaring with their mouths what they feel not in their hearts at the instant, and will much less reflect upon afterwards: it is hoping to please God by the empty outward performance of a religious rite, from which if they had been withheld, till they were duly qualified, their souls might have been affected, and their conduct influenced by it, as long as they lived.

Therefore I hope and beg, that neither ministers nor parents will be too eager for bringing children very early to confirmation: but first teach them carefully, to know their duty sufficiently, and resolve upon the practice of it heartily; then introduce them to this ordinance.

But as there are some too young for confirmation, some also may be thought too old: especially if they have received the holy sacrament without it. Now there are not indeed all the same reasons for the confirmation of such, as of others: nor hath the Church, I believe, determined any thing about their case, as it might be thought unlikely to happen. But still, since it doth happen too frequently, that persons were not able, or have neglected, to apply for this purpose: so whenever they apply, as by doing it, they express a desire to "fulfil all righteousness," Matt. iii. 15; and may certainly receive benefit, both from the profession and the prayers appointed in the office; my judgment is, that they should not be rejected, but encouraged.

Only I must intreat you to observe, that when you take thus on yourselves the engagement of leading a Christian life, you are to take it once for all; and no more to think of ever being confirmed a second time, than of being baptized a second time Abp. Secker.

being now come to the years of discretion, and having learned what their Godfathers and Godmothers promised for them in Baptism, they may themselves, with their own mouth and consent, openly before the Church, ratify and confirm the same; and also promise, that by the grace of God they will evermore endeavour themselves faithfully to observe such things, as they, by their own confession, have assented unto.

¶ Then shall the Bishop say[d],

DO ye here, in the presence of God, and of this congregation, [d] Then shall the Bishop say, &c.] The end of confirmation being thus made known, the bishop in the next place, by a solemn question, (which was added at the last review,) demands of the candidates an assurance that they will comply with it: asking them, "in the presence of God and the congregation, whether they will renew their baptismal vow, and ratify the same in their own persons, &c." To this every one to be confirmed, as a token of his assent, is audibly to answer, "I do." Wheatly.

Now the things, promised in our name, were, to renounce whatever God hath forbidden, to believe what He hath taught, and to practise what He hath commanded. Nobody can promise for infants absolutely, that they shall do these things; but only, that they shall be instructed and admonished to do them: and, it is hoped, not in vain. This instruction and admonition, parents are obliged by nature to give; and if they do it effectually, Godfathers and Godmothers have no further concern than to be heartily glad of it. But if the former fail, the latter must supply the failure, as far as they have opportunity of doing it with any reasonable prospect of success. For they were intended, not to release the parents from the care of their children, which nothing can; but for a double security in a case of such importance.

If nothing at all had been promised in our names, we had still been bound, as soon as we were capable of it, to believe in God, and obey Him. But we are more early and more firmly bound, as not only this hath been promised for us, but care hath been taken to make us sensible of our obligation to perform it: which obligation, therefore, persons are called upon, in the question under consideration, to ratify and confirm. And great cause have they to answer, that they do. For doing it is a duty, on which their eternal felicity peculiarly depends; as a little attention to what I am about to say will clearly shew you.

Our first parents, even while they were innocent, had no title to happiness, or to existence, but from God's notification of his good pleasure: which being conditional, when they fell, they lost it; and derived to us a corrupt and mortal nature, intitled to nothing; as both the diseases and the poverty of ancestors often descend to their distant posterity. This bad condition we fail not, from our first use of reason, to make worse, in a greater or less degree, by actual transgressions: and so personally deserve the displeasure, instead of favour, of Him who made us. Yet we may hope, that, as He is good, He will on our repentance forgive us. But then, as He is also just and wise, and the ruler of the world; we could never know with certainty, of ourselves, what his justice and wisdom, and the honour of his government might require of Him with respect to sinners: whether He would pardon greater offences at all; and whether He would reward those, whom He might be pleased not to punish. But most happily the revelation of his holy word hath cleared up all these doubts of unassisted reason: and offered to the worst of sinners, on the condition of faith in Christ, added to repentance, and productive of good works (for all which He is ready to enable us), a covenant of pardon for sins past, assistance against sin for the future, and eternal life in return for a sincere, though imperfect, and totally undeserving obedience.

The method of entering into this covenant is, being baptized in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost: that is, into the acknowledgment of the mysterious union and joint authority of these three; and of the distinct offices, which they have undertaken for our salvation: together with a faithful engagement of paying suitable regard to each of them. In this appointment of baptism, the washing with water aptly signifies, both our promise to preserve ourselves, with the best care we can, pure from the defilement of sin, and God's promise to consider us, as free from the guilt of it. Baptism then, through his mercy, secures infants from the bad consequences of Adam's transgression giving them a new title to the immortality, which he lost. It also secures, to persons grown up, the intire forgiveness of their own transgressions, on the terms just mentioned. But then, in order to receive these benefits, we must lay our claim to the covenant, which conveys them: we must ratify, as soon as we are able, what was promised in our name by others before we were able; and done for us then, only on presumption that we would make it our own deed afterwards. For if we neglect, and appear to renounce one part of the covenant, we have plainly not the least right to God's performing his: but we remain in our sins, and "Christ shall profit us nothing," Gal. v. 2.

You see then of what unspeakable importance it is, that we take on ourselves the vow of our baptism. And it is very fit and useful, that we should take it in such form and manner as the office prescribes. It is fit, that when persons have been properly instructed by the care of their parents, friends, and ministers, they should with joyful gratitude acknowledge them to have faithfully performed that kindest duty. It is fit, that before they are admitted by the church of Christ to the holy Communion, they should give publick assurance to the Church of their Christian belief and Christian purposes. This may also be extremely useful to themselves. For, consider: young persons are just entering into a world of temptations, with no experience, and little knowledge to guard them; and much youthful rashness, to expose them. The authority of others over them is beginning to lessen, their own passions to increase, "evil communication" to have great opportunities of "corrupting good manners," 1 Cor. xv. 33: and strong impressions of one kind or another, will be made on them very soon. What can then be more necessary, or more likely to preserve their innocence, than to form the most deliberate resolutions of acting right; and to declare them in a manner, thus adapted to move them at the time, and be remembered by them afterwards; in the presence of God, of a number of his ministers, and of a large congregation of his people, assembled with more than ordinary solemnity for that very purpose? Abp. Secker.

renew the solemn promise and vow that was made in your name at your Baptism; ratifying and confirming the same in your own persons, and acknowledging yourselves bound to believe, and to do all those things, which your Godfathers and Godmothers then undertook for you?

¶ And every one shall audibly answer, I do[e].

The Bishop[f].

OUR help is in the Name of the Lord[g];

Answ. Who hath made heaven and earth. Ps. cxxiv. 8.

[e] I do.] It should be observed, that they, who are to be confirmed, must either do their own part, or the whole of the previous preparation will be utterly thrown away upon them. If they make the answer, which is directed, without sincerity, it is lying to God: if they make it without attention, it is trifling with Him. Watch over your hearts therefore, and let them go along with your lips. The two short words, "I do," are soon said: but they comprehend much in them. Whoever uses them on this occasion, saith in effect as follows: "I do heartily renounce all the temptations of the devil; all the unlawful pleasures, profits, and honours of the world; all the immoral gratifications of the flesh. I do sincerely believe, and will constantly profess, all the Articles of the Christian faith. I do firmly resolve to keep all God's commandments all the days of my life; to love and honour Him; to pray to Him and praise Him daily in private; to attend conscientiously on the publick worship and instruction, which He hath appointed; to approach his holy table, as soon as I can qualify myself for doing it worthily; to submit to his blessed will meekly and patiently in all things; to set Him ever before my eyes, and acknowledge Him in all my ways. I do further resolve, in the whole course of my behaviour amongst my fellow-creatures, to 'do justly, love mercy,' Mic. vi. 8, speak truth, be diligent and useful in my station, dutiful to my superiors, condescending to those beneath me, friendly to my equals; careful through all the relations of life, to act as the nature of them requires, and conduct myself so to all men, as I should think it reasonable that they should do to me in the like case. Further yet: I do resolve, in the government of myself, to be modest, sober, temperate, mild, humble, contented; to restrain every passion and appetite within due bounds; and to set my heart chiefly, not on the sensual enjoyments of this transitory world, but the spiritual happiness of the future endless one. Lastly, I do resolve, whenever I fail in any of these duties, as I am sensible I have, and must fear I shall, to confess it before God with unfeigned concern, to apply for his promised pardon in the name of his blessed Son, to beg the promised assistance of his Holy Spirit; and in that strength, not my own, to strive against my faults, and watch over my steps with redoubled care."

Observe then: it is not gloominess and melancholy, that religion calls you to; it is not useless austerity, and abstinence from things lawful and safe; it is not extravagant flights and raptures; it is not unmeaning or unedifying forms and ceremonies: much less is it bitterness against those who differ from you. But the forementioned unquestionable substantial duties are the things to which you bind yourselves, when you pronounce the awful words, "I do." Utter them then with the truest seriousness: and say to yourselves, each of you, afterwards, as Moses did to the Jews, "Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God, to walk in his ways and to keep his statutes, and to hearken to his voice: and the Lord hath avouched thee this day to be his; that thou shouldst keep all his commandments, and be holy unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken." It is a certain truth, call it therefore often to mind, and fix it in your souls, that if breaking a solemn promise to men be a sin; breaking that, which you thus make deliberately to God, would be unspeakably a greater sin. Abp. Secker.

[f] The Bishop.] In the next part of the office, after persons have confirmed and ratified the vow of their baptism, prayers are offered up, that God would confirm and strengthen them in their good purpose: on both which accounts this appointment is called Confirmation. Abp. Secker.

[g] Our help is in the name of the Lord; &c.] Here follow three short versicles and responses betwixt the bishop and the congregation, with which the order of Confirmation in all the old Common Prayer Books used to begin. They are a proper preparation to the following solemnity, are often used in ancient liturgies, and are taken out of the book of Psalms: though the last of them has been varied since the first book of King Edward, in which, in the room of it, was the usual salutation of, "The Lord be with you: And with thy spirit." Wheatly.

Scripture teaches, and sad experience proves, that "of ourselves we can do nothing," John xv. 5; that we "are not sufficient," 2 Cor. iii. 5, for the discharge of our duty, without God's continual aid: by which He can certainly influence our minds, without hurting our natural freedom of will, and even without our perceiving it; for we can influence our fellow-creatures so. Nor is it any injustice in Him to require of us what exceeds our ability, since He is ready to supply the want of it. Indeed, on the contrary, as this method of treating us is excellently fitted both to keep us humble, and yet to give us courage, using it is evidently worthy of God. But then, as none can have reason to expect his help but those who earnestly desire it, so He hath promised to "give the holy Spirit" only "to them that ask him," Luke xi. 13. And to unite Christians more in love to each other, and incline them more to assemble for publick worship, our blessed Redeemer hath especially promised, that "where two or three" of them "are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them," Matt. xviii. 20. And farther still to promote a due regard in his people to their teachers and rulers, the sacred writings ascribe a peculiar efficacy to their praying over those who are committed to their charge. Even under the Jewish dispensation, the family of Aaron were told, that "them the Lord had separated to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the Lord," Deut. x. 8; xxi. 5: "and they shall put my name," saith God, "upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them," Numb. vi. 27. No wonder then, if under the Christian dispensation we read, that the apostles, "when they were come down to Samaria, prayed for" the new-baptized converts, "that they might receive the Holy Ghost;" and that they did receive it accordingly.

Therefore, pursuant to these great authorities, here is, on the present occasion, a number of young disciples, about to run the same common race, met together to pray for themselves and one another: here is a number of elder Christians, who have experienced the dangers of life, met to pray for those who are just entering into them: here are also God's ministers, purposely come to intercede with Him in their behalf: and surely we may hope, their joint and fervent petitions will avail, and be effectual.

Bishop. Blessed be the Name of the Lord;

They begin, as they ought, with acknowledging, and in Scripture words, that "our help is in the name of the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth," Ps. cxxiv. 8: "it is not in man to direct his own steps," Jer. x. 23; but his Creator only can preserve him. Then we go on to pronounce "the name of the Lord blessed, henceforth world without end," for his readiness to bestow on us the grace which we want. And lastly, in confidence of his goodness, we intreat Him to "hear our prayers, and let our cry come unto him," Ps. cii. 1. Abp. Secker.

Of such short ejaculations in general hath been said in the Morning Prayer: concerning these in particular, that they are fitted to the office, will appear to them, who consider, that confirmation is appointed for the strengthening of us against all our ghostly enemies; which though they be many and great, yet is there no reason to despair of obtaining strength enough to resist them; for "our help stands in the name of the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth;" who is therefore able enough, and willing also, to help them that call upon his name. "Blessed therefore be the name of the Lord, henceforth and for ever." Bp. Sparrow.

[h] Let us pray. &c.] The bishop and people having thus joined their requests, the bishop, in the next place, proceeds alone to collect their petitions into a continued form; in which he prays that God, "who had vouchsafed to regenerate" the persons who now come to be confirmed, "by water and the Holy Ghost, and had given unto them forgiveness of all their sins, would now strengthen them with the Holy Ghost the Comforter, and daily increase in them the gifts of grace," namely, the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit, which are transcribed into this prayer from the old Greek and Latin translations of Isaiah xi. 2, and which were repeated in the very same words in the Office of Confirmation, as long ago as Saint Ambrose's time: from whence, and the Greek Liturgy, this whole prayer is almost verbatim transcribed. Wheatly.

This is a prayer, that God would strengthen the baptized with "the Holy Ghost the Comforter," whom they had in their baptism received as a sanctifier. These two ways, to omit others, we are taught in holy Scripture, that the Holy Ghost may be received: as a sanctifier and cleanser in holy baptism, Tit. iii. 5, "He saved us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost:" and after baptism we may receive Him again as a comforter and strengthener. The apostles, who received Him the first way in baptism, are promised to receive Him the second, John xvi. 7; Acts i. 8: which was performed, Acts ii. 4, when "they were filled with the Holy Ghost." Bp. Sparrow.

Before the imposition of hands in the rite of confirmation, prayer was always made for the gifts of the Holy Spirit. At baptism, according to the opinion of Christian antiquity, the Holy Spirit bestowed grace sufficient to make us innocent, and to cleanse us from the pollution of sin: but at confirmation a more abundant increase of grace was vouchsafed, and additional spiritual strength was given. Upon this principle the present prayer was evidently composed. It first acknowledges former mercies, "regeneration and forgiveness of sins" in baptism: it then petitions, that they, on whom the bishop lays his hands, "may be strengthened with the Holy Ghost the Comforter," and that God will "daily give them increase of grace." It prays in particular for what theologians have styled the sevenfold grace of the Holy Spirit: first the spirit of wisdom, and secondly of understanding, thirdly the spirit of counsel, and fourthly of ghostly strength, fifthly the spirit of knowledge, and sixthly of true godliness, and seventhly the spirit of holy fear.

The introductory part of this prayer appears to have been borrowed from a form, that in an ancient Greek office followed baptism, and preceded confirmation: and the latter part was copied from a form of confirmation mentioned by Ambrose, which is evidently taken from Isaiah xi. 2; where, in the Septuagint and Vulgate, these seven gifts or graces are enumerated. In our translation the sixth is omitted. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[i] Almighty and everliving God, &c.] This longer act of devotion, following the preparatory ejaculations, and the usual admonition to be attentive, "Let us pray," first commemorates God's mercy already bestowed, then petitions for an increase of it. The commemoration sets forth, that He "hath regenerated these his servants by water and the Holy Ghost:" that is, intitled them by baptism to the enlivening influences of the Spirit, and so, as it were, begotten them again into a state inexpressibly happier than their natural one; a covenant-state, in which God will consider them, whilst they keep their engagements, with peculiar love, as his dear children. It follows, that He "hath given unto them forgiveness of all their sins;" meaning, that He hath given them assurance of it, on the gracious terms of the Gospel. But that every one of them hath actually received it, by complying with those terms since he sinned last, though we may charitably hope, we cannot presume to affirm: nor were these words intended to affirm it; as the known doctrine of the Church of England fully proves. And therefore let no one misunderstand this expression in the office, which hath parallel ones in the New Testament, Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; so as either to censure it, or delude himself with a fatal imagination, that any thing said over him can possibly convey to him a pardon of sins, for which he is not truly penitent.

knowledge and true godliness; and fill them, O Lord, with the spirit of thy holy fear, now and for ever. Amen.

¶ Then all of them in order kneeling[m] before the Bishop, he shall lay his hand[n] upon the head of every one[o] severally, saying,

DEFEND, O Lord[p], this thy Child [or this thy Servant] with thy heavenly grace, that he may Jude 24. Col. i. 8—11.

We only acknowledge, with due thankfulness, that God hath done his part: but which of the congregation have done theirs, their own consciences must tell them. Abp. Secker.

[k] — Strengthen them, we beseech thee, O Lord, &c.] After the commemoration, we go on to request for the persons before us, that God would "strengthen them" against all temptation, and support them under all affliction, by "the Holy Ghost the Comforter, and daily increase in them his manifold gifts of grace;" which gifts we proceed to enumerate in seven particulars, taken from the prophet Isaiah, Isa. xi. 2; by whom they are ascribed to our blessed Redeemer: but as the "same mind" ought to "be in us which was in Christ Jesus," Phil. ii. 5; a petition for them was used, in the Office of Confirmation, 1400 years ago, if not sooner. The separate meaning of each of the seven, it is neither easy nor needful to determine with certainty. For indeed, if no more was designed, than to express very fully and strongly, by various words of nearly the same import, a pious and moral temper of mind: this is a manner of speaking both common and emphatical. But each of them may be taken in a distinct sense of its own. And thus we may beg for these our fellow-Christians, a "spirit of wisdom," to aim at the right end, the salvation of their souls; and "of understanding," to pursue it by right means: "of counsel," to form good purposes; and of "ghostly" or spiritual "strength," to execute them: "of" useful "knowledge" in the doctrines of religion; "and true godliness," disposing them to a proper use of it. But chiefly, though lastly, we pray, that they may be "filled with the spirit of God's holy fear;" with that reverence of Him, as the greatest and purest and best of beings, the rightful Proprietor and just Judge of all, which will effectually excite them to whatever they are concerned to believe or do. For "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," Ps. cxi. 10. Abp. Secker.

The blessed gifts, for which the bishop prays, are, that we may be wise and apprehensive, prudent and courageous, discreet in our choice, devout in our duties, and pious in our lives: and, if these can be obtained, we may be assured all graces will spring from these roots; charity and the love of God, humility and watchfulness, faith and holiness, meekness and patience, temperance and chastity, and all other inestimable gifts. Dean Comber.

[l] — thy manifold gifts of grace;] That is, thy manifold gracious gifts; or, thy manifold gifts, which of thy special grace and favour through Jesus Christ thou bestowest upon thy servants. Dr. Bennet.

We here pray for all the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which in the old Greek and Latin translations are reckoned up to be seven, Isa. xi. 2; and from thence are transcribed into this prayer: and the seven are put for all, because the Scriptures describe the gifts of the Holy Spirit by "seven spirits," Rev. i. 4; iv. 5; v. 6; whence also we often read in the ancients of the sevenfold grace of the Spirit; and the number seven is put for the Holy Spirit Himself. Dean Comber.

[m] Then all of them in order kneeling &c.] The preparatory part of the office being now finished, "and all of them in order kneeling before the bishop," (which is a suitable posture for those that are to receive so great a blessing,) the bishop is "to lay his hand upon the head of every one severally." This is one of the most ancient ceremonies in the world, and has always been used to determine the blessing pronounced to those particular persons on whom the hands are laid; and to import, that the persons, who thus lay on their hands, act and bless by divine authority. Thus Jacob blessed Ephraim and Manasses, not as a parent only, but as a prophet, Gen. xlviii. 14: Moses laid his hands on Joshua by express command from God, and as supreme minister over his people, Numb. xxvii. 18: and thus our blessed Lord, whilst in his state of humiliation, laid his hands upon little children, Matt. xix. 13; Mark x. 16; and those that were sick with divers diseases, Luke iv. 40, to bless and heal them. The apostles, from so ancient a custom, and universal a practice, continued the rite of "imposition of hands," for communicating the Holy Spirit in confirmation, which was so constantly and regularly observed by them, that St. Paul calls the whole office "laying on of hands," Heb. vi. 2; a name which it usually retained amongst the Latin fathers; confirmation being never administered for many centuries afterwards, in any part of the Church, without this ceremony.

But though the laying on of hands is a token that the bishops act in this office by divine authority; yet at the same time they sue to heaven for the blessing they bestow in humble acknowledgment that the precious gifts hereby conferred are not the effect of their own power and holiness, but of the abundant mercy and favour of Him who is the only fountain of all goodness and grace. Under a due sense of this, even the apostles themselves, when they laid their hands upon the Samaritans, prayed that they might receive the Holy Ghost, Acts viii. 15. And after their example do their successors with us pray, that the person on whom they lay their hands may "be defended with the heavenly grace of God, and continue his for ever, and daily increase in his Holy Spirit more and more, until he come unto his everlasting kingdom. Amen." Wheatly.

Having concluded the prayer for them all in general, the bishop implores the divine protection and grace for each one, or each pair of them, in particular: that as he is already God's professed "child" and "servant," by the recognition which he hath just made of his baptismal covenant, so "he may continue his for ever," by faithfully keeping it: "and," far from decaying, "daily increase in his Holy Spirit," that is, in the fruits of the Spirit, piety and virtue, "more and more;" making greater and quicker advances in them, as life goes on, "until he come to" that decisive hour, when his portion shall be unchangeable "in God's everlasting kingdom."

And, along with the utterance of these solemn words, he lays his hands on each of their heads: a ceremony used from the earliest ages by religious persons, when they prayed for God's blessing on any one; used by our Saviour, who, when "children were brought to him, that he should put his hands on them, and pray, and bless them, was much displeased," Matt. xix. 13—15; Mark x. 13—16, with those who forbad it; used by the apostles, after converts were baptized, as the text plainly shews; reckoned in the Epistle to the Hebrews among "the foundations" of the Christian profession, Heb. vi. 1; constantly practised, and highly esteemed, in the Church from that time to this; and so far from being a popish ceremony, that the papists administer confirmation by other ceremonies of their own devising, and have laid aside this primitive one; which therefore our Church very prudently restored. And the custom of it is approved, as apostolical, both by Luther and Calvin, and several of their followers, though they rashly abolished it, as having been abused. But I am credibly informed, that at Geneva it hath lately been restored.

The laying on of the hand naturally expresses good will and good wishes in the person who doth it: and in the present case is further intended, as we find in one of the following prayers, to "certify those," to whom it is done, "of God's favour and gracious goodness towards them:" of which goodness they will certainly feel the effects, provided, which must always be understood, that they preserve their title to his care by a proper care of themselves. This, it must be owned, is a truth: and we may as innocently signify it by this sign as by any other, or as by any words to the same purpose. Further efficacy we do not ascribe to it: nor would have you look on bishops, as having or claiming a power, in any case, to confer blessing arbitrarily on whom they please; but only as petitioning God for that blessing from above which He alone can give; yet, we justly hope, will give the rather for the prayers of those whom He hath placed over his people, unless your own unworthiness prove an impediment. Not that you are to expect, on the performance of this good office, any sudden and sensible change in your hearts, giving you, all at once, a remarkable strength or comfort in piety, which you never felt before. But you may reasonably promise yourselves, from going through it with a proper disposition, greater measures, when real occasion requires them, of such divine assistance as will be needful for your support and orderly growth in every virtue of a Christian life. Abp. Seeker.

[n] — he shall lay his hand &c.] Now the party confirmed ought cheerfully to hope, that this prayer will be accepted; and, while the bishop's hand is over his head, we ought to meditate, that God Himself will "keep us in the shadow of his hand," Isa. xlix. 2; and that by this rite it is signified, that the Lord will "stretch out his hand to defend us" against all our spiritual enemies. We have given up ourselves to be his servants, and "the hand of the Lord is with us," Luke i. 66; that is, his Spirit is upon us; and, if we keep close to Him, "none can pluck us out of his hand," John x. 28, 29, but we may continue his for ever. Dean Comber.

[o] — upon the head of every one &c.] The ancient practice in England seems to have been, for the bishop to repeat the form appointed, while his hands remained upon the head of each child, or, at the utmost, upon the heads of as many as his hands could reach at one time. In the late Gallican church, the bishop laid his hands upon as many as could conveniently kneel before him; and, after he had laid his hands upon each of them, he repeated the form prescribed: and it is now the custom in some dioceses of England, for the bishop to cause the children to kneel, either at the rails of the communion-table, or in some wide convenient aisle of the church; and, after laying hands separately on each, to say the precatory benediction. Shepherd.

[p] Defend, O Lord, &c.] These words are different from those which were directed in Edward's first Book to be used by the bishop, and which were conformable to the prayers anciently used at confirmation. But as the Church had, from the first establishment of the Book of Common Prayer, omitted the chrism or material unction, and as the signing with the cross in this office was laid aside at the revisal of the book, consistency required that the words, which adverted to those ceremonies, should be changed, when the two corresponding ceremonies were abolished. Our Reformers knew, that anointing with chrism, and signing with the sign of the cross, were not specified in Scripture, nor essential to confirmation. They might however, without subjecting themselves to just censure from any quarter, have lawfully continued the chrism and crossing: but, by abolishing both these ceremonies, and retaining only what the apostles practised, prayer and imposition of hands, they have restored to this office its original simplicity. Shepherd.

[q] Then shall the Bishop say, &c.] The imposition of hands being finished, the bishop and congregation mutually recommend each other to God, and return to such joint and publick devotions as are suitable to the solemnity. The first of these is the Lord's Prayer: a form seasonable always, but peculiarly now; as every petition in it will shew to every one who considers it. In the next place, more especial supplications are poured forth, for the persons particularly concerned, to Him who alone can enable them "both to will and to do" what is "good;" that, as the hand of his minister hath been laid upon them, so "his fatherly hand may ever be over them, and lead them in" the only way, "the knowledge and obedience of his word," to "everlasting life." After this a more general prayer is offered up for them and the rest of the congregation together, that God would "vouchsafe," unworthy as we all are, so "to direct and govern both our hearts and bodies," our inclinations and actions, (for neither will suffice without the other,) "in the ways of his laws, and in the works of his commandments," that, "through his

O Almighty Lord[s], and everlasting God, vouchsafe, we beseech thee, to direct, sanctify, and govern, both our hearts, and bodies, in the ways of thy laws, and in the works of thy commandments; that, through thy most mighty protection both here and ever, we may be preserved in body and soul; through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

¶ Then the Bishop shall bless them[t], saying thus, most mighty protection, both here and ever, we may be preserved in body and soul:" having the former, in his good time, raised up from the dead, and the latter made happy, in conjunction with it, to all eternity. Abp. Secker.

[r] Almighty and everliving God, &c.] In this Collect the bishop prays, that what he has done may not be an empty and insignificant sign. And this he does with so noble a mixture of humility and faith, as well agrees with the purest times. Depending upon the faith and promise of God, he knows that the graces he has now been conferring are as sure a consequence of the office he has performed, as if he had in himself a power to give them. But still he considers from whom these gifts and graces come, and who alone can preserve and secure them; and therefore, under a due sense of this, he makes his humble supplications, that, as "he has now laid his hands" upon these people "(after the example of the apostles) to certify them thereby of God's favour and gracious goodness towards them; the fatherly hand of God may be ever over them, his Holy Spirit be ever with them, and so lead them in the knowledge and obedience of his word, that in the end they may obtain everlasting life." Wheatly.

It is here desired, that the hand and Spirit of God may continue with the confirmed: the one to assist them in the understanding, the other to help them in the performance, of the divine will, till they come to everlasting happiness. "The word of God" shews us the way to heaven, "the Spirit" makes us to understand and obey the direction thereof: so that, if God hear this prayer, we cannot miss of that blessed end. Dean Comber.

[s] O Almighty Lord, &c.] Because the ancients believed confirmation to be a preservative both of body and soul, an additional Collect was added at the Restoration, from those that are placed at the end of the Communion-office, that God would "direct, sanctify, and govern, both our souls and bodies, in the ways of his laws, and in the works of his commandments, &c."

The Blessing concludes all offices, and particularly ought to end this, in regard it is the epitome of the whole administration, which is only a more solemn benediction. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[t] Then the Bishop shall bless them, &c.] These requests being thus made, it only remains, that all be dismissed with a solemn blessing; which will certainly abide with them, unless, by wilful sin, or gross negligence, they drive it away. And in that case, they must not hope, that their baptism, or their confirmation, or the prayers of the bishop, or the Church, or the whole world, will do them any service. On the contrary, every thing which they might have been the better for, if they had made a good use of it, they will be the worse for, if they make a bad one. They do well to renew the covenant of their baptism in confirmation; but, if they break it, they forfeit the benefit of it. They do well to repeat their vows in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper: it is what all Christians are commanded by their dying Saviour, "for the strengthening and refreshing of their souls:" it is what I beg all, who are confirmed, will remember, and their friends and ministers remind them of: the sooner they are prepared for it, the happier; and by stopping short, the benefit of what preceded will be lost. But if they are admitted to this privilege also, and live wickedly, they do but "eat and drink their own condemnation." So that all depends on a thoroughly honest care of their hearts and behaviour in all respects.

Not that, with our best care, we can avoid smaller faults. And if we intreat pardon for them in our daily prayers, and faithfully strive against them, they will not be imputed to us. But gross and habitual sins we may avoid, through God's help; and if we fall into them, we fall from our title to salvation at the same time. Yet even then our case is not desperate; and let us not make it so, by thinking it is: for, through the grace of the Gospel, we may still repent and amend, and then be forgiven. But I beg you to observe, that, as continued health is vastly preferable to the happiest recovery from sickness; so is innocence to the truest repentance. If we suffer ourselves to transgress our duty; God knows whether we shall have time to repent: God knows whether we shall have a heart to do it. At best we shall have lost, and more than lost, the whole time that we have been going back: whereas we have all need to press forwards, as fast as we can. Therefore let the innocent of wilful sin preserve that treasure with the greatest circumspection; and the faulty return from their errors without delay. Let the young enter upon the way of righteousness with hearty resolution; and those of riper age persevere in it to the end. In a word, let us all, of every age, seriously consider, and faithfully practise, the obligations of religion. For "the vows of God are" still "upon us," Ps. lvi. 12; how long soever it be since they were first made, either by us, or for us: and it is in vain to forget what He will assuredly remember; or hope to be safe in neglecting what He expects us to do. But let us use proper diligence; and He will infallibly give us proper assistance, and "confirm us" all "unto the end, that we may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. i. 8.

THE Blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be upon you, and remain with you for ever. Amen.

¶ And there shall none be admitted to the Holy Communion[u], until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready and desirous to be confirmed[x].

"Now unto him, who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen." Jude 24, 25. Abp. Secker.

[u] And there shall none be admitted to the Holy Communion, &c.] This is conformable to the practice of the primitive church, which always ordered that Confirmation should precede the Eucharist, unless there was extraordinary occasion to the contrary; such as was the case of clinick baptism, of the absence of a bishop, or the like, in which cases the Eucharist is allowed before Confirmation. Wheatly.

[x] — or be ready and desirous to be confirmed.] These words were added at the last review, in compliance with the request of the Presbyterian divines, that Confirmation might not be made so necessary to the holy Communion, as that none should be admitted to it, unless they had been confirmed.

By "ready" is meant that they "are arrived at a competent age, and can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments; and also can answer to the other questions of the Church Catechism." Shepherd.

THE FORM OF

SOLEMNIZATION OF MATRIMONY[y].

¶ First the Banns[z] of all that are to be married together must be published[a] in the Church three several Sundays, during the time of Morning Service, or of Evening Service, (if there be no Morning Service,) immediately after the second Lesson; the Curate saying after the accustomed manner,

---

[y] The form of solemnization of Matrimony.] That this holy state was instituted by God is evident from the two first chapters in the Bible; Gen. i. 28; ii. 18. 24. Whence it came to pass, that, amongst all the descendants from our first parents, the numerous inhabitants of the different nations in the world, there has been some religious way of entering into this state, in consequence and testimony of this divine institution. Among Christians especially, from the very first ages of the church, those, who have been married, have been always joined together in a solemn manner by an ecclesiastical person. And both in the Greek and Latin churches, offices were drawn up in the most early times for the religious celebration of this holy ordinance: but, being afterwards mixed with superstitious rites, our Reformers thought fit to lay them aside, and to draw up a form more decent and grave, and more agreeable to the usage of the primitive church. Wheatly.

Mankind is naturally inclined to society; and the bond, as well as the foundation, of all societies is marriage; which ought to be made sacred, and adopted into religion, because it is the interest of mankind it should be inviolable. Wherefore our Church appoints, first, that none but a lawful minister shall tie these bonds, for God Himself married the first man and woman, and the covenant is made to Him, and the minister is God's representative, to take the securities and bless the parties in God's name, for which cause the primitive Christians did not account it a lawful marriage unless it was celebrated by a lawful minister; and the laws of this and all other Christian nations affirm the same thing. Secondly, our Church allows no clandestine marriages, for it orders that the banns (that is, the decree) of matrimony shall be published three several days in the church before the marriage be celebrated; a custom as ancient as the days of Tertullian, and used in the Protestant churches abroad as well as here, and it is designed to prevent all objections that might be made in vain, when once the bonds are tied. Thirdly, for better security against clandestine marriage, the Church orders that all marriages shall be made in the day-time; for those, who intend honourably and honestly, need not fly the light: and since the parties are most serious in the morning, it is appointed that it shall be celebrated between the hours of eight and twelve; and of old it was required, the bridegroom and bride should be fasting when they made this religious vow in God's presence, and by that means they were safe from being made incapable by drink, of making a wise and voluntary choice in this great and weighty affair. There are also some times which are set apart for extraordinary devotion, namely, from Advent Sunday, till a week after Epiphany; from Septuagesima Sunday, till a week after Easter; and from Ascension-day, till Trinity Sunday; which some old canons and the custom of this nation reckon times prohibited from marriage: the frequent returns and long continuance of which times give the parties more space for consideration and good advice. Fourthly, and that this holy rite may be still more solemn, it is expressly required that the marriage be celebrated in the church, the place of God's special presence, before whom they make this religious covenant; and the sacredness of the place should make them more reverent in entering into it, and more careful in keeping it. For the better assurance whereof, lastly, it is enjoined to be done in the presence of their friends and neighbours, who ought to be there, to testify their consent unto it, to be continual witnesses of it, and to join with the holy man in prayers for a blessing on it: for which end our Church hath provided a most proper, pious, and judicious form; consisting of, first, the preparation, by instructing the whole congregation, and charging the parties to declare all known impediments; secondly, the solemnization, by asking their mutual consent, joining their hands, plighting their troth to each other, and confirming it by the pledge of a ring: as also the priest's ratifying this covenant, by praying for a blessing on it, publishing the validity of it, and pronouncing his benediction over the parties. Thirdly, the conclusion of the office, by praises in the Psalms, by prayers in the Collects, and finally, by instructing them in their duty out of God's word. Dean Comber.

[z] —the Banns] The word "bann" comes from the barbarous Latin word bannum, bandum; or from bannire, which signifies to put out such an edict or proclamation. It came into use about the seventh or eighth century, when the Latin tongue was vitiated by the intermixture of a number of Gothick, Teutonick, and Gaulish words. For we find the use of it in the Capitulars of Charles the Great, in the year of our Lord 802. "Banninus firmiter, ut nemo amplius faciat, &c.;" "We publish it as a ban, that no one hereafter &c." Dr. Nicholls.

I Publish the Banns of Marriage between M. of — and N. of —. If any of you know cause or just impediment[b], why these two persons

Before any can be lawfully married together, the "Banns" are directed to be published in the church, that is, "Publick Proclamation" (for so the word signifies) must be made to the congregation, concerning the design of the parties that intend to come together. This care of the Church to prevent clandestine marriages is, as far as we can find, as old as Christianity itself. For Tertullian tells us, that in his time all marriages were accounted clandestine, that were not published beforehand in the church, and were in danger of being judged adultery and fornication. And by several ancient constitutions of our own Church, it was ordered, that none should be married before notice should be given of it in the publick congregation on three several Sundays or holy-days. And so it was also ordered by the rubrick prefixed to the form of solemnization of matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer, namely, that "the Banns of all that are to be married together be published in the church three several Sundays or holy-days, in time of divine service;" unto which was added at the last review, "immediately before the sentences for the offertory:" but it is ordered by a late Act of Parliament, namely, the statute 26 George II. "To prevent clandestine marriages," which should be carefully perused by every parochial clergyman, that "all banns of matrimony shall be published upon three Sundays preceding the solemnization of marriage, immediately after the second Lesson."

The design of the Church in publishing these banns, is to be satisfied whether there be any just cause or impediment why the parties, so asked, should not be joined together in matrimony. Wheatly.

Some of the reasons for these alterations are sufficiently obvious. When there is no Communion, the sentences before the offertory are seldom read; and, when there is a Communion, the greater part of our congregations withdraw immediately after the sermon, and none hear the sentences read, but they who mean to receive the Communion. To give therefore the greater publicity to the banns, the time of publishing is now appointed to be immediately after the second Lesson, when it must be presumed that the whole congregation is assembled.

Again, banns may now be published during the time of Evening service when there is no Morning service. Whereas, according to the former regulation, banns could be published only in the morning, for the sentences before the offertory are not read in the evening.

Before the last review there was no special form of words appointed for the minister to use in the publication of banns. The present form was then added, and the late statute enacts, that "all banns shall be published according to this form."

"No curate is obliged to publish banns of matrimony between any persons whatsoever, unless they, seven days at the least, before the time required for such publication respectively, deliver notice in writing of their Christian and surnames, and of the house or houses of their respective abodes, and of the time they have dwelt in such houses." Shepherd.

[a] — the Banns of all that are to be married together must be published &c.] By the 62nd Canon a licence doth nothing more than barely supply the place of banns. It doth not make any other change in the rules of our ministration in the office of marriage: it is only an equivalent to the previous publication of banns, or to a certificate of such publication in another parish.

And any reason whatsoever, that ought to hinder or retard the solemnization of marriage after banns thrice published, will be equally good reasons for refusing or suspending compliance with a licence, where the like circumstances occur. Archdeacon Sharp.

[b] — cause or just impediment,] The impediments to lawful marriage in England are not numerous. Independent of impotency and of mental imbecility, which latter invalidates marriage, as it does every other engagement, they are only three: 1. A preceding marriage, or precontract still existing; 2. Consanguinity or affinity, that is, relationship either by blood or marriage; and, 3. In cases of minority, want of the consent of parents or guardians.

On each of these three impediments, I shall offer a few observations. They may serve as directions to the younger part of the clergy, if any of them be without a better guide; and may also be of use to the parties intending to contract matrimony.

1. A simple precontract to one person is not now regarded as an impediment to a legal marriage with another. Still the party disappointed may obtain by a legal process all the compensation that in such a case a trifling sum of money can afford.

But a second marriage, during the life of a former husband or wife, is by the ecclesiastical law a mere nullity: and the party affecting to contract such marriage the statute law has made guilty of felony, on account of its being so gross a violation of publick decency as well as justice. Yet, where the husband has been abroad seven years, though the wife might have received intimation of his being alive, and vice versa; or where the husband has been absent from his wife for seven years within the kingdom, and she had no knowledge of his being alive within that time, and vice versa; though any subsequent marriage is void, yet it is not felony. Thus likewise, in case of separation "a mensa et thoro," a second marriage is not felony, but simply void.

2. Either consanguinity or affinity, within certain degrees, forms a second impediment to legal marriage. The statutes that mention the degrees, within which marriage is prohibited, and the table of degrees set forth by authority in 1563, required by the Canons to be hung up in churches, and frequently annexed to the larger editions of the Book of Common Prayer, are founded upon the prohibitions recorded in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus. In Leviticus it is to be noticed, that not every one of the degrees, exhibited in the table, is particularly specified; but the whole is deducible by fair inference. For example, the statutes and the table expressly forbid a man to marry his wife's sister; upon which Bishop Jewel argues thus: "For when God commands me, that I shall not marry my brother's wife, it follows directly that he forbids me to marry my wife's sister. For between one woman and two brothers there is like analogy or proportion." The most remote degree prohibited from marrying by the Levitical law, and the law of this realm, is that between the uncle and niece, or between the nephew and the aunt.

3. The only remaining impediment is want of age. By our statute law it is enacted, "that all marriages solemnized by licence where either of the parties not being a widower or widow," which supposes emancipation, "shall be under the age of twenty-one years, which shall be had without the consent of the father, should not be joined together in holy Matrimony, ye are to declare it. This is the first [second, or third] time of asking.

¶ And if the persons that are to be married[c] dwell in divers Parishes, the Banns must be asked in both Parishes; and the Curate of the one Parish shall not solemnize Matrimony betwixt them, without a Certificate of the Banns being thrice asked, from the Curate of the other Parish.

¶ At the day and time appointed[d] for solemnization of Matrimony, the persons to be married shall come into the body of the Church[e] with their friends and neighbours[f], or, he being dead, of the mother, if unmarried; or of the guardian lawfully appointed; shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatever."

With respect to marriage by banns the case is different. Some clergymen I know are of opinion, that the minister ought to be certified that the parties are full twenty-one years of age, or that the consent of the parent or guardian has been obtained, before he can lawfully proceed to celebrate a marriage by banns.

This opinion is evidently grounded upon the sixty-second Canon, which ordains, that no minister, upon pain of suspension per triennium ipso facto, shall celebrate matrimony between any persons when banns are thrice asked, and no licence in that respect necessary, before the parents or governors of the parties to be married, being under the age of twenty and one years, shall either personally, or by sufficient testimony, signify to him their consents given to the said marriage. The rule was plain, and the penalty upon conviction was both severe and inevitable. Though suspension for three years ipso facto did not take place till it was judicially declared, yet, when the offence was proved, the punishment could neither be dispensed with nor mitigated. The courts had nothing more to do, and it was not in their power to do less, than declare the penalty awarded by the canon, pronounce the sentence, and see it put in execution.

But it is now enacted by a statute, that "no minister solemnizing marriages between persons, both or one of whom shall be under the age of twenty-one years after banns published, shall be punishable by ecclesiastical censures for solemnizing such marriages without consent of parents or guardians, whose consent is required by law, unless he shall have notice of the dissent of such parents or guardians." The statute likewise enacts that, "in case such parents or guardians, or one of them, shall openly and publickly declare or cause to be declared, in the church or chapel where the banns shall be published, at the time of such publication, his, her, or their dissent to such marriage, such publication of banns shall be absolutely void." Shepherd.

[c] And if the persons that are to be married &c.] This rubrick seems to suppose, what both the ancient and modern canons enjoin, namely, that marriage shall always be solemnized in the church or chapel where one of the parties dwelleth. And by our own canons, whatever minister marries them any where else, incurs the same penalty as for a clandestine marriage, Canon 62. Nor is even a licence allowed to dispense with him for doing it, Canon 102. And the late Act for preventing clandestine marriages expressly requires, that, in all cases where banns have been published, the marriage be solemnized in one of the churches where such publications had been made, and in no other place whatsoever; and that no licence shall be granted to solemnize any marriage in any other church than that which belongeth to the parish, within which one of the parties to be married hath dwelt for four weeks immediately preceding. Formerly it was a custom that marriage should be performed in no other church, but that to which the woman belonged as a parishioner: and the ecclesiastical law allowed a fee due to the curate of that church, whether she was married there or not; which was generally reserved for him in the words of the licence: but those words have been omitted in licences granted since the Act 26 George II. took place, which gives no preference to the woman's parish. Wheatly.

The statute of the 26th of George II. explains in detail, and supplies the deficiency of the rubrick. In particular it gives instructions relative to the publication of banns where both or either of the persons to be married dwell in an extra-parochial place, having no church or chapel where banns have been usually published. Shepherd.

[d] At the day and time appointed] For better security against clandestine marriages the Church orders that all marriages be celebrated in the "day-time:" for those that mean honourably need not fly the light. By the sixty-second Canon they are ordered to be performed in "time of divine service;" but that practice is now almost, by universal consent, laid aside and discontinued: and the rubrick only mentions "the day and time appointed," which the aforesaid canon expressly requires to be "between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon:" and though even a licence be granted, these hours are not dispensed with. Wheatly.

In England marriage may now be celebrated at all seasons of the year, and on any day. But it can only be done at a certain time of the day, "between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon." This regulation is consonant to the spirit of the old canons of our Church, which prohibit the solemnization of matrimony at unseasonable or secret hours, and enjoin that the parties plight their troth before they have broken their fast. This does not extend to special licences, granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, which authorize the parties to marry at any suitable time and place. Shepherd.

[e] — into the body of the Church] Partly that the office may be performed in a visible place; and partly in imitation of antiquity; for in the ancient church marriages were solemnized in this place. Dr. Nicholls.

The custom formerly was, for the couple, who were to enter into this holy state, to be placed at the church door, where the priest was used to join their hands, and perform the greatest part of the matrimonial office. But at the Reformation the rubrick was altered, and the whole office ordered to be performed within the church, where the congregation might afford more witnesses of the fact.

And since God Himself doth join those, that are lawfully married, certainly the house of God is the fittest place wherein to make this religious covenant. And therefore by the ancient canons of this Church the celebration of matrimony in taverns, or other unhallowed places, is expressly forbidden. And the office is commanded to be performed in the church, not only to prevent all clandestine marriages, but also that the sacredness of the place may strike the greater reverence into the minds of the married couple, while they remember they make this holy vow in the place of God's peculiar presence. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

and there standing together, the Man on the right hand[g], and the Woman on the left, the Priest shall say[h],

DEARLY beloved, we are gathered together here in the Prov. xv. 3. sight of God, and in the face of this congregation, to join together this Man and this Woman in holy Matrimony; which is an honourable estate, instituted of God in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his Church; which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence[i], and first miracle that he wrought, in

Heb. xiii. 4.
Gen. ii. 18. 21—24.
Eph. v. 22—33.

As to the place of solemnization, the statute of 26 George II. enacts, that "no licence shall be granted to solemnize any marriage in any other church or chapel, than in the parish church or publick chapel of the parish or chapelry, which shall have been the usual place of abode of one of the parties for four weeks immediately before the granting of such licence: and in all such cases, where banns shall have been published, the marriage shall be solemnized in one of the parish churches where the banns were published, and in no other place whatsoever."

Yet in a subsequent clause of this statute, it is likewise "provided, that, after the solemnization of any marriage, under a publication of banns, it shall not be necessary to give any proof of the actual dwelling of the parties in the respective parishes, wherein the banns of matrimony were published. Or, where the marriage is by licence, it shall not be necessary to give any proof that the usual place of abode of one of the parties for the space of four weeks, as aforesaid, was in the parish where the marriage was solemnized; nor shall any evidence in either of the said cases be received to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of such marriage."

The penalty which a clergyman incurred for marrying any persons without a lawful licence, or the regular publication of banns, was, according to the Canons of 1603, suspension for three years. To this, several statutes, made in the reigns of William and of Anne, added the forfeiture of one hundred pounds. But by 26 George II. it is enacted, that, "if any person shall solemnize matrimony in any other place than a church or chapel where banns have been usually published, unless by special licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury: or shall solemnize matrimony without publication of banns, unless licence be first had and obtained; every person, knowingly and wilfully so offending, and being lawfully convicted, shall be deemed and adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be transported for fourteen years, according to the laws in force for the transportation of felons;" it is to be observed the prosecution must however be commenced within three years of the commission of the offence: "and all such marriages shall be null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever." The provisions of this act do not extend to the marriages of any of the royal family; nor to the marriages by special licence obtained from the Archbishop of Canterbury; nor to marriages between Quakers, nor Jews, where both parties are Jews or Quakers; nor to marriages abroad, or in Scotland. Clandestine marriages contracted in Scotland by English parties, even under the age of twenty-one years, and without consent of parents or guardians, our courts, I apprehend, allow to be binding and good. Shepherd.

[f] — with their friends and neighbours,] That is, their relations and acquaintance, who ought to attend on this solemnity, to testify their consent to it, and to join with the minister in prayers for a blessing on it. Though it may not be improbable, but that by the "friends" here mentioned may be understood such as the ancients used to call "Paranymphs," or "Bridemen;" some traces of which custom we find to be as old as the days of Samson, whose wife is said to have been delivered to his companion, who in the Septuagint version is called Νυμφαγωγὸς, or Brideman, Judges xiv. 20. And that bridemen were in use among the Jews in our Saviour's time, is clear from John iii. 29. From the Jews the custom was received by the Christians, who used it at first rather as a civil custom, and something that added to the solemnity of the occasion, than as a religious rite; though it was afterwards countenanced so far as to be made a necessary part of the sacred solemnity. An account of this custom as it prevailed here in the time of King Henry VIII. may be seen in Polydore Vergil. Some remains of it are still left among us: but as to countenancing or discountenancing it, our Church has left it (as in itself) a thing indifferent. Wheatly.

The covenant is to be made in presence of friends and neighbours, that is, of relations and acquaintance, who are competent witnesses. In the primitive church ten witnesses were required to attest a marriage. It was afterwards ordered that there should not be fewer than six: at length two were thought sufficient, as they are still to substantiate the most important facts in any other case. And by the statute of 26 George II. "All marriages shall be solemnized in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, besides the minister who shall celebrate the same." Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[g] — the man on the right hand, &c.] Because the right hand is the most honourable place; which is therefore, both by the Latin and Greek and all Christian churches, assigned to the man, as being head of the wife. The Jews are the only persons that, I ever heard, acted otherwise, who place the women on the right hand of her husband, in allusion to that expression in the forty-fifth Psalm, "At thy right hand did stand the queen in a vesture of gold, &c." Wheatly.

[h] — the Priest shall say,] To prevent that vain and loose mirth which is too frequent at these solemnities, the office is begun with a grave and awful preface, which represents the action, we are about, to be of so divine an original, of so high a nature, and of such infinite concernment to all mankind, that they are not only vain and imprudent, but even void of shame, who will not lay aside their levity, and be composed, upon so serious and solemn occasion. And to prevent any misfortune, which the two parties might rashly, or perhaps inconsiderately, run into by means of their marriage, the minister charges the congregation, "If they know any just cause why they may not lawfully be joined together, they do now declare it," before this holy bond be tied; since afterwards their discovery of it will tend perhaps more to the prejudice than to the relief of the parties. Wheatly.

[i] — which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence, &c.] The passage relating to our blessed Saviour here mentioned, and recited at large by St. John in the 2nd chapter of his Gospel, shews that matrimony was in those days, in which our Lord

John ii. 1, 2. Cana of Galilee; and is commended of Saint Paul to be honourable
Heb. xiii. 4. among all men: and therefore is not by any to be enterprised, nor taken in hand, unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly, to satisfy men's carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding; but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God; duly considering the causes for which Matrimony was ordained.

Gen. i. 27, 28. Eph. vi. 4. John xv. 8. First, It was ordained for the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and to the praise of his holy Name.

1 Cor. vii. 2. Secondly, It was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication; that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's body.

Gen. ii. 18. 21—24. Thirdly, It was ordained for the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity. Into which holy estate these two persons present come now to be joined. Therefore if any man can shew any just cause, why they may not lawfully be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter for ever hold his peace.

¶ And also, speaking unto the persons that shall be married[j], he shall say,

I Require and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgement, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that if either of you know any impediment, why ye may not be lawfully joined together in Matrimony, ye do now confess it. For be ye well assured, that so many as are coupled together otherwise than God's word doth allow, are not joined together by God; neither is their Matrimony lawful.

2 Tim. iv. 1. Eccles. xii. 14. Mark vi. 17, 18. 1 John v. 17; iii. 4.

¶ At which day of Marriage, if any man do alledge and declare any impediment, why they may not be coupled together in Matrimony, by God's Law, or the Laws of this Realm; and will be bound, and sufficient sureties with him, to the parties; or else put in a Caution (to the full value of such charges as the persons to be married do thereby sustain) to prove his allegation: then the solemnization must be deferred, until such time as the truth be tried.

¶ If no impediment be alledged, then[k] shall the Curate say unto the Man, Himself was on earth, celebrated in a publick manner, and also with his approbation. And it may be here observed, that innocent festivity and mirth at proper seasons are not unbecoming the gravity of a good and serious Christian, since Christ Himself was pleased to honour a wedding with his company; and to be at the expense of a miracle, lest the cheerfulness of the guests should flag for want of such a quantity of wine as was necessary upon such an occasion. The publick celebration of matrimony is likewise apparently alluded to in the parable of the ten Virgins; Matt. xxv. 1—13. Veneer. See page 109, note b.

[j] And also, speaking unto the persons that shall be married, &c.] Though others are first called upon to discover the impediments, if any such be known, as being most likely to reveal them; yet the parties themselves are charged, in the next place, as being most concerned to declare them. Since, should there afterwards appear any just impediment to their marriage, they must either necessarily live together in a perpetual sin, or be separated for ever by an eternal divorce. Wheatly.

I cannot but commend the wisdom and piety of our Church, expressed in the great care she hath taken to prevent unlawful marriages, not only by requiring the publication of banns, or the obtaining of a licence in a regular way, but also by giving a strict charge to the parties themselves. For surely, if conscience be not utterly scared, it must needs be affected by such tremendous words, and force the parties to confess, if there be any lawful let or impediment to hinder the marriage. Dr. Bennet.

[k] If no impediment be alledged, then &c.] The impediments being removed, we proceed to the marriage itself, which being a solemn compact, we first "ask the mutual consent of the parties," because consent of the persons is so essential, that the marriage is not good without it: hence Rebekah's friends asked her consent, Gen. xxiv. 58. And in the firmest kind of matrimony among the Romans the parties did mutually ask this of each other, and amongst all Christians the priest in God's stead puts this question, that the declaration may be made as to God Himself. Dean Comber.

The man therefore is asked, "Whether he will have this woman to his wedded wife;" and the woman, "Whether she will have this man to her wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony." And that they may the better know what are the conditions of this state, the minister enumerates the duties which each of them by this covenant will be bound to perform.

The man, for instance, is obliged, in the first place, to "love" his wife, which is the principal duty required by St. Paul, Eph. v. 25; and is here mentioned first, because, if the man hath this affection, he will perform with delight all the other duties; it being no burden to do good offices to those whom we heartily and sincerely love. 2. He must "comfort her," which is the same that St. Paul expresses by "cherishing," Eph. v. 29; and implies here, that the husband must support his wife under all the infirmities and sorrows, to which the tenderness of her sex often makes her liable. 3. He is to "honour" her, which is also directly commanded by St. Peter, 1 Pet. iii. 7; for though the wife, as he says, be the "weaker vessel,"

M. WILT thou have this Woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?

Ruth iii. 13. Judges xiv. 2 Gen. ii. 24. Eph. v. 28–31. 1 Pet. iii. 7. 1 Cor. vii. 4. Mal. ii. 16. 1 Cor. vii. 10.

¶ The Man shall answer, I will[l].

¶ Then shall the Priest say unto the Woman,

Gen. xxiv. 58. N. WILT thou have this Man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?

Eph. v. 22. 24. Col iii. 18. Tit. ii. 4. 5. Gen. ii. 18. 24. Rom. vii. 2.

¶ The Woman shall answer, I will.

¶ Then shall the Minister say[m], yet she must not be despised for those unavoidable weaknesses, which God has been pleased to annex to her constitution, but rather respected for her usefulness to the man's comfortable being. 4. He must "keep her in sickness and health," which in St. Paul's phrase is to "nourish," Eph. v. 29, or to afford her all necessaries in every condition. Lastly, he must consent to be faithful to her, and "forsaking all other, keep himself only to her so long as they both shall live," Mal. ii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. vii. 10; which is added to prevent those three mischievous and fatal destroyers of marriage, adultery, polygamy, and divorce.

There is no difference in the duties, nor consequently in the terms, of the covenant between a man and his wife; except that the woman is obliged to "obey" and "serve" her husband. Nor is this a difference of our own devising, but is expressly ordered by God Himself, who, in those places of Scripture where He enjoins husbands to love their wives, commands the wives to be "subject" and "obedient" to their husbands, Eph. v. 22. 24; Col. iii. 18; Tit. ii. 5; 1 Pet. iii. 1. 5. The rules also of society make it necessary; for equality, saith St. Chrysostom, breeds contention, and one of the two must be superior, or else both would strive perpetually for the dominion. Wherefore the laws of God, and the wisdom of all nations, have given the superiority to the husband. Wheatly.

[l] — I will.] The whole matter being thus proposed to each party, they should each of them seriously weigh and consider it. And if they like this state of life, and the duties annexed to it; if they neither of them have any objection against the person of the other, but are persuaded they can each of them love the other, and that for ever, in all conditions of life; let each of them answer as the Church directs them, "I will;" which are the proper words that oblige in compacts, but which can never lay a more solemn obligation than when they are pronounced on this occasion. For if we start back after speaking them here, we shall have as many witnesses of the falsehood, as there are persons present at the solemnity, namely, God and his angels, the minister and the congregation; and therefore in regard to so venerable an assembly, let them here be pronounced with all deliberate gravity, and for ever made good with all possible sincerity. Wheatly.

[m] Then shall the Minister say, &c.] The next thing in the solemnization is, "the mutual stipulation," or the covenant they make with one another, which is introduced with two very significant rites: first, "the father's giving the woman in marriage," Luke, xvii. 27; 1 Cor. vii. 38; which custom was used amongst the Romans and the Christians in all ages, for divers reasons. 1. Because the weaker sex is always supposed to be under the tuition of a father or guardian, whose consent is necessary to make their acts valid. 2. This declares that the parents and friends agree to this marriage, and that the father doth emancipate his daughter, and make her free to engage in her own name. 3. This also shews the woman doth not seek an husband, but is given to one by her friends, following herein their commands, rather than her own inclinations, which doth very well suit the modesty of this sex. Secondly follows the "joining of hands," which all the world over is a ceremony signifying the contracting of friendship and making of covenants, Prov. xi. 21; 2 Kings x. 15; and hath ever been used in the covenant of marriage, Tobit vii. 13. The father delivers her up to the priest as it were to commit her to God's disposal, and he in God's presence joins their "right hands," because the right hand is generally used in plighting our troth, and engaging our faith to any person; and having thus delivered them into each other's hands and power, 1 Cor. vii. 4, the priest, while they thus give each other their hands, causeth them to make the mutual stipulation, or solemn engagement and vow to each other: he asked the parties' consent before, and then in words of the future tense they promised they would have this person in marriage, but that is no more than "espousals," which of old was a different office from this of matrimony, and done some weeks or months before; but because some cast off their spouses, before the marriage was completed, the Church hath now put the espousals and marriage both into one office, only there they say, "I will;" and here, "I do take," &c. Dean Comber.

[n] Then shall they give their troth to each other] This old English expression answers exactly to the Latin, "fidem dare," to promise faithfully: this was the old usual form of speaking in stipulations and making bargains. So that when the Church requires of the persons to be married, that they shall give each other their troth; her meaning is, that they shall make a solemn assurance to each other, that they design to be husband and wife, and to live together in a faithful discharge of those rules and obligations, which God's law requires in that state. Dr. Nicholls.

[o] — at her father's or friend's hands,] The true reason, why the father gives away his daughter, probably is, because, in ancient times, the authority of a father was almost despotick. The children were considered as his property. When any other person gives her

Man with his right hand[p] to take the Woman by her right hand, and to say after him as followeth[q].

I M. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part[r], according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth[s].

Rom. vii. 2, 3. Mark x 2.

¶ Then shall they loose their hands; and the Woman, with her right hand taking the Man by his right hand, shall likewise say after the Minister,

I N. take thee M. to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I give thee my troth.

¶ Then shall they again loose their hands; and the Man shall give unto the Woman a Ring[t], laying the same upon the book[u], with the accustomed duty to the Priest and Clerk[x]. And the Priest taking the Ring, shall deliver it unto the Man, to put it upon the fourth finger of the Woman's left away, he is supposed to be deputed by the father, or to act with his permission. At present the ceremony shews the father's consent; and that the authority, which he before possessed, he now resigns to the husband. Shepherd.

[p] — shall cause the Man with his right hand &c.] The joining of hands naturally signifies contracting a friendship, and making a covenant, as observed before, note m: and the right hand especially was esteemed so sacred, that Cicero calls it the "witness of our faith:" and therefore, the joining of these being used in all covenants, no wonder it should be observed in the solemn one of marriage. Accordingly we find it has been used, upon this occasion, by Heathens, Jews, and Christians in all ages. Wheatly.

In both the ancient and modern offices of the Eastern and Western churches, the priest is directed to join the hands of the man and woman, that each may confirm the covenant to the other. Shepherd.

[q] — and to say after him as followeth.] The declaration of the consent of the parties, already given, may be considered as a form of espousals; but the mutual stipulation, which each is to repeat with their own lips, is the most essential part of the marriage ceremony. For, to make the marriage legal and binding, the parties must not only be able and willing to contract, but they themselves must actually contract in the form required by the laws of the realm.

As a form of contract, the mutual stipulation prescribed by our Church is explicit and full. It comprehends whatever is essential to any contract. What adds to its beauty and excellence, is its plainness and simplicity. The sense is so clear, that it cannot be mistaken by the most ordinary capacity. Shepherd.

[r] — till death us do part,] In Edward's first book, and in all the books till the last review, we read, "till death us depart:" that is, divide, separate, or, as it now stands, "do part." Shepherd.

"To depart" is one of our oldest verbs, in the usual sense of divide or separate. Wicliffe, Gower, and Chaucer, thus employ the word; and many later writers. Thus in the translation of the Bible, 1578, Ruth i. 17, "The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death depart thee and me." It was not in use, or at least was not thus understood, soon after the Restoration. For, among the exceptions of the dissenters against our Book of Common Prayer in 1661, the word, in the old marriage service, is thus branded: "Till death us depart: the word 'depart' is here improperly used." The word was extended into the present form "do part." Todd.

[s] — and thereto I plight thee my troth.] Or, as the woman says, "I give thee my troth:" that is, for the performance of all that has been said, they, each of them, lay their faith of truth to pledge; as much as if they had said, If I perform not the covenant I have made, let me forfeit my credit, and never be counted just, or honest, or faithful any more. And therefore they ought well to consider this vow, before they make it; and beware, that they never break it. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[t] — the Man shall give unto the Woman a Ring.] Besides the pledge of our truth, there is a visible pledge also, namely, "the ring," which being anciently the seal by which all orders were signed, and all choice things secured, the delivery of this was a sign, that the party to whom it was given was admitted into the nearest friendship and the highest trust, so as to be invested with our authority and allowed to manage our treasure and other concerns, Gen. xli. 42; and hence it came to be a token of love, Luke xv. 22; and was used in matrimony not only among the Jews and Gentiles, but the Christians also, who, in Clemens Alexandrinus's time, gave their spouse a ring to declare her worthy of the government of the family, and thus it hath been used ever since. And we may observe, the matter, of which this ring is made, is gold, to signify how noble and durable our affection is: the form is round, as the properest figure to unite things separated before, and to imply that our respect shall never have an end: the place of it is on the fourth finger of the left hand, where the ancients thought was a vein which came directly from the heart, and where it may be always in view; and, being a finger least used, where it may be least subject to be worn out. But the main end is to be a visible and lasting token and remembrance of this covenant, which must never be forgotten; and if in ordinary bargains we have some lasting thing delivered as an earnest or pledge and memorial, much more is it needful here: and to scruple a thing so prudent and well designed, so anciently and universally used, does not deserve our serious confutation. Dean Comber.

The ring is by positive institution "a token and pledge of the covenant made" by the parties contracting marriage: and, as it is a permanent monument of the vows and promises then reciprocally made, so it ought to be a perpetual monitor, that these vows be religiously observed, and these promises faithfully performed. Shepherd.

[u] — laying the same upon the book,] Intimating that it is our duty, to offer up all we have to God as the true proprietor, before we use them ourselves; and to receive them as from his hand to be employed towards his glory. Wheatly.

[x] — Clerk.] See page 34, note y. Custom has intro-hand. And the Man holding the Ring there, and taught by the Priest, shall say,

WITH this Ring I thee wed[y], with my body I thee worship[z], and with all my worldly goods I thee endow[a]: In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost[b]. Amen.

duced the office of "clerk" in our parish churches, obliging him to a constant attendance on the publick service: but to this intent, that the worship might not suffer by a general defailure either in the absence or answers of the people; not that such person should supply or excuse either. Custom has also authorized him to exercise such office before, yet jointly with, the congregation in a distinguished manner; he with a more audible, they with a more humble voice, but to this twofold intent: first, that the indecency of a general loudness, as well as deficiency by a total silence, might be prevented in the publick answers: secondly, that by the clerk's audible pronunciation of Amen and the responses, the close and completion of the prayers and other parts might appear; and their separation from, and succession to, each other might be heard and distinguished. But though such officer be admitted into the Church, and for such ends, yet by his assistance no member of the congregation is either excluded or excused. All persons present, of whatever age, sex, or condition, are bound to act, to worship for themselves: all, as the eighteenth Canon expressly directs, "either man, woman, or child, of what calling soever, must repeat audibly the Confession, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed, and make the several answers as appointed in the Common Prayer:" must pronounce each Amen; must perform every part and parcel of the service, that the clerk is accustomed to do; otherwise they disappoint the order of the Church. If indeed there be, as it is to be feared there is, a vulgar error crept in and spread among our people, that the office of a parish clerk is appointed, and a seat erected for him in the church, only that in the publick answers and parts he may supply, and be instead of a mouth for the congregation; it is so gross an errror, so directly contrary to the intention of our Church; that, as if it were to prevent and beat down such a conceit, the Church hath not in all the rubricks taken the least notice of such office, or once mentioned the title of clerk, but on this single occasion. For, when the rubrick before the Lord's Prayer, after the Apostles' Creed, saith, "the minister, clerks, and people shall say it with a loud voice," by "clerks" it doth not mean the parish clerk; for it speaks in the plural, of more clerks than one: but it means real clerks in holy orders, and refers only to choirs in cathedrals and collegiate churches, where many such clerks or clergymen are supposed to be present.

Before the Reformation, there were one or more of these real clerks also in parish churches, who were as assistants to the rector or vicar; and had for their maintenance, besides the profits of the place and teaching school, the office of Aquæbajuli, to carry the holy water.

But, as before said, the parish clerk is not noticed in the rubricks, except here. Is the minister ordered by the rubrick to begin the Confession? "The whole congregation," not the clerk, are ordered to "say it after him." Is the priest appointed to pronounce the Absolution? "The people," not any single person, are appointed, "at the end of that, and of all other prayers, to answer Amen." Dr. Bisse.

[y] With this Ring I thee wed,] When the ring is delivered, the husband speaks to his wife, declaring, 1. The general meaning of this significant token, "with this ring I thee wed," that is, this is a pledge of that covenant of matrimony which I just now make with thee. 2. He shews the particular rights accruing to her thereby, namely, to share in all the honours belonging to his person, which is the meaning of those words "with my body I thee worship:" and to have an interest in his estate, signified in that phrase, "with all my worldly goods I thee endow;" and in that ancient usage of laying down a sum of money on the book, part of which is the man's oblation to God, (namely, the dues of the priest and clerk,) and all the rest was by the priest delivered to the wife, to give her "livery and seisin" of her husband's estate, which though she may not alienate without his consent, yet she may and ought to have the use of as she hath occasion, which is no more than justice requires, because she hath already endowed her husband in her fortune; so that hereafter they are to have all things in common, and the husband is bound to provide for his wife according to his power while he lives, and when he dies; especially since he makes this solemn covenant, "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," that is, by his Christianity, and before the Trinity, as witness thereto, who, if he break it, will be the avenger of this perjury; for these words, calling God to witness, turn this promise into a solemn and sacred oath. Dean Comber.

[z] —with my body I thee worship,] For the better understanding of this phrase, we must know, that anciently there were two sorts of wives; one whereof was called the primary or lawful wife; the other was called the half-wife, or concubine. The difference betwixt these two was only in the differing purpose of the man, betaking himself to the one or the other: if his purpose was only fellowship, there grew to the woman by this means no worship at all; but rather the contrary. In professing, that his intent was to add by his person honour and worship unto hers, he took her plainly and clearly to be his wife, not his concubine. This it is, which the civil law doth mean, when it makes a wife differ from a concubine in dignity. The worship that grew unto her being taken with declaration of this intent, was, that her children became by this means free and legitimate, heirs to their father, Gen. xxv. 5, 6, and herself was made a mother over his family. Lastly, she received such advancement of state, as things annexed to his person might augment her with: yea, a right of participation was thereby given her, both in him, and even in all things which were his; and therefore he says not only "with my body I thee worship," but also, "with all my worldly goods I thee endow." The former branch having granted the principal, the latter granteth that which is annexed thereto. Hooker.

The Jews anciently used the same phrase: "Be unto me a wife, and I, according to the word of God, will worship, honour, and maintain thee according to the manner of husbands amongst the Jews, who worship, honour, and maintain their wives." And that no man quarrel at this harmless phrase, let him take notice, that to worship here signifies, to make worshipful or honourable, as you may see, 1 Sam. ii. 30. For where our last translation reads it, "him that honours me, I will honour;" in the old translation, which our Common Prayer Book uses, it is, "him that worships me, I will worship;" that is, I will make worshipful; for that way only can God be said to worship man. Bp. Sparrow.

These words are objected to by our adversaries, as a great crime in our Church, for obliging the bridegroom to make an idol of his bride, and to declare in the most extravagant strain of all compliments, that he worships her. But this imputation is owing to the want of a just consideration of the purport of the old English word "worship," which signifies an honourable regard, as is yet to be seen in our usual expressions still retained in common discourse, as your Worship, Worshipful, &c. And so King James in the conference at Hampton Court told Dr. Reynolds, who made this objection. For our Church is not only content, that the wife should be endowed with a share of the husband's goods; but that the husband should oblige himself to promote his spouse to the dignity of the uxorial honour: for she would not have the men joined to concubines by this religious solemnity: and therefore she ties the man to make profession, that he is willing to have the person he marries not only to be a partner in his bed, but that she should have all the dignity of a wife allowed her. And that is the meaning of these words, "with my body I thee worship:" I not only give thee a right in my body, but that in the honourable and worshipful way of a wife. For by the old Roman law this was the difference between a wife and a concubine: that the husband before marriage promised, that he designed to promote the woman he was married to, to the honour of Mater-familias, or mistress of the family. Dr. Nicholls.

The first right, accruing to the wife by marriage, is honour: and therefore the man says, "with my body I thee worship;" that is, "with my body I thee honour:" for so the word signifies in this place; and so Mr. Selden, and before him Martin Bucer, who lived at the time when our Liturgy was compiled, have translated it. The design of it is to express that the woman, by virtue of this marriage, has a share in all the titles and honours which are due or belong to the person of her husband. It is true, the modern sense of the word is somewhat different: for which reason, I find, that at the review of our Liturgy, after the restoration of King Charles II. "worship" was promised to be changed for "honour." How the alteration came to be omitted I cannot discover: but so long as the old word is explained in the sense that I have given of it, one would think no objection could be urged against using it. Wheatly.

[a] — with all my worldly goods I thee endow:] These words promise a maintenance suited to the man's quality, or a participation of his fortune and estate. Wherever he is master, she is mistress. The wife is to have all things in common with her husband, except the power of alienating his estate. Shepherd.

[b] — In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.] This is a solemn ratification of the engagement: and he that has made it should remember, that every wilful violation of the covenant is an act of injustice done to the woman, and an offence committed against the Almighty. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[c] — the Minister shall say, Let us pray, &c.] The custom of old was to conclude all covenants with sacrifices, Gen. xxxi. 54; which being now ceased, we finish this with a prayer, in which we describe God, to whom we pray, by his attributes and works. We are mortal; and must marry, to repair the decay which is caused by death: but He is an "eternal God." We are but instruments: He is "the Creator and Preserver of mankind," Rev. iv. 11. We do but contribute to the body and the temporal life of our children: He is "the Giver of grace and the Author of everlasting life." Of this God therefore, on this great occasion, we beg "a blessing upon this man and this woman," who, by marrying according to his rules, have declared that they are "his servants:" and the priest, who is God's representative, being assured that his great Master is pleased with holy marriage, doth authoritatively "bless them in God's name." Dean Comber.

In the old manuals of York and of Sarum, as well as in the Roman ritual, are prayers for the benediction of the ring, which was likewise crossed by the aspersion of holy water. The compilers of the Liturgy neither rejected what was useful in the old English offices, nor retained any thing that seemed improper. Of this latter kind were the prayers for the benediction of the ring, which have no claim to their pretended antiquity, for they are found neither in Gregory's Sacramentary, nor in any office of that or of the following age. To attempt to give holiness to an inanimate substance, in the sense in which the generality of Christians at that time understood, and many at this time understand, the word "holy" was at best but a kind of charm. Yet some of the sentiments and expressions used in those benedictions our office still retains.

The introduction to this benedictory prayer is copied from the form in the manual of Sarum, and other of the sentiments are borrowed from the Roman ritual: but instead of a blessing on the ring, which is prescribed in these offices, we are directed to implore a blessing on the parties which have contracted marriage: beseeching God that they may be enabled surely to perform the vow and covenant betwixt them made, whereof the ring given and received is a token and pledge, and may ever remain in perfect love and peace together, and live according to God's holy laws.

As an example of matrimonial fidelity our form specifies Isaac and Rebekah, who were probably selected for this reason. Isaac is the only patriarch who had not a plurality of wives. He lived with Rebekah according to the divine ordinance in the primitive institution of marriage. The Greek offices enumerate Abraham and Sarah, Jacob and Rachel, Moses and Zipporah, and others: but in the Roman ritual no particular instance of conjugal fidelity is either mentioned or alluded to. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

Col. iii. 19. Tit. ii. 4. Prov. xxi. 29. Ps. cxix. 35. in perfect love and peace together, and live according to thy laws; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Matt. xix. 6. Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

Mal. ii. 14. FORASMUCH as M. and N. have consented together in holy wedlock, and have witnessed the same before God and this company, and thereto have given and pledged their troth either to other, and have declared the same by giving and receiving of a Ring, and by joining of hands: I pronounce that they be Man and Wife together, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

¶ And the Minister shall add this blessing,

GOD the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, bless, preserve, and keep you; the Lord mercifully with his favour look upon you; and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace, that ye may so live together in this life, that in the world to come ye may have life everlasting. Amen. 2 Cor. xiii 14. Beati omnes. Psalm cxxviii.

BLESSED are all they that fear the Lord: and walk in his ways.

[d] Then shall the Priest join their right hands &c.] The covenant being thus made, and a blessing begged on it, the next thing is "the Church's ratification" thereof in the name of God, who, being the supreme Lord, ought to confirm his servants' marriages: and this is done first, by declaring the authority upon which this covenant is founded, namely, upon the divine authority: for the rite is of God's own instituting, the vow hath been made in his presence, and the promise made to Him and in his name, wherefore God hath joined those who are thus married; and we declare in our Saviour's words, Matt. xix. 6, "Those whom God hath joined together, no man may put asunder:" none but God (by death) can untie this holy knot; which shews there is no power upon earth can annul a lawful marriage: and though for some causes there may be a separation, (which when it is for causes allowed in God's law seems to be made by Him,) yet there can be no final divorce: and this declaration shews the covenant is irreversible, and not to be repealed. Secondly, the priest publisheth the marriage-covenant, by repeating the manner in which it was made, by mutual "consent" declared, and by a solemn vow made "in the presence of God" and the "congregation," by plighting their troth "and giving a ring" as the visible and lasting pledge thereof, as well as "by joining hands:" therefore he now sets God's seal to this holy and religious compact, to make it perfect and complete, "pronouncing them to be man and wife together, In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen." That is, they are joined rightly, according to the Christian rules, and by God's own authority, so that the union is sacred, inviolable, and never to be dissolved. Thirdly, this part is concluded with a solemn benediction; for being made by the divine authority and direction, the institution being his, the method is, and He being the authorizer of, and witness to, the marriage, the priest may without scruple pronounce God's blessing on the parties, mentioning the whole Trinity, in whose name the vow was made, and desiring God to bless them with all good things, "to preserve and keep them" from all evil, praying that He will be kind and "favourable" to them, giving them such "grace," that they may "live" so lovingly and holily together "in this life," that, when they come into that world where they neither marry nor are given in marriage, "they may be both" made happy, and meet "in everlasting life, Amen." This is the priest's blessing, which is so comprehensive, and so effectual, that the whole office was anciently called, "The blessing of the priest," which happily concludes this part. Dean Comber.

The benediction is drawn up in imitation of the blessing prescribed by God Himself in the book of Numbers. The first marriage, celebrated in paradise, was concluded with a blessing; and the example has been followed by the Christian church. Tertullian observes, that "the blessing of the Church sealed the marriage:" and this was thought so important a part of the nuptial rites, that the older forms of the solemnization of matrimony were styled, "The order for blessing the espoused," sometimes "The blessing of the priest," and sometimes "The blessing of God."

In the Romish ritual there is no benediction, at least none resembling ours: but in the Greek offices we find a very solemn benediction, which has a considerable degree of affinity with our own. It begins, "The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the most holy and consubstantial Trinity, the fountain of life, who have one divinity and one kingdom; bless you, and give you length of days; fruitfulness, increase of piety and faith; fill you with all the blessings of the earth; and fit you for the enjoyment of his excellent promises, &c." Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[e] Then the Minister or Clerks, going to the Lord's Table, &c.] To impress this religious covenant still more deeply on the parties' minds, they are to go up and kneel at the steps of the altar, and then the office is finished with hymns, prayers, and exhortations. First, with hymns, or psalms; for since joy becomes a marriage, instead of the heathens' looser songs, Christians are to rejoice in psalms, James v. 13. And here are two very proper ones chosen; 1. the 128th Psalm, which was composed at first to be an Epithalamium, and is used in this office, both in the Eastern and Western churches, because it contains the blessings publick and private which attend piety in the state of marriage. 2. The 67th Psalm is sometimes used, being a prayer for the blessing promised in the former

For thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands : O well is thee, and happy shalt thou be.

Thy wife shall be as the fruitful vine : upon the walls of thine house ;

Thy children like the olive-branches : round about thy table.

Lo, thus shall the man be blessed : that feareth the Lord.

The Lord from out of Sion shall so bless thee : that thou shalt see Jerusalem in prosperity all thy life long;

Yea, that thou shalt see thy children's children : and peace upon Israel.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

¶ Or this Psalm.

Deus misereatur. Psalm lxvii.

GOD be merciful unto us, and bless us : and shew us the light of his countenance, and be merciful unto us.

That thy way may be known upon earth : thy saving health among all nations.

Let the people praise thee, O God : yea, let all the people praise thee.

O let the nations rejoice and be glad : for thou shalt judge the folk righteously, and govern the nations upon earth.

Let the people praise thee, O God : yea, let all the people praise thee.

Then shall the earth bring forth her increase : and God, even our own God, shall give us his blessing.

God shall bless us : and all the ends of the world shall fear him.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

¶ The Psalm ended[t], and the Man and the Woman kneeling before the Lord's Table, the Priest standing at the Table, and turning his face towards them, shall say, Psalm ; and the argument used to obtain it is taken from the glory, which God will gain thereby. Dean Comber.

[t] The Psalm ended, &c.] To the foregoing acts of praise we add "supplications and prayers," introducing them with that ancient form, "Lord, have mercy upon us," and the "Lord's Prayer," which sanctifies and makes way for all the rest; to which are annexed "the supplications," chosen out of the Psalms, and put into the form of responses, that the friends here assembled may all shew their love to the parties by publickly joining in them. Dean Comber.

[g] O God of Abraham, &c.] After the versicles and responses follow three prayers, to be used by the minister alone ; the first being a prayer for spiritual blessings ; the second for the temporal blessing of children, which is the chief end of marriage, and which is the blessing that God pronounced at first to Adam and Eve, and which all mankind hath ever since wished to new-married persons, and which is therefore always to be asked at the solemnization of a marriage, except the advanced age of the persons make our prayers unlikely to prevail, in which case our rubrick has therefore ordered it to be omitted. The last prayer is made for the accomplishing of those duties which are aptly signified and implied by marriage. Wheatly.

The third Collect is of greater antiquity than either of the preceding. The introductory part resembles the prayer of Tobias, Tobit viii. 6; and the substance of many of the clauses is found in the Greek Euchology, and the Sacramentary of Gregory the Great. It beseeches God to grant, that the man and woman may perform those duties, which, agreeably to the writer of the chief of the epistolary part of the New Testament, the holy estate of Matrimony mystically represents: that the man may love his wife, according to the command of God and the example of Christ; and that the woman may be loving, faithful, amiable, and obedient. It concludes with a request for both, that they may enjoy temporal blessings and everlasting felicity. Shepherd.

[h] Then shall the Priest say, &c.] Last of all there is added a blessing, the words of which have an evident respect to the prayer immediately foregoing; which was offered up upon such excellent grounds, and with so very great a probability of success, that the priest may boldly venture to pronounce and ensure it to the parties, if they are but duly prepared to receive it. Wheatly.

All the ancient Christian forms have several sorts of blessing, according to the several parts of the office; and since it hath been usual to take leave with a blessing at the parting, Gen. xlvii. 10; 2 Chron. xxx. 27; our Church placeth this in the conclusion of the office, following herein the example of other liturgics. Dean Comber.

[1] After which, if there be no Sermon &c.] The office is concluded with exhortations taken out of holy Scripture. For the married persons having mutually engaged to live together "according to God's holy ordinance," that is, according to those laws which He has ordained in his word: it is very necessary they should hear and know what those laws are which they have engaged to perform. It was God's own command, that the kings of Israel should have a copy of the law delivered to them at their coronation; Deut. xvii. 18, 19; 2 Kings xi. 12: and there is the same reason to give this abstract to those that have taken upon themselves the state of Matrimony. For which reason, instead of the Epistle and Gospel used in the offices of the Greek and Roman churches, here is a full collection of the duties of both parties, drawn from the Epistles of two their wives, and wives towards their husbands.

Saint Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians, the fifth Chapter, doth give this commandment to all married men; Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water, by the Word; that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy, and without blemish. So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself: for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church; for we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife; and they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the Church. Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself.

Likewise the same Saint Paul, writing to the Colossians, speaketh thus to all men that are married; Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.

Hear also what Saint Peter, the Apostle of Christ, who was himself a married man, saith unto them that are married; Ye husbands, dwell with your wives according to knowledge; giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers be not hindered.

Hitherto ye have heard the duty of the husband toward the wife. Now, likewise, ye wives, hear and learn your duties toward your husbands, even as it is plainly set forth in holy Scripture.

Saint Paul, in the aforenamed Epistle to the Ephesians, teacheth you thus; Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church: and he is the Saviour of the body. Therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing. And again he saith, Let the wife see that she reverence her husband.

And in his Epistle to the Colossians, Saint Paul giveth you this short lesson; Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

Saint Peter also doth instruct you very well, thus saying; Ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the Word, they also may without the Word be won by the conversation of the wives; while they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible; even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, ordained themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands; even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord; whose daughters ye are as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

¶ It is convenient that the new-married persons should receive the holy Communion[k] at the time of their Marriage, or at the first opportunity after their Marriage.

great apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, in imitation of the practice of the primitive church, which, always after the celebration of a marriage, exhorted the parties to keep their matrimonial vow inviolate. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[k] It is convenient that the new-married persons should receive the holy Communion &c.] The rubrick here advises the persons who are married to receive the holy Communion, either that day, as the ancient usage was, or as soon after as is possible, in order to confirm their vow to each other by that blessed sacrament, and to bind themselves more strictly to their several duties; which prudent and pious use hath of later years been banished by those unchristian and vain revels which are so generally the conclusion of this religious rite, that the persons scarce have any serious thoughts of the vow they have made, or the duties they have promised. Dean Comber

Such religious solemnities, as these or some of these, which are appointed by the Church, were used by the Jews at marriages. The primitive Christians had all these which we have. The persons to be married were contracted by the priest; the marriage was solemnly pronounced in the church; the married couple were blessed by the priest; prayers and thanksgivings were used, and the holy Communion administered to them. And it is said that these religious rites the Church received from the apostles. And doubtless highly Christian and useful these solemnities are: for, first, they beget and nourish in the minds of men a reverend esteem of this holy mystery, Eph. v. 32; and draw them to a greater conscience of wedlock, and to esteem the bond thereof a thing which cannot without impiety be dissolved. Then are they great helps to the performance of those duties, which God Almighty hath required in married persons; which are so many, and those so weighty, that whosoever duly considers them, and makes a conscience of performing them, must think it needful to make use of all those means of grace, which God Almighty hath appointed. For if we duly consider the great love and charity, that this holy state requires, even to the laying down of life; "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it," Eph. v. 25: or the weighty charge of the education of children, which, if well performed, procures a blessing, and an advantage to salvation, 1 Tim. ii. 15, "She shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity," &c. so if it be carelessly performed, it procures a most heavy curse, 1 Sam. ii. 29. 31, &c.: or, lastly, the chastity and holiness necessary to that state of marriage, heightened now up to the representation of the mystical union of Christ with his church, Eph. v. 32, "This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and the Church;" to which holy conjunction our marriage, and all our works and affections in the same, should correspond and be conformable; I say, if we consider all these duly, can we think, we may spare any of those divine helps to performance; whether they be vows and holy promises to bind us, or our father's and mother's, God's, and the Church's blessings, or holy prayers for God's assistance; or lastly the holy Communion, that great strengthener of the soul? If men's vices and licentiousness have made this holy service seem unseasonable at this time; reason would, that they should labour to reform their lives, and study to be capable of this holy service; and not that the Church should forbear admonishing them to receive the holy Communion for their unspeakable good. For would men observe God's and the Church's admonitions, and enter into this holy state like Christians, with these religious solemnities, the happiness would be greater than can easily be expressed. "I know not," saith Tertullian, "which way I should be able to shew the happiness of that wedlock, the knot whereof the Church doth fasten, and the sacrament of the Church confirm." Bp. Sparrow.

THE ORDER FOR THE

VISITATION OF THE SICK[1].

¶ When any person is sick, notice shall be given thereof to the Minister of the Parish: who, coming into the sick person's house, shall say[m],

[1] The Order for the Visitation of the Sick.] In so uncertain a world where sickness sometimes interrupts the very joys of marriage, it is no wonder that this sad office should be placed next to matrimony: for all people in all conditions, of all ages and sexes, are subject to diseases continually: so that when any person falls sick, those that are in health must "remember them, as being themselves also in the body," Heb. xiii. 3, and liable to the same calamities; and all Christians are commanded to visit their neighbours in this estate, and are promised they shall be rewarded by God for so doing, Ps. xli. 1, 2; Matt. xxv. 34. 36; James i. 27; Ecclus. vii. 35. And in the primitive times they were famous for this piece of charity. But it is especially the duty of the clergy "to visit the sick," a duty instituted and enjoined by God Himself; "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him," James v. 14, 15. In which words (being the original and foundation of this office) we may note, first, that the duty is enjoined by divine authority, and therefore it is not barely a point of civility, but an act of religion, and a necessary duty which God requires from us. Secondly, the time to perform it is, "when any are sick among us;" for then the parties have most need of comfort, advice, and prayers to support them and procure help for them, as also to prepare them for their last and great account: and then these religious exercises will do us most good, because sickness embitters the world and endears heaven to us, making us pray devoutly, and hearken willingly to holy advice; so that this happy opportunity must not be lost: nor may it be deferred till the sick persons be very weak and nigh to death, for then they are incapable either to join in the office, or to receive the main benefits thereof; and the word in St. James is, "if any be infirm," ver. 14; to note, this should be done in the beginning of sickness, and not put off till the physicians give men over. Thirdly, As to the manner of performing this duty; First, The sick man (or his friends) must "send for the priest," who else may either not know of his sickness, or when it may be seasonable to visit; and if he come unsent for, it is more than he is obliged to do: but yet it is an act of great charity, because God requires the elders of the Church shall do this duty. The sick man must pray for himself, ver. 13; and his neighbours may pray with him and for him, ver. 16; but neither of these sufficeth, he must send for the minister besides, who, now the Church is settled, lives not far from him, and he is most able to give counsel, and most likely to prevail, because God requires him to perform this office, which is described in St. James, 1. By "praying over him," that is, besides him in the house where he lies sick. And since God enjoins prayer shall be made, and doth not prescribe the form; as all other churches have made proper forms, so hath ours also composed this, which is the most full and useful office on this occasion extant in the world. 2. In St. James's time, and as long as the miraculous gift of healing continued, they "anointed the sick with oil also in the name of Jesus," not to convey any grace to the soul, (as the Papists now pretend to do by their extreme unction, lately made a sacrament,) but to work a miraculous cure, which was the usual effect in those ages. But the power and gift being now ceased, the reformed churches left off the oil, which was the sign, because the thing signified was now taken away. But yet we retain all the substantial parts of this office. 3. Here are by St. James set down "the benefits" which may be obtained by it, which are annexed to the "prayer of faith," the part which is not ceremonial, and which continues still as the benefits also shall do, namely, This shall be a means "to save the sick;" and more particularly, 1. "The Lord shall raise him up," that is, if God see that health be good for him, the devout peforming of this office shall contribute to his recovery: or, 2. However (because men are mortal and must die at some time) it shall be a means "to procure forgiveness" of the sins he "hath committed;" not the priest only will absolve him upon his penitent confession, but God will seal his pardon, and then, whether life or death follow, the man shall be happy. Wherefore as we love our friends, or our own souls, all care must be taken that this necessary and profitable office be not neglected. The method of performing which in this church may be thus described: The usual office contains, 1. Supplications to avert evil in "the salutation and short Litany." 2. Prayers to procure good things in "the Lord's Prayer and the two Collects." 3. Exhortations prescribed in the "large form of Exhortation:" and directions in the rubrick, to advise the sick man "to forgive" freely, "to give" liberally, "to do justice" in settling his estate, and "to confess his sins" humbly and ingenuously unto God's minister now with him. 4. Consolations in the "Absolution, the Prayer" to God to confirm it, in "the 71st Psalm," and the concluding "Benedictions."

Secondly, There are added, 1. "Extraordinary prayers for a sick child, for one past recovery, for a dying person," and "for one troubled in conscience." 2. The manner of administering "the Communion" to the sick. Dean Comber.

As to the form of prayer to be used on this occasion,

Luke x. 5. PEACE be to this house, and to all that dwell in it.

¶ When he cometh into the sick man's presence he shall say, kneeling down,

REMEMBER not, Lord, our iniquities, nor the iniquities of our forefathers: Spare us, good Lord, spare thy people, whom thou hast redeemed with thy most precious blood, and be not angry with us for ever.

Answ. Spare us, good Lord.

¶ Then the Minister shall say,

Let us pray.
Lord, have mercy upon us[n].
Christ, have mercy upon us.
Lord, have mercy upon us.

OUR Father[o], which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

Minister. O Lord, save thy servant;

Answ. Which putteth his trust in thee. Ps. lxxxvi. 2.

Minister. Send him help from thy holy place; Ps. xx. 1, 2.

Answer. And evermore mightily defend him.

Minister. Let the enemy have no advantage of him; Ps. lxxxix. 23. O. T.

Answer. Nor the wicked approach to hurt him.

Minister. Be unto him, O Lord, a strong tower, Ps. lxi. 3.

Answer. From the face of his enemy.

Minister. O Lord, hear our prayers.

Answer. And let our cry come unto thee. Ps. cii. 1.

it is left to the prudence of the Church: since God hath only in general ordered prayers to be made, but not prescribed any particular words, therefore several churches have made and used several forms proper for the occasion. The Greek church hath a very large office in their Euchologion; which seems to have been much corrupted by the superstitious additions of later ages, though some of the ancient prayers may yet be discerned there. The most ancient of the Western church are those which bear the names of St. Ambrose and St. Gregory; and that which Cardinal Bona cites with this title, "Pro infirmis," written about 900 (1040) years ago, and supposed to be part of the old Gallican service. And upon the Reformation the several Protestant churches had their several forms, which are in use among them at this day. But this office of the Church of England may be thought to excel all that are now extant in the world: and it exactly agrees with the method of the primitive visitation of the sick in St. Chrysostom's time. Dean Comber.

[m] —who, coming into the sick person's house, shall say, &c.] When the priest enters the sick man's house, he salutes all that are in it, with that phrase which our Lord ordered his disciples to use when they went to cure both souls and bodies, Luke x. 5, "Peace be to this house;" which is a pious wish, for the health and prosperity of all "that dwell in it," and Christ hath promised it shall have its effect, and prove a real blessing. And because the litany is the proper office for averting evil, all of it should be used here, only in consideration of the parties' weakness, one petition is taken out of it, wherein we beg of God (who for our sins lays sickness on us) "not to remember our iniquities, nor those of our forefathers," which we have made ours by imitating them; but to "spare us" even from temporal judgments, because Christ hath "redeemed us with his precious blood:" however we intreat Him to deliver us from eternal death, and "not to be angry with us for ever." To which all that are present, as suffering, or deserving to suffer, say, "Spare us, good Lord." And as all those who came to Jesus of old to be healed, used to cry, "Lord, have mercy on us," so do we here on the like occasion supplicate the whole Trinity for mercy, in that ancient form, called the lesser litany, of which we spake before. See page 33, note v. Dean Comber.

[n] Lord, have mercy upon us, &c.] This seems to be the proper petition for miserable persons; for those sick and distressed creatures, that came to Jesus for help, did generally address themselves to Him in these words. "Have mercy on us" was the prayer of the two blind men, Matt. xx. 30; ix. 27: and the woman of Canaan, with the father of the lunatick, used the same supplication, Matt. xv. 22; xvii. 15; and since it prevailed with our Lord in his humiliation to pity, heal, and help those who used it there; we may with more comfort send it up to Him now in his exaltation. The whole Catholick church hath ever esteemed it very fit for this purpose, in that it is so early found in the Western, and so often repeated in the Eastern offices for the sick. Dean Comber.

[o] Our Father, &c.] After we have prayed against evil, we proceed to petition for good, beginning, after the example of both the Latin and Greek churches, with the "Lord's Prayer," which ought to be joined with all our prayers, especially these for the sick; for many of the petitions do well agree to that estate: herein the afflicted party may shew his love of God by desiring his "name may be hallowed;" his desires of heaven, by wishing "his kingdom may come;" and his submission to the divine pleasure, by praying "his will may be done:" herein he may beg earthly comforts, in asking for his "daily bread;" he may crave pardon for what is past, in beseeching God to "forgive his trespasses;" and express his charity, by declaring he "forgives" them that "trespass against him:" herein he may testify his resolutions to amend, by requesting he may not "be led into temptation;" and procure freedom from the punishment of sin, by praying to be "delivered from evil." In which necessary petitions all present must join with the priest and the sick person, as also in the responses which follow, taken out of David's Psalms. Dean Comber.

[p] O Lord, look down &c.] That which hath been more briefly desired in the responses, is now collected into two larger prayers, thence rightly called Collects. The first of which is for support under the affliction; the second, either for removing the affliction, or however for sanctifying it. Dean Comber.

The last of these prayers was shorter before the last review. It then contained instances borrowed from the Roman offices; which, being examples of miraculous cures, such as are not now to be expected, were prudently left out, and supplied with some other more suitable petitions. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[q] — look down from heaven, &c.] Though God dwell in heaven, yet He hath commanded his people in their trouble to cry unto Him, and desire Him to "look down" from thence, Deut. xxvi. 15; Isa. lxiii. 15. Wherefore we call on Him, from heaven to "behold" this servant of his, yea, to come to "visit and relieve him," or else our visiting him is vain. Dean Comber.

The introduction to this Collect is found very anciently in the offices of the Greek or Latin church: but God Himself also instructed the Jews in Moses's time to pray so; Deut. xxvi. 15: and the use of the form continued for many ages in the Jewish church, Isa. lxiii. 5. Solomon also was assured, that, when sickness was upon the people, if they called upon God, He would "hear them in heaven his dwelling-place," 1 Kings viii. 37—39; ix. 3. So that the Church had good reason to transcribe this piece of sacred devotion into the present office. Dean Comber.

[r] — defend him from the danger of the enemy,] Faith and confidence in God is the only shield to secure the sick man from Satan's darts, Eph. vi. 16. And if this fail not, Luke xxii. 32, though he may be tempted and assaulted, he shall not be overcome. There is "danger" that this "enemy" may now tempt him, if he have lived carelessly, to despair; if piously, to presumption; if he be weak, to impatience; if he be wavering, to unbelief; if he be worldly, by unwillingness to die; if he be secure to defer his repentance: but we pray that God will preserve him from "the danger," and mischief, of consenting to any of these temptations, and make him trust firmly in his mercy, and see clearly his own unworthiness; bear patiently what he hath so justly deserved; hold fast his good principles, and be very willing to die if God pleaseth, and very diligent while he lives to repent sincerely; so shall he be "kept perpetually" in "peace and safety," his mind shall be in quiet, and his outward condition safe; this therefore we beg, "through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." Dean Comber.

[s] Sanctify, we beseech thee, &c.] The sufferer and his weaker friends may perhaps only desire present ease and restoration to health; but since health itself would not be a mercy, till the correction had effected that good end for which God sent it, we first pray, That he will "sanctify it to him," so as it may make him penitent and devout, humble and holy; for we know it is not the stroke of an enemy designing present destruction, but a "fatherly correction," for he hath time given him, and is yet sensible of his condition; we pray therefore "that the sense of his weakness" and extreme danger may make him take faster hold of God's mercy, (so absolutely necessary now,) and "add strength to his faith and seriousness to his repentance," that he may perform it thoroughly and sincerely now, since this may be the last opportunity that ever he will have to judge himself before he come to God's judgment-seat; or if he have a longer time, this sickness cannot end well, whether it he in life or death, without this unfeigned repentance. Dean Comber.

[t] Then shall the Minister exhort the sick person &c.] It is a part of a minister's office to exhort, as well as to pray for his people, and that not only in time of health, but also in sickness, 1 Thess. v. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 2: for then they stand in most need of directions, and are then most likely to follow wholesome advice. The Church therefore, being unwilling to lose so likely an opportunity of doing good, when the sufferings of the patient make him tender and tractable, hath drawn up a proper and pious exhortation, to improve that happy temper for his soul's salvation. The form here prescribed exactly agrees with the heads of exhortation, which the priest was ordered to use to the sick by an ancient council above eight hundred years ago. It consists first of "instructions," concerning the author of afflictions, the ends for which they are sent, the manner how we are to bear them, and the benefits of improving them. And here, "if the person be very sick, the curate may end his exhortation."

But if his distemper will allow him to proceed, the minister is to admonish and stir him up to the practice of those virtues which are now especially needful: such as, in the first place, is "patience;" since, till his mind is made calm, it is in vain to press him either to faith or repentance. For which reason this second part of the exhortation we are speaking of endeavours to cheer up the spirits of the sick, by proper arguments, precepts, and examples.

DEARLY beloved, know this, that Almighty God is the Lord of life and death, and of all things to them pertaining, as youth, strength, health, age, weakness, and sickness. Wherefore, whatsoever your sickness is, know you certainly, that it is God's visitation. And for what cause soever this sickness is sent unto you; whether it be to try your patience for the example of others, and that your faith may be found in the day of the Lord, laudable, glorious, and honourable, to the increase of glory and endless felicity; or else it be sent unto you to correct and amend in you whatsoever doth offend the eyes of your heavenly Father; know you certainly, that if you truly repent you of your sins, and bear your sickness patiently, trusting in God's mercy, for his dear Son Jesus Christ's sake, and render unto him humble thanks for his fatherly visitation, submitting yourself wholly unto his will, it shall turn to your profit, and help you forward in the right way that leadeth unto everlasting life.

¶ If the person visited be very sick, then the Curate may end his exhortation in this place, or else proceed.

TAKE therefore in good part the chastisement of the Lord: For (as Saint Paul saith in the twelfth Chapter to the Hebrews) whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons. Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh, which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. These words, good brother, are written in holy Scripture for our comfort and instruction; that we should patiently, and with thanksgiving, bear our heavenly Father's correction, whensoever by any manner of adversity it shall please his gracious goodness to visit us. And there should be no greater comfort to Christian persons, than to be made like unto Christ, by suffering patiently adversities, troubles, and sicknesses. For he himself went not up to joy, but first he suffered pain; he entered not into his glory before he was crucified. So truly our way to eternal joy is to suffer here with Christ; and our door to enter into eternal life is gladly to die with Christ; that we may rise again from death, and dwell with him in everlasting life. Now therefore, taking your sickness, which is thus profitable for you, patiently, I exhort you, in the Name of God, to remember the profession which you made unto God in your Baptism. And forasmuch as after this life there is an account to be given unto the righteous Judge, by whom all must be judged, without respect of persons, I require you to examine yourself and your estate, both toward God and man; so that, accusing and condemning yourself for your own faults, you may find mercy at our heavenly Father's hand for Christ's sake, and not be accused and condemned in that fearful judgement. Therefore I shall rehearse to you the Articles of our Faith, that you may know whether

And now, being in hopes that his mind is composed, the minister proceeds to give him such advice as is proper for one that is preparing for death. And since at his baptism he made a solemn vow to God, which he promised to keep all the days of his life; it is fit he should examine, now the end of his life may probably draw near, how he has performed and discharged that promise. And because one part of his vow was, "to believe all the articles of the Christian faith," therefore the priest particularly inquires into the sick man's belief. For to doubt of, or deny any of these articles, is declared to be a dangerous and damnable state. It is to forsake the faith into which he was baptized: and what else is this but to cut himself off from all the privileges and advantages to which his baptism intitled him? For which reason it is necessary that our brother should shew that he has kept his faith entire, that so we may be satisfied that he dies a sound member of the Catholick church, out of which no salvation can ordinarily be obtained. Wheatly.

you do believe as a Christian man should, or no.

¶ Here the Minister shall rehearse the Articles of the Faith[x], saying thus,

DOST thou believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth?

And in Jesus Christ his only-begotten Son our Lord? And that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary; that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; that he went down into hell, and also did rise again the third day; that he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; and from thence shall come again at the end of the world, to judge the quick and the dead?

And dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholick Church; the Communion of Saints; the Remission of sins; the Resurrection of the flesh; and everlasting Life after death?

¶ The sick person shall answer,

All this I stedfastly believe.

¶ Then shall the Minister examine[y] whether he repent him truly of his sins[z], and be in charity with all the world[a], exhorting him

[x] Here the Minister shall rehearse the Articles of the Faith, &c.] In the office of Sarum, the sick person, instead of being examined upon the Apostles' Creed, was interrogated upon the abstruser articles of faith: as the indivisibility of the Persons in the divine essence; the coequality of the Son; and the consubstantiality both of the Son and the Holy Ghost; the procession of the Holy Ghost both from the Father and the Son, &c. Which, tending to perplex the more unknowing Christians, were deservedly in our Reformation omitted. Dr. Nicholls.

This examination concerning the faith of the person, whether it be Christian, is very necessary: for, if that be wrong, all is wrong. Christian religion consists in these two: a right faith, and a righteous life: and as a right faith without a righteous life will not save, so neither will a righteous life, without a right belief. He that hath said, "Do this, and live," hath said, "Believe, and live:" and how can we think him safe, that lives indeed justly, but blasphemes impiously? This then is a principal interrogatory, or question to be put to the sick person, whether he believes as a Christian ought to do? And this the minister does by rehearsing to him the Creed. And there can be no better rule to try it by: for whatsoever was prefigured in the patriarchs, or taught in the Scriptures, or foretold by the prophets, concerning God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is all briefly contained in the Apostles' Creed. The ancient fathers say, "This Creed is the touchstone to try true faith from false; the rule of faith, contrary to which no man may teach or believe." "This the Catholick church received from the apostles. Holding this rule, we shall be able to convince all hereticks whatsoever, that they departed from the truth." Bp. Sparrow.

It hath been an ancient practice to propound these articles to dying Christians. The Roman church hath devised two new forms, one consisting of fourteen articles, the other somewhat briefer; but both leavened with their own novel errors, and much differing from the Apostles' Creed. But this Church uses no other form, but that into which we were baptized; wherein we agree with all other Protestants, it having been a custom to repeat this Creed to the most famous German reformers on their death-beds. Dean Comber.

[y] Then shall the Minister examine &c.] The former instructions, exhortations, and advice agree to all sick persons, and therefore are prescribed in a "set form:" but because of the great variety of men's cases and tempers in time of sickness, the Church leaves it to the discretion of the minister who visits, to assist and direct them in other matters as he sees the particular case requires: only in the rubrick here are some general things described. Dean Comber.

[z] — whether he repent him truly of his sins,] The first direction given (which was added at the last review) is, that the "minister shall examine whether he repent him truly of his sins." For it is very certain that all have sinned, Rom. iii. 23; and consequently, that all have need of repentance: and therefore before the minister can give the sick man comfort upon any good grounds, it is fit that he should be satisfied of the truth of his repentance. Wheatly.

And if he find the sick person hath examined slightly, or is not very sensible of the number, nature, and desert of his sins, not heartily grieved for them, or not stedfastly resolved (if he recover) to amend his life: the priest must impartially tell him the danger of dying in that impenitent state, and labour to bring him to repentance now, or else he must perish for ever. God's minister must not fear any man's anger, or destroy him by concealing this necessary though unpleasing truth from him: and every man ought to give his spiritual physician leave to be plain and impartial, since his own salvation depends upon it. Dean Comber.

[a] — and be in charity with all the world, &c.] In the next place he is to consider, "whether he be in charity with all the world, exhorting him to forgive, from the bottom of his heart, all persons that have offended him." For there is not any duty more enforced in the Gospel, than that of brotherly reconciliation, or forgiving of injuries, which even in the prayer that our Lord has taught us is made the condition of God's forgiving us. The example therefore of our Lord and his first martyr St. Stephen, who prayed for their murderers at the very instant of their death, should always be considered upon these occasions. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," Luke xxiii. 34; and, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," Acts vii. 60: which were their dying words, should always be ours. For sure it is high time for men to forget their resentments against their neighbours, when they are just going to answer for their own misdoings: especially when we are taught so plainly by our Saviour, that, unless we have compassion on our fellow-servants, our Lord will exact from us all that we owe to Him, and will deliver us over to the tormentors till we shall have paid what is due, Matt. xviii. 23, &c.

But besides the sick person's forgiving those that have offended him, "if he has offended any other, he to forgive, from the bottom of his heart, all persons that have offended him; and if he hath offended any other, to ask them forgiveness; and where he hath done injury or wrong to any man, that he make amends to the uttermost of his power[b]. And if he hath not before disposed of his goods[c], let him then be admonished to make his Will[d], and to declare his Debts, what he oweth, and what is owing unto him; for the better discharging of his conscience, and the quietness of his Executors. But men should often be put in remembrance to take order for the settling of their temporal estates, whilst they are in health.

¶ These words before rehearsed may be said before the Minister begin his Prayer, as he shall see cause.

¶ The Minister should not omit earnestly to move[e] such sick persons as are of ability to be liberal to the poor.

¶ Here shall the sick person be moved to make must ask them forgiveness; and where he hath done injury or wrong to any man, he must also make amends to the uttermost of his power." For he who refuses to do this is not a penitent for the injury he has done, but would certainly do more, if he had time and opportunity; and therefore he can expect nothing but condemnation from that Judge, who knows the tendency and temper of his mind. Our Lord, we know, did not receive Zaccheus into the number of his followers or disciples, till he had made profession of his willingness to restore, Luke xix. 8: who then can expect to be received into his kingdom, that refuses so necessary a part of justice? Since therefore the sick person may now, for what he knows, be going to appear before the Judge of all the world, from whom "he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, without respect of persons," Col. iii. 25: how much doth it concern him to "agree with his adversary while he is yet in the way with him, lest afterwards the adversary deliver him to the judge, and the judge deliver him to the officer, and so he be cast into prison, from whence he shall by no means come out till he has paid the uttermost farthing." Matt. v. 25, 26. So necessary is it even for those, who but suspect themselves of any wrongful deed, to judge and examine themselves with all possible strictness, and by publick acknowledgments and tender of satisfaction to declare their unfeigned and hearty repentance. Wheatly.

[b] — that he make amends to the uttermost of his power.] By "the uttermost of his power," is not meant, that he must give to the injured person all his estate, nor that he must restore fourfold for injuries done; (which was required in some cases under Moses's law, by way of punishment, rather than satisfaction;) but that he be careful to the uttermost of his power, that the person injured be so repaired, that he be no loser by him; which is all that by the law of justice, which commands to give every man his due, is required, Ezek. xxxiii. 14, 15. "When I say to the wicked, he shall surely die: if he turn from his sin, if he restore the pledge, give again that he hath robbed," (it is not, if he restore fourfold, but if he restore that he hath robbed,) "he shall surely live." Bp. Sparrow.

[c] — And if he hath not before disposed of his goods, &c.] After the exercise of these two branches of charity, should follow the third, namely, that of giving to the poor: but before the sick man be exhorted to this, it is necessary that he should know what is his own to give. For which reason, "if he has not before disposed of his goods, he is then to be admonished to make his will, and to declare his debts, what he oweth, and what is owing unto him, for the better discharging of his conscience and the quietness of his executors." And though the making of a will be a secular matter, which does not relate to those spiritual concerns which the minister comes to the sick man about; yet, since the affairs of intestates are generally left in so confused a manner, that strifes and contests are often the result, it is very prudently enjoined by our Church, that the minister should remind them of settling their affairs. "Men indeed should often be put in remembrance, to take order for the settling of their temporal estates whilst they are in health:" for no man is sure but that he may be taken off suddenly, without having time to perform it; or though he may be seized with a lingering disease, yet it may be such a one as may incapacitate him from doing it. Or supposing the best, that he may have timely notice or warning of his death, and his understanding hold good and perfect to the last; yet sure it must be a disturbance to a dying man, to have those moments taken up in ordering and disposing of his worldly affairs, which ought to be employed in preparing him for eternity. However, if our carelessness has deferred it till then, it must by no means be omitted now. We must not leave our friends and relations involved in endless suits and contentions; none of our family must be left unprovided for, through our neglect of assigning their portion; nor must our creditors be defrauded of their just demands, for want of our clearing or declaring our debts. If in any of these cases our last act be unjust, we leave a blot upon our name in this world, and can expect nothing but a sad doom in the next.

For this reason the Church makes it a part of the minister's care. And by an ancient constitution made in the year 1236, people were forbid to make their wills without the presence of the parish-priest, as they desired that their wills might be fulfilled. However, if the minister think this a matter of too secular a nature to be mingled with his discourses concerning his spiritual concerns, he is allowed to manage and dispatch this first before he begins the holy office. For that is the intent of the following rubrick, which allows, that "the words before rehearsed may be said before the minister begin his prayer, as he shall see cause." Which, if compared with King Edward's Common Prayer Books, plainly refers to the man's disposal of his goods; against which part of the direction the contents of this rubrick are printed in the margin. Wheatly.

[d] — to make his Will.] As by the law of nature every one has a right to his goods, which he has acquired by his industry, so he has a right to dispose of them, either in his life by sale or gift, or at his death by will. The usage of making wills at or before death has obtained in all nations, and is as old as any history reaches. We find in the book of Genesis, that Abraham, in case that he had no child, made Eliezer of Damascus, the steward of his house, his heir by will, Gen. xv. 2. Now though the making of a will be a secular matter, which doth not relate to those spiritual concerns, about which the minister comes to the sick man; yet, considering that the affairs of intestates are generally left in so confused a manner, that great strifes and contests are raised in families upon that occasion, and some branches of the family left unprovided for; it is very prudently enjoined by the Church, that the minister should remind every one of settling his affairs before he dies, as he would avoid not only the loss of his effects in expensive lawsuits, but chiefly that he may not occasion the disunion of the affections of his dearest relations. Dr. Nicholls.

[e] The Minister should not omit earnestly to move &c.] The man's affairs being now settled, the minister, in the next place, is "not to omit earnestly to move him, if he be of ability, to be liberal to the poor." By the old canon law every one was obliged to leave such a proportion of his goods or estate to charitable uses, as he bequeathed to each of his children. This moiety, which belonged to the Church, was laid up by the bishop for the maintenance of the clergy, the repair of the fabrick, and the like. But we are only enjoined to put the rich in mind of the poor, that out of the abundance, which they are going to leave, they should bestow some liberal largess on them. And indeed, of all our treasures, that alone which we thus dispose of is laid up in store for ourselves. Our good works are our only moveables that shall follow us to the grave: and therefore there is no time more seasonable for them than sickness, when we are preparing to be gone. Wheatly.

The minister "may not forget to move the sick person," and that most earnestly, "to liberality towards the poor." "This is to have mercy upon our own souls," says St. Augustin, or "to make Christ our heir." For when the poor receive from us, Christ stands by, and reaches out his hand to receive with them. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of these little ones, ye have done it to me," Matt. xxv. 40. And as it is always necessary to be put in mind of this duty, so especially at this time of sickness: for then "we are failing," and therefore most necessary it is then, to "make friends of the unrighteous mammon, that, when" we fail, "they may receive us into everlasting habitations," Luke xvi. 9. Then we are going to give up our account to God; and therefore then most necessary it is, to do the best we can, to procure a gracious absolution at the day of judgment. Now nothing seems more powerful with God, to procure that, than liberality to the poor: "Come, ye blessed; for I was hungry, and ye gave me meat," Matt. xxv. 34, 35. Bp. Sparrow.

Say not, we must not think to merit heaven by almsdeeds. For though heaven be too glorious to be bought by them, (as we teach against the papists, 1 Pet. i. 18,) yet God hath promised to reward them in heaven who relieve the poor on earth, and gives heaven only to charitable men, Matt. xxv. 42: not for the merit of their charity, but of his free grace (as we teach against hypocritical and sordid protestants who pretend this only to save their purses): give therefore with assurance of reward. Dean Comber.

[f] Here shall the sick person be moved to make a special Confession of his sins, &c.] Lastly, the priest must advise the sick man "to confess those sins" which do most trouble his conscience. To confess our sins to a priest even in health is a pious and ancient custom, and not only a sign of repentance, but the best means for obtaining pardon and for amending our lives, and (though grossly abused by papists) is but too much neglected by protestants. But in sickness it may be still more useful to confess to the elders of the Church whom we have sent for, James v. 16. For if they be clearly told the case, they can better apply proper spiritual remedies, and will both pray more heartily for us, and may on better grounds absolve us. Dean Comber.

Our Church here having considered, that the consciences of most men are very tender under the fear of approaching death; that reflections on their former sins do then most sensibly affect them; and that withal many scruples do arise in their minds, either concerning some acts of injustice, which they may in the course of their lives have committed, and may be at a loss how to find out proper methods of restitution; or concerning some other sins of a more heinous nature, which they are not certain that they have pursued the most proper methods in repenting of: the Church, I say, upon these considerations has ordered, that the sick person, when he is visited by the minister, may be moved to make confession of such sins, as he finds trouble his conscience; to the end, that by the spiritual advice and comfort, which he may receive from the minister, his mind may be eased. Now it is to be observed, that our Church herein acts very differently from the church of Rome; for that church hath adjudged it "necessary by the divine law, to confess all and single mortal sins, which any one does remember or can recollect, by due and diligent premeditation." Our Church only orders persons to be moved to it: that church requires it, as necessary for the forgiveness of sins. Our Church motions special confession, with relation only to such sins, as disquiet the person's mind: that church absolutely demands it, upon account of all sins whatsoever. Our Church does this, only with a view of instructing and comforting the sick person: but the church of Rome anathematizes all them who say so: "If any one shall say, that confession is only profitable for the instruction and consolation of the penitent, let him be accursed." But, as the auricular confession of the papists, which they hold necessary for all penitents, and have enjoined to be performed by a particular enumeration of all sins which can be remembered, is a doctrine which was never known in the Christian world till very late ages of it; so the special confession of some very affecting sins, which disquiet the mind, to be made to the minister as a spiritual physician or counsellor, as our Church enjoins, was practised by the purest ages of Christianity, as we find from various passages in the writers of both the Latin and the Greek church. From all which it is manifest, that special confession is not required, absolutely as necessary for the forgiveness of sins; but is only advised, as our Church advises, for the penitent to receive the spiritual advice of the minister, for easing the conscience in some particular cases, and for the more profitable performing of repentance. Dr. Nicholls.

[g] — After which Confession, the Priest shall absolve him &c.] Having done all this to fit our penitent sick man for comfort, it is now time to dispense it, Job vi. 14. And since his first and greatest trouble is sin, our first comfort is to remove that by the Absolution, which St. James doth expressly require shall be given to a sick penitent after we have prayed over him, James v. 15, according to one translation of the passage, which is confirmed by the practice of the primitive church. And the primitive church by many canons took care, none that repented should die without it; for since it is certain Christ did leave such a power with his great mercy forgive thee thine offences: And by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

¶ And then the Priest shall say the Collect following[i].

James iv. 8. Ps. lxxxvi. 15. Heb. viii. 12 Eph. iv. 22—24.

Let us pray.

O Most merciful God, who, according to the multitude of thy mercies, doth so put away the sins of those who truly repent, that thou rememberest them no more; Open thine eye of mercy upon this thy servant, who most earnestly desireth pardon and forgiveness. Renew in him, most loving Father, whatsoever hath been decayed by the fraud and malice of the devil, or by his own carnal will and frailness; preserve and continue this sick member in the unity of the Church; 1 Thess. iii. 5. 2 Cor. ii. 11. 1 Pet. v. 8. Matt. xxvi. 41. Eph. iv. 3.

church, there is never more need to use it than now. Dean Comber.

Our Church here, in appointing the Absolution to be used for sick persons, has shewn a great deal of wisdom and moderation: neither laying aside an ancient usage, so very comfortable to the souls of men; nor yet retaining those corruptions, which the Romish church had introduced into it. For it must be observed, that our Church does not look upon the absolution of the priest to be absolutely necessary for the forgiveness of sins, as the church of Rome does: which, as being a part of the sacrament of penance, they hold necessary for the faithful, as often as they fall into sin after baptism. Our Church here, by the former part of the form of absolution, which is precatory, and by addressing Almighty God for pardon, declares that the priest does not act judicially and authoritatively: but the Romish church is of an opinion directly opposite to this; and has declared our sense of giving absolution heretical: "If any one shall say, that the sacramental absolution of the priest is not a judicial act, but barely a ministerial one, in declaring that the sins of the person who confesses are pardoned, &c. let him be accursed." Now this notion does betoken a great degree of arroganee in the maintainers of it, to think that God Almighty should divest Himself of his inherent right of forgiveness of sins, which, the Scripture says, belongs to Him alone, and confer it upon one of his creatures. But the constitution of the Church of England, in ordering the priest to pronounce the absolution ministerially, and to specify by whose authority he pronounces it; and withal, beginning the form with a prayer to invoke God's forgiveness, does with a due submission and humility recognise that omnipotent authority, on which it is founded. Dr. Nicholls. See the note from Bp Sparrow, p. 309, note p.

This form is very ancient; consisting now, as it did of old, of two parts: the one depreeative, the second indicative; the one entreating for pardon, the other dispensing it. Dean Comber.

Possibly this part of the office may seem to have ascribed so high a power to the minister, of absolving the sick from their sins, as may lead them into great mistakes. And it is indeed more liable to be so misunderstood, than the earlier forms, which were expressed in the manner of a prayer. But still all writers on the subject have agreed, that this absolution either was intended, which indeed is most probable, only to set persons free from any ecclesiastical censures, which they might have incurred: an indulgence, granted in every age of the Church to such as were dangerously ill, on their humble request; but which is no more pretended to make a change in their eternal state, than a pardon from the king is: or, if it means also to declare them restored to the favour of God, means it only on supposition of a sincere and thorough repentance; which being professed by them, it may be charitably presumed, though not certainly known, that it is real; and without which all persons are entreated to observe, no absolution here, granted by whomsoever or in what words soever, will do them the least good hereafter. Accordingly this form is not appointed ever to be used, but when the sick have made, by their own choice, "a special confession of some weighty matter, troubling their consciences, humbly and heartily desiring," that it may be used for their consolation. And as this is but seldom requested, and consequently the absolution seldom pronounced over any one; so whenever it is, it may and ought to be accompanied with such explanations, as will prevent any wrong constructions. Abp. Secker.

When we see good evidence, that the sick man is prepared to receive this grace, we give it him in God's name; and he ought to look on us but as the instruments to convey the pardon which Jesus gives. So the Church of England taught our forefathers to believe, as we read in "the institution of a Christian man;" "which words being spoken by the priest on earth, he ought to believe they shall be ratified in heaven, and that he is already freely pardoned for the merit of Christ's passion." The Absolution is only ministerially conveyed by the priest: but the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in whose name it is pronounced, do join in the confirmation thereof. Wherefore let the sick man value it highly, receive it with reverence, and hope for the blessed effect thereof. And let not the priest rashly cast this pearl before swine; nor presume to absolve those, whom he doth not believe to be truly penitent: for in so doing he abuses the power which God gave him; exceeds the bounds of his commission; and dangerously deceives the man whom he so unduly absolves. The obdurate must not have it, lest they presume; and the contrite must not want it, lest they despair: let it be prudently dispensed; and then there will be gained abundant satisfaction both to the giver and receiver. Dean Comber.

[h] Our Lord Jesus Christ,] Instead of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the form before the Reformation ran in the name of St. Peter. Which, being both superstitious and blasphemous, was well changed to the form that we now have. Dr. Nicholls.

[i] And then the Priest shall say the Collect following.] That this comfortable dispensing of remission may not want its due effect, we add a prayer after it, to beg of God to ratify our act, and to declare He hath done so by other visible testimonies of his favour; by renewing in the sick person the graces of faith, hope, devotion, and sincere obedience. There is such a prayer as this, anciently found in the Western service on this occasion; and another to the same effect in the Eastern Liturgy. Dean Comber.

In te, Domine, speravi. Psalm lxxi.

IN thee, O Lord, have I put my trust; let me never be put to confusion: but rid me, and deliver me in thy righteousness; incline thine ear unto me, and save me.

Be thou my strong hold, whereunto I may alway resort: thou hast promised to help me; for thou art my house of defence, and my castle.

Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the ungodly: out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man.

For thou, O Lord God, art the thing that I long for: thou art my hope, even from my youth.

Through thee have I been holden up ever since I was born: thou art he that took me out of my mother's womb; my praise shall alway be of thee.

I am become as it were a monster unto many: but my sure trust is in thee.

O let my mouth be filled with thy praise: that I may sing of thy glory and honour all the day long.

Cast me not away in the time of age: forsake me not when my strength faileth me.

For mine enemies speak against me, and they that lay wait for my soul take their counsel together, saying: God hath forsaken him, persecute him, and take him; for there is none to deliver him.

Go not far from me, O God: my God, haste thee to help me.

Let them be confounded and perish that are against my soul: let them be covered with shame and dishonour that seek to do me evil.

As for me, I will patiently abide alway: and will praise thee more and more.

My mouth shall daily speak of thy righteousness and salvation: for I know no end thereof.

I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God: and will make mention of thy righteousness only.

Thou, O God, hast taught me from my youth up till now: therefore will I tell of thy wondrous works.

Forsake me not, O God, in mine old age, when I am gray-headed: until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to all them that are yet for to come.

Thy righteousness, O God, is very high, and great things are they that thou hast done: O God, who is like unto thee?

Glory be to the Father, &c.

[k] Then shall the Minister say this Psalm.] After the sick person is absolved by the Church, and recommended to the pardon and grace of God, the minister is directed to use in his behalf the seventy-first Psalm; which is so very apt and proper to express the sick man's desires and wants, and at the same time to exercise his faith, to inflame his love, to uphold his patience, and revive his hope, that not only our own, but the Eastern, Western, and most churches in the world agree in the choice of it for this office. At the review at the Restoration indeed the five last verses were left out of our own, as supposing the person restored to his former state and prosperity, and so not being suitable to be used over one whose case is languishing and dangerous. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[l] Adding this, &c.] And now being for aught we know to take our last leave of our dear brother, we do it with giving him a solemn blessing at the parting, in which way the office is concluded as well in the Eastern as the Western church. The blessings concluding this service of our own Church are more and fuller than in any other place. They consist of three solemn forms. The first is directed to God the Son, principally designed to obtain pardon for sin by his death and passion. The second is a formal blessing in the name of God the Father, chiefly intended to procure the defence of his Providence. The last, which was added at the last review, and is a paraphrase on that divine form, Numb. vi. 24—26, is an address to the whole Trinity; wherein, that the sick person may be safe in life or death, "unto God's gracious mercy and protection," who is able to keep him from falling, and to present him spotless before his throne, "we commit him;"

¶ Then shall the Minister say,

THE Almighty Lord, who is a most strong tower to all them that put their trust in him, to whom all things in heaven, in earth, and under the earth, do bow and obey, be now and evermore thy defence; and make thee know and feel, that there is none other Name under heaven given to man, in whom, and through whom, thou mayest receive health and salvation, but only the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

Grant this, O Lord, for thy mercies' sake, in the same thy Son our Lord Jesus Christ, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen.

praying that God and the Father may "bless him" with all good, "and keep him" from all evil; that God the Son may look cheerfully on him "and be gracious to him" in the pardon of his sins; and that God the Holy Ghost may behold him favourably, "and give him" that sweet "peace" which will fill him with joy, and carry him through death to a glorious immortality, and will support him "now and evermore. Amen." Dean Comber.

[m] A Prayer for a sick child.] There is so much variety in the state of sickness, that it is impossible one form, though it were ever so complete, should be contrived to fit all particular occasions. As to those whose distemper lies chiefly in the body, and who are of an age that is capable of comfort and advice, and have also their senses and understandings entire, and faculties and time enough to exercise all the forementioned duties of religion; the former office is very suitable and proper. But there are singular cases which require peculiar prayers, and more indeed than it is easy to provide for in any stated forms: however, there are four which our Church took notice of at the last review, and for which therefore she hath provided four suitable prayers.

The first of these is "for a sick child:" in which case, as a fondness and love of the parents will direct them to use all human means for its recovery; so Christianity should instruct them to turn the violence of their passion into fervent addresses to Almighty God to help it. He gave it at first, and He only can preserve it: and it was the trust of the Shunammite in his power to save, that encouraged her to apply herself to the prophet Elisha, even when her son was actually dead, which procured for her a success as wonderful as her faith, 2 Kings iv. And though when Jairus went to Jesus for his dying child, the disease proved swifter than his utmost haste; yet our Lord rewarded the faith of the parent with the restoration of the daughter's life. Such miracles indeed we must not now expect; but yet if we seek the prayers of the Church with due humility and faith, there is no doubt but they will assist very much in the cure; and that, if any means can move God to spare them, this will. Wheatly.

[n] A Prayer for a sick person, when there appeareth small hope &c.] When the disease has almost got the victory of the sick, it is not to be expected that the man should do much on his part for the bettering of his future state. And therefore since (it is to be hoped) he hath already gone through the preparatory exercises of patience and submission, of faith and repentance, of thankfulness and charity; but is now rendered incapable of any other office; the minister must take care that at least he do not want such farther benefits as the Church has provided for him in this excellent form: which is also very proper to be used, when any sudden disease put a man beyond all hopes of recovery at the first assault; or when any, though visited with a lingering disease, have yet wretchedly deferred to send for a minister, till there is as little to more continually with thy grace and Holy Spirit in the inner man. Give him unfeigned repentance for all the errors of his life past, and stedfast faith in thy Son Jesus; that his sins may be done away by thy mercy, and his pardon sealed in heaven, before he go hence, and be no more seen. We know, O Lord, that there is no word impossible with thee; and that, if thou wilt, thou canst even yet raise him up, and grant him a longer continuance amongst us: Yet, forasmuch as in all appearance the time of his dissolution draweth near, so fit and prepare him, we beseech thee, against the hour of death, that after his departure hence in peace, and in thy favour, his soul may be received into thine everlasting kingdom, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, thine only Son, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

Wash it, we pray thee, in the blood of that immaculate Lamb, that was slain to take away the sins of the world; that whatsoever defilements it may have contracted in the midst of this miserable and naughty world, through the lusts of the flesh, or the wiles of Satan, being purged and done away, it may be presented pure and without spot before thee. be done for the procuring of their salvation, as there is for the restoring of their bodily health. However, since they are now incapable of those other comforts and advantages which this office directs, it is fit we should do all that possibly we can, and that is to pray for them heartily in this form, the only means left in such an emergency. Wheatly.

[o] A commendatory Prayer &c.] We know that "when the dust returns to the earth as it was, the spirit returns unto God that gave it," Eccles. xii. 7: and therefore our Saviour Himself, when He was expiring on the cross, cries out to his Father, "Into thy hands I commend my spirit," Luke xxiii. 46. And that we are to imitate his holy example, is evident from the practice of his first martyr St. Stephen, who also at his death commended his soul into the hands of his Redeemer, Acts vii. 59. Accordingly the succeeding ages of the Church always observed the same religious rite. Wheatly.

[p] A Prayer for persons troubled &c.] When any become melancholy through bodily distempers, or by evil principles are troubled with dismal and false apprehensions of God, or are too much disturbed in their inward peace and quiet through a dreadful sense of their former sins; it is fit that the spiritual physician should be called that he may discreetly apply the promises of God, and endeavour to obtain his consolation and mercy for the dejected penitent's deplorable state: to which purpose the prayer that is here provided, is very pertinent and useful. Wheatly.

THE

¶ Forasmuch as all mortal men be subject to many sudden perils, diseases, and sicknesses, and ever uncertain what time they shall depart out of this life; therefore, to the intent they may be always in a readiness to die, whensoever it shall please Almighty God to call them, the Curates shall diligently from time to time (but especially in the time of pestilence, or other infectious sickness) exhort their Parishioners to the often receiving of the holy Communion of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ, when it shall be publickly administered in the Church; that so doing, they may, in case of sudden visitation, have the less cause to be disquieted for lack of the same. But if the sick person be not able to come to the Church, and yet is desirous to receive the Communion in his house; then he must give timely notice to the Curate, signifying also how many there are to communicate with him, (which shall be three, or two at the least,) and having a convenient place in the sick man's house, with all things necessary so prepared, that the Curate may reverently minister, he shall there celebrate the holy Communion, beginning with the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, here following.

[q] The Communion of the sick.] It has been the constant usage of the Church, in all probability derived from the apostolical times, for persons dangerously sick to receive the holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper for their spiritual comfort and assistance. Hence this private Communion obtained the name of viaticum among the Latins, and a correspondent name among the Greeks; that is, provision as it were laid in to sustain them in their journey to the other world. Our Church follows this example of the primitive ages. And rather than the sick man should want so necessary a comfort, we are allowed to dispense it in a private house, and to a small company, which in other cases we avoid. Indeed there are divers weighty reasons why the dying Christian should receive this sacrament, and why ministers should persuade them to it, and labour to fit them for the worthy receiving of it. For, 1. This is the highest mystery of religion, and fittest for those who are by sickness put into a heavenly frame and are nearest to perfection. 2. This is God's seal of remission to all that receive it with penitence and faith. 3. This arms them against the fear of death, by setting Jesus before them, who died for them, and hath pulled out the sting of death. 4. This assures them of their resurrection, by keeping them members of Christ's body, John vi. 54. 5. It declares they die in the peace and communion of the true Church, out of which there is no salvation. And if the sick man have done all the duties in the foregoing office, he is prepared to die, and therefore fit for this Communion; and if he do receive it with devotion, the comfortable assurances of God's love, which he gets here, will never leave him till he see God face to face. We shall only add, that lest the fears of the divine displeasure which sick men are very apt to entertain, should trouble their minds, and hinder their joy and comfort in this holy ordinance, the Church hath chosen a peculiar Epistle and Gospel on purpose to comfort them and deliver them from these fears; and also made a proper Collect to beg patience for them under this their affliction. All which are so plain, they need no explication, but only require the sick man's devout attention, and then it is hoped they will not fail of their desired effect. Dr. Nicholls, Dean Comber.

¶ After which the Priest shall proceed according to the form before prescribed for the holy Communion, beginning at these words [Ye that do truly, &c.]

¶ At the time of the distribution[r] of the holy Sacrament, the Priest shall first receive the Communion himself, and after minister unto them that are appointed to communicate with the sick, and last of all to the sick person.

¶ But if a man, either by reason[s] of extremity of sickness, or for want of warning in due time to the Curate, or for lack of company to receive with him, or by any other just impediment, do not receive the Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood, the Curate shall instruct him, that if he do truly repent him of his sins, and stedfastly believe that Jesus Christ hath suffered death upon the Cross for him, and shed his Blood for his redemption, earnestly remembering the benefits he hath thereby, and giving him hearty thanks therefore, he doth eat and drink the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ profitably to his Soul's health, although he do not receive the Sacrament with his mouth.

¶ When the sick person is visited, and receiveth the holy Communion all at one time, then the Priest, for more expedition, shall cut off the form of the Visitation at the Psalm [In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust, &c.] and go straight to the Communion.

¶ In the time of the Plague, Sweat, or such other like contagious times of sickness or diseases, when none of the Parish or neighbours can be gotten to communicate with the sick in their houses, for fear of the infection, upon special request of the diseased, the Minister may only communicate with him.

[r] At the time of the distribution &c.] The minister, we know, is always to receive the Communion himself, before he proceeds to deliver it to others: but the reason perhaps why the sick man is to receive last, may be, because those who communicate with him, through fear of some contagion, or the noisomeness of his disease, may be afraid to drink out of the same cup after him. Wheatly.

[s] But if a man, either by reason &c.] This rubrick is added for the comfort, and to remove the fears, of such, as desire to receive the Communion, but may by some casualty be hindered from doing it. The curate is then directed to instruct the sick man as is expressed above. For the means, whereby we partake of the benefits of this sacrament, is a "lively faith:" and therefore as our Church asserts in her 39th Article, that "the wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign and sacrament of so great a thing:" so here she declares, that if a sick man be hindered by any just impediment from receiving the sacrament of Christ's body and blood; yet by faith and repentance, and by mentally laying hold of the benefits obtained for him by Christ, "he doth eat and drink the body and blood of our Saviour Christ profitably to his soul's health, although he do not receive the sacrament with his mouth." Wheatly.

We have seen the Church's care to provide all necessaries for a sick person's salvation: it were an happy thing, to see in the people an answerable diligence in the use of these ghostly offices; that they would, when they are sick, send for the priest; not verbally only to comfort them, by rehearsing to them comfortable texts of Scripture, whether they belong to them or not, (which is not to heal the sick, but to tell them that they have no need of the spiritual physician, by which means precious souls perish, for whom Christ died,) but to search and examine the state of their souls, to shew them their sins, to prepare them by ghostly counsel and exercises of penance, for absolution, and the holy Communion; whereby they might indeed find comfort, remission of sins, and the Holy Ghost the Comforter. And this should be done, while the sick person hath strength and ability to attend and join with him in these holy services. Bp. Sparrow.

THE ORDER FOR

THE BURIAL OF THE DEAD[t].

¶ Here is to be noted, that the Office ensuing is not to be used[u] for any that die unbaptized[v], or excommunicate, or have laid violent hands upon themselves[x].

[t] The Order for the Burial of the Dead.] If all our prayers and endeavours for our friend prove unavailable for the continuance of his life, we must with patience submit to the will of God, "to whom the issues of life and death belong:" and therefore, after recommending his soul to God, which immediately upon its dissolution returns to Him, it is fit we should decently dispose of his body, which is left to our management and care. Not that the dead are any thing the better for the honours which we perform to their corpses; (for we know that several of the ancient philosophers cared not whether they were buried or not; and the ancient martyrs of the Christian church despised their persecutors for threatening them with the want of a grave;) but those who survive could never endure that the shame of nature should lie exposed, nor see the bodies of those they loved become a prey to birds and beasts. For these reasons the very heathens called it a divine institution, and a law of the immortal gods. And the Romans especially had a peculiar deity to preside over this affair. The Athenians were so strict, that they would not admit any to be magistrates, who had not taken care of their parents' sepulture; and beheaded one of their generals after he had gotten a victory, for throwing the dead bodies of the slain, in a tempest, into the sea. And Plutarch relates, that before they engaged with the Persians, they took a solemn oath, that if they were conquerors, they would bury their foes; this being a privilege which even an enemy hath a right to, as being a debt which is owing to humanity.

2. It is true indeed, the manner of funerals has varied according to the different customs of several countries: but all civilized nations have ever agreed in performing some funeral rites or other. The most ancient manner was by "burying them in the earth:" which is indeed so natural, that some brutes have been observed, by mere instinct, to bury their dead with wonderful care. The body, we know, was formed of the dust at first, and therefore it is fit it should "return to the earth as it was;" Gen. iii. 19; Eccles. xii. 7: insomuch that some heathens have, by the light of reason, called burying in the earth, the being "hid in our mother's lap," and the being "covered with her skirt." And that "interment," or enclosing the dead body in the grave, was used anciently by the Egyptians and other nations of the East, is plain from the account we have of the embalming, and from their mummies, which are frequently found to this day whole and entire, though some of them have lain above three thousand years in their graves. That the same practice of burying was used by the patriarchs, and their successors the Jews, we have abundant testimony from the most ancient records in the world, the books of Moses; by which we find, that their funerals were performed, and their sepulchres provided with an officious piety; Gen. xxiii. 4; xxv. 9; xxxv. 29; xlix. 31: and that it was usual for parents to take an oath of their children (which they religiously performed) that they should bury them with their fathers, and carry their bones with them, whenever they quitted their land where they were, Gen. xlvii. 29—31; xlix. 29–33; l. 25, 26; Exod. xiii. 19. See also Josh. xxiv. 32; Acts vii. 16; Heb. xi. 22. In succeeding ages indeed it became a custom in some places to "burn" the bodies of the dead; which was owing partly to a fear that some injury might be offered them if they were only buried, by digging their corpses again out of their graves; and partly to a conceit, that the souls of those that were burnt were carried up by the flames to heaven.

3. But though other nations sometimes used interment and sometimes burning; yet the Jews confined themselves to the former alone. There is a place or two indeed in our translation of the Old Testament, 1 Sam. xxxi. 12; Amos vi. 10, which might lead us to imagine that the rite of burning was also used by them sometimes. But upon consulting the original texts, and the customs of the Jews, it does not appear that the burnings there mentioned were any thing more than the burning of odours and spices about their bodies, which was an honour they usually performed to their kings, 2 Chron. xvi. 14: xxi. 19; Jer. xxxiv. 5. So that, notwithstanding these texts, we may safely enough conclude, that interment or burying was the only rite with them; as it was also in after-times with the Christian church. For wherever paganism was extirpated, the custom of burning was disused; and the first natural way of laying up the bodies of the deceased entire in the grave obtained in the room of it.

4. And this has always been done with such solemnity, as is proper to the occasion. Sometimes indeed it has been attended with an expensive pomp, that is unseemly and extravagant. But this is no reason why we should not give all the expressions of a decent respect to the memory of those whom God takes from us. The description of the person who interred our Saviour, the enumeration of their virtues, and the everlasting commendation of her who spent three hundred pennyworth of spikenard to anoint his body to the burial, have always been thought sufficient grounds and encouragements for the careful and decent sepulture of Christians. And indeed, if the regard due to a human soul rendered some respect to the dead a principle that manifested itself to the common sense of heathens, shall we think that less care is due to the bodies of Christians, who once entertained a more glorious inhabitant, and were living temples of the Holy Ghost? 1 Cor. vi. 19; to bodies which were consecrated to the service of God; which bore their part in the duties of religion; fought the good fight of faith and patience, self-denial and mortification; and underwent the fatigue of many hardships and afflictions for the sake of piety and virtue? to bodies which, we believe, shall one day be awakened again from their sleep of death: have all their scattered particles of dust summoned together into their due order, and be "fashioned like to the glorious body of Christ," Phil. iii. 21; see also 1 Cor. xv. 42—44; as being made partakers of the same glory with their immortal souls, as once they were of the same sufferings and good works! Surely bodies so honoured here, and to be so glorified hereafter, and which too we own, even in the state of death, to be under the care of a divine providence and protection, are not to be exposed and despised by us as unworthy of our regard. Moved by these considerations, the primitive Christians, though they made no use of ointments whilst they lived, yet they did not think the most precious too costly to be used about the dead. And yet this was so far from being reproached with superstition, that it is ever reported as a laudable custom, and such as had something in it so engaging, so agreeable to the notions of civilized nature, as to have a very considerable influence upon the heathens, who observed and admired it; it becoming instrumental in disposing them to a favourable opinion at first, and afterwards to the embracing of the Christian religion, where these decencies and tender regards to deceased friends and good people were so constantly, so carefully, and so religiously practised. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

As to the office and order of burial, we must note that the ignorance and corruption of the later centuries had not vitiated any of the sacred administrations more than this of burial; on which the fancies of purgatory and prayers for the dead had so great an influence, that most of the forms now extant consist of little else but impertinent and useless petitions for the dead. Our Protestant Reformers therefore, remembering St. Augustine's rule, that all this office is designed rather for the comfort of the living, than the benefit of the dead, have justly rejected these superstitions; and contrived this present form wholly for the instruction, admonition, and comfort of the attendants on this solemnity, and therein have reduced this matter to its prime intention and use. It is not easy to tell exactly, what the primitive form of burial was: but the Psalms were a principal part of it, as all the fathers testify. They are now also a chief part of this office: and the rest is generally taken out of holy Scripture, being such places as are most proper to the occasion, so as to form altogether a most pious and practical office. Dean Comber.

It should be observed, that too many, who attend funerals, seem wholly unconcerned at those prayers, which the minister offers up to God: as if they had nothing more to do, than barely to listen to and hear them. I beseech these inconsiderate persons to remember, that the solemnity of funerals is part of religious worship, and that the whole congregation ought to assist and join therein. And surely were they duly affected with spectacles of mortality; were they sensible of the uncertainty of their own lives, and the infinite concerns of that eternity, into which one of their brethren is newly entered; they could not forbear lifting up their hearts to God, and pouring forth the most fervent devotions, when they pay the last office to their departed friends and neighbours. Dr. Bennet.

[a] Here is to be noted, that the Office ensuing is not to be used &c.] Though all persons are, for decency, and some other of the reasons that have been mentioned above, to be put under ground: yet it appears by this rubrick, which was prefixed to the office at the last review, as well as by the canons of the ancient church, that some are not capable of Christian burial. Wheatly.

The persons, capable of Christian burial, are only those within the pale of the Church; for the rubrick exclude all others from this privilege: which is agreeable to the sense of all nations, who have generally thought fit to punish some kinds of malefactors with the want of these rites after their death, as well to afflict the criminal, while he lives, with apprehensions of the disgrace to be done to his body, which is naturally dear to all men, as to perpetuate the odium of the crime, while the corpse is exposed to publick scorn after the offender hath parted with his life. Thus murderers were punished among the Romans: and among the Greeks robbers of temples and sacrilegious persons, as also those that betrayed their country, with divers other notorious transgressors. But none have been so justly and so universally deprived of that natural right, which all men seem to have in a grave, as those who break that great law of nature, the law of self-preservation, by laying violent hands upon themselves. These were forbidden to be buried among the Jews, and among the ancient Romans also. And, when many of the Milesian virgins made themselves away, the rest were restrained from so vile a crime by a decree, that, whosoever so died, she should not be buried, but her naked body should be exposed to the common view. And, to confirm the equity of these customs, we find the Christian councils, as well abroad as at home, have forbidden the clergy to bury those that killed themselves; as doth also our present rubrick in imitation of those ancient constitutions. And for very great reason: namely, to terrify all from committing so detestable and desperate a sin, as is the wilful destroying of God's image, the casting away of their own souls, as well as their opportunities of repentance: the Church hereby declaring, that she hath little hopes of their salvation, who die in an act of the greatest wickedness, which they can never repent of, after it be committed.

To these are to be added all that die under the sentence of excommunication, who in the primitive times were denied Christian burial also, with the intent of bringing the excommunicated to seek their absolution and the Church's peace for their soul's health, ere they leave this world; and, if not, of declaring them cut off from the body of Christ, and by this mark of infamy distinguishing them from obedient and regular Christians.

This office is also denied to infants, not yet admitted into the Church by baptism; not so much to punish the infants who have done no crime, as the parents by whose neglect this too often happens. And perhaps this external and sensible kind of punishment may move them to be more careful to accomplish the office in due time, than higher and more spiritual considerations will do.

All other persons, that die in the communion of the visible Church, are capable of these rites of Christian burial, according to the rules and practice both of the primitive and the present ages. Dean Comber.

Though this rubrick was not drawn up till 1661, and none of the regulations which it enjoins, excepting only what relates to persons excommunicate, was before that time specified in any of our articles, or ecclesiastical constitutions; yet it must not be considered as a new law, but merely as explanatory of the ancient canon law, and of the previous usage in England. Shepherd.

[v] — any that die unbaptized,] Not that the Church determines any thing concerning the future state of those that depart before they are admitted to baptism: but since they have not been received within the pale of the Church, we cannot properly use an office at their funeral, which all along supposes the person that is buried to have died in her communion.

Whether this office is to be used over such as have been baptized by the dissenters or sectaries, who have no regular commission for the administering of the sacraments, has been a subject of dispute; people generally determining on one side, or the other, according to their different sentiments of the validity or invalidity of such disputed baptisms. Wheatly.

[x] — or have laid violent hands upon themselves.] Of which sort are to be understood, not all who have procured death unto themselves, but who have done it voluntarily, and consequently have died in the commission of a mortal sin; and not idiots, lunaticks, or persons otherwise of insane mind. The proper judges, whether persons, who died by their own hands, were out of their senses, are the coroner's jury. The minister of the parish hath no authority to be present at viewing the body, or to summon or examine witnesses. And therefore he is neither entitled, nor able, to judge in the affair: but may well acquiesce in the publick determination without making any private inquiry. Indeed, were he to make one, the opinion, which he might form from thence, could usually be grounded only on common discourse and bare assertion. And it cannot be justifiable to act on these, in contradiction to the decision of a jury after hearing witnesses upon oath. And though there may be reason to suppose, that the coroner's jury are frequently favourable in their judgment, in consideration of the circumstances of the deceased's family with respect to the forfeiture, and their verdict is in its own nature traversable; yet the burial may not be delayed, until that matter upon trial shall finally be determined. But, on acquittal of the crime of self-murder by the coroner's jury, the body in that case not being demanded by the law, it seemeth that a clergyman may and ought to admit that body to Christian burial. Dr. Burn.

On the other hand it has been contended, as to the coroner's warrant, I take that to be more than a certificate, that the body is not demanded by the law, and that therefore the relations may dispose of it as they please. For I cannot apprehend, that a coroner is to determine the sense of a rubrick, or to prescribe to the minister when Christian burial is to be used. The scandalous practice of them and their inquests, notwithstanding the strictness of their oath, in almost constantly returning every one they sit upon to be non compos mentis, (though the very circumstances of their murdering themselves are frequently a proof of the soundness of their senses,) sufficiently shews how much their verdict is to be depended on. They plead indeed, that it is hard to give away the subsistence of a family: but these gentlemen should remember, that they are not sworn to be charitable, but to be just; that their business is to inquire not what is convenient and proper to be done with that which is forfeited, but how the person came by his death; whether by another or himself; if by himself, whether he was felo de se, or non compos mentis. As the coroner indeed summons whom he pleases on the jury, and then delivers to them what charge he pleases, it is easy enough for him to influence their judgments, and to instil a general supposition, that a self-murderer must needs be mad, since no one would kill himself, unless he were out of his senses. But the jury should consider, that, if the case were so, it would be to no purpose for the law to appoint so formal an inquiry. For, according to this supposition, such inquiry must be vain and impertinent, since the fact itself would be evidence sufficient. It is true indeed, there may be a "moral" madness, that is, a misapplication of the understanding, in all self-murderers; but this sort of madness does not come under the cognizance of a jury; the question with them being, not whether the understanding was "misapplied," but whether there was any understanding at all. In short, the best rule for a jury to guide themselves by in such a case, is to judge whether the signs of madness, that are now pretended, would avail to acquit the same person of murdering another man: if not, there is no reason why they should be urged as a plea for acquitting him of murdering himself. But this is a little wide from my subject: however, it may be of use to shew, what little heed is to be given to a coroner's warrant, and that there is no reason, because a coroner prostitutes his oath, that the clergy should be so complaisant as to prostitute their office. Wheatly.

[y] The Priest and Clerks meeting the Corpse at the entrance of the Church-yard,] So that the attendance of the minister at the house of the deceased, and his accompanying the corpse all the way from thence, is a mere voluntary respect, which he is at liberty to pay or refuse as he pleases. Also, by the 68th Canon, not only "the corpse must be brought to the church or church-yard," but "convenient warning too must be given the minister beforehand," or else there is no penalty upon him for either delaying or refusing to bury it. Wheatly.

[z] — the Church-yard,] All nations whatsoever, Jews, Heathens, and Christians, have ever had solemn places set apart for this use; but in permitting their dead to be buried either in or near their places of worship, the Christians differ from both the former. For the Jews, being forbid to touch or come near any dead body, and it being declared that they who did so were defiled, had always their sepulchres without the city, Luke vii. 12: and from them it is probable the Greeks and Romans derived, not only the notion of being polluted by a dead corpse, but the law also of burying without the walls. For this reason the Christians, so long as the law was in force throughout the Roman empire, were obliged, in compliance with it, to bury their dead without the gates of the city: a custom which prevailed here in England till about the middle of the eighth century, when Archbishop Cuthbert of Canterbury obtained a dispensation from the Pope for making church-yards within the walls. However, that the Christians did not do this out of any belief that the body of a dead Christian defiled the place or persons near it, may be inferred from their consecrating their old places of burial into places of divine worship, and by building their churches, as soon as they had liberty, over some or other of the martyrs' graves. After churches were built indeed, they suffered nobody to be buried in them; but had distinct places contiguous to them appropriated to this use, which, from the metaphor of sleep, by which death in Scripture is often described, were called Κοιμητήρια, that is, cœmeteries, or sleeping-places. The first that we read of, as buried any where else, was Constantine the Great, to whom it was indulged, as a singular honour, to be buried in the church-porch. Nor were any of the Eastern emperors, for several centuries afterwards, admitted to be buried any nearer to the church: for several canons had been made against allowing this to any person of what dignity soever: and even in our own Church we find, that, in the end of the seventh century, an Archbishop of Canterbury had not been buried within the church, but that the porch was full with six of his predecessors that had been buried there before. By a canon made in King Edgar's reign, about the middle of the tenth century, no man was allowed to be buried in the church, unless it were known that he had so pleased God in his lifetime, as to be worthy of such a burying-place: though above a hundred years afterwards we meet with another canon, made at a council at Winchester, that seems again to prohibit all corpses whatsoever, without any exception, from being buried in churches. But in later times, every one that could pay for the honour, has been generally allowed it: but since all cannot purchase it, nor the churches contain all, there is a necessity of providing some other conveniences for this use. And this has generally been done, as was observed before, by inclosing some of the ground round the church, for a burying-place or church-yard: that so, as the faithful are going to the house of prayer, they may be brought to a fit temper and disposition of mind, by a prospect of the graves and monuments of their friends: nothing being more apt to raise our devotion, than serious thoughts upon death and mortality. But wherever the grave is, the priest is to "go before," and to lead the company thither, and to conduct, and introduce, as it were, the corpse of the deceased into its house of rest. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

In England, the church-yard is now intended for the use of the parishioners, and others dying in the parish; who, as the civilians express it, are intitled to burial there of common right. But no clergyman is compellable to bury any extra-parochial corpse in his church-yard. It is no part of his parochial duty. It is a matter of mere indulgence, grace, and favour, which he may grant upon whatever terms he pleases: provided such extra-parochial person, or his predecessors, have not, with the concurrence of the minister and parishioners, obtained a faculty from the judge of the bishop's court, to have a burying-place in such church-yard for ever. Shepherd.

No person is at liberty to be buried in the church, without the permission of the parson or lawful minister. He is the sole judge of the propriety of refusing, or admitting, any corpse to be buried in his parish church, being in this instance not subject to control, even by the court of the ordinary himself.

To this general principle however there is an exception or two. Where a faculty or a licence from the judge of the ordinary's court has, with the consent of the parties interested, been obtained, appropriating to any person and his heirs a vault, or a place of burial, in a church for ever, then interment of such person, his family and heirs, may be demanded upon the payment of the accustomed dues. The same equally holds good, where a faculty has been obtained for making a family vault, or tomb, in a church-yard. Impropriators likewise have, in some parish churches, the sole and exclusive right of burying in the chancel, or vaults formed under the chancel. In neither of these cases can the deceased be denied interment in his family vault by any minister, even though he may have lived and died in another parish. Shepherd.

[a] — going before it,] Without enlarging upon the ancient manner of burial in other particulars, it may be here noted, that the body of the deceased Christian was first washed, Acts ix. 37; and sometimes embalmed with great cost and care: and being decently wrapped in fine linen, and dressed for the grave, it was put into a coffin, brought forth by the friends; and, if the person was of great sanctity, or one of the clergy, it was carried on the shoulders of priests or bishops towards the church or cemetery where it was to be laid. However, the priest ever went before the corpse, both in the Eastern and Western church, as our rubrick now enjoins, for he was to begin those holy hymns, wherewith the deceased were brought to their graves; the nearest friends and principal mourners went next; and then all the company followed in order after the bier: which ancient custom hath this excellent moral in it; To be a memento to us, who survive, that this our deceased friend is gone before us; and that we must all follow him very shortly to the same place. Dean Comber.

[b] — either into the Church, or towards the Grave,] That is, if I rightly understand the words, if the corpse be to be buried within the church, he shall go directly thither: but if in the church-yard, he may first go to the grave. By the first Common Prayer, both the psalms and lesson, with the suffrages above mentioned, were "to be said in the church either before or after the burial of the corpse." But from that time to the Restoration of King Charles, the lesson (for I have observed during all that time there were no psalms) was appointed to be read wherever the grave was, whether in the church or church-yard, immediately after the sentence taken out of the Revelation. But the Presbyterians objecting, that this exposed both minister and people to many inconveniences, by standing in the air, there was a rubrick added at the last review, which orders, that the psalms and lesson shall be said, "after they are come into the church:" so that now, I suppose, it is again left to the minister's discretion (as it was in the rubrick of the first book of King Edward) whether he will read them before or after the burial of the corpse. For the second rubrick at the beginning of the office permits him to go "to the church, or to the grave," that is, to either of them directly, which he pleases: nor is there any farther direction, that if he goes into the church, it shall be before he goes to the grave: but only that "after they are come into the church," one or both of the psalms shall be read with the lesson that follows; and "when they come to the grave," the rest of the devotions that are to be used.

I know some are of opinion, that the design of the rubricks, as they are worded now, is to give liberty to the minister to go immediately to the grave, and so wholly to omit the lesson and psalms: but if that were the design of them, one would have expected some hint, that they might be omitted; whereas the expression in the rubrick, "after they are come into the church," seems to suppose that either first or last they will come thither. I am therefore rather inclined to think, that the meaning of leaving the rubrick so dubious is, that if the minister go directly "into the church," the grave being there, he should use the psalms and lesson before the burial; but if the grave be without the church, he may first go thither to bury the corpse, and then afterwards, to prevent any inconveniency from the air, proceed to the church itself, to read the psalms and lesson, according to the rubrick in the first Common Prayer. For I do not know any instance in the whole Liturgy besides, where the minister is at liberty to leave out so considerable a part of an office, when it is so proper to be used. But I only give this as my private opinion: for I know it belongs to a much higher authority "to appease diversity, and to resolve doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute, the things contained in this book." Wheatly.

this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. Job xix. 25, 26, 27.

Though it is not expressly stated in the rubrick, yet it is understood by the Church, and ought to be explained to the people, that the prayers and exhortations in the burial office are not for the benefit of the dead, but for the instruction and comfort of the living. Whether the psalms and lesson be read before, or after, the interment; whether the corpse is, or is not, taken into the church: are in their own nature matters of indifference; and so the Church has left them. Still the psalms and lesson are so exceedingly proper for the occasion, that I presume few clergymen would be disposed to omit them, even if they had, what in this instance they have not, a discretionary power.

When the rubricks were formed, there was a reason for the minister's going to the grave in the first place, which does not at present exist. It was then in some places not uncommon, to bury the poorer people without a coffin, the body being wrapped in some thick coarse clothing. On such occasions there might be an obvious reason for not admitting the corpse to be brought into the church. And even at present, where the deceased may have died of the small pox, or any other infectious disease; or when the body is putrid, or otherwise offensive; the minister, for the sake of the health of the company attending the funeral, as well as on account of the congregation, who may assemble the same or the following day, would not, I conceive, exercise his discretion improperly, if he should first go to the grave, and then into the church. Shepherd.

[c] — shall say, or sing.] Since the following of a dear and beloved friend to the grave must naturally raise in us some melancholy and concern, the Church calls in the aids of religion to raise and cheer our dejected hearts. It was with this design that pious antiquity carried out their dead with hymns of triumph, as conquerors that had gloriously finished their course, and were now going to receive their crown of victory. To this end again were those Hallelujahs sung of old, as they went to the grave; a custom still retained in many parts of this nation, where they divert the grief of the friends and mourners, by singing psalms from the house to the very "entrance of the church-yard." And here the holy man comes forth to meet us, and immediately salutes us with the Gospel of peace. And indeed whither should we go for consolations on this occasion, but to that storehouse of comfort, which is furnished with remedies for every grief? And herein we exactly follow the primitive pattern, according to an ancient author, who thus describes the office of the priest on this occasion: "The ministers read the infallible promises of our holy resurrection, contained in the divine oracles; and then devoutly sing the anthems of holy psalms, which are on the same subject, and tend to the same purpose." This is the very same with our method: for we first begin with the promises and sentences of Scripture, and then pass to the proper psalms. The subject of these sentences, and the intent of them, is, to teach us the three necessary graces to be exercised at a funeral: namely, faith, patience, and thanksgiving; and these placed in their proper order. For by faith we gain patience; and, when patience hath her perfect work, it will produce thanksgiving. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[d] I am the resurrection and the life, &c.] The priest begins with the words, which were spoken at first by the blessed Jesus, as he was going towards the grave of a beloved friend, with intent to comfort a pious mourner; words so proper to the occasion, that they have been used in the burial office of almost all churches whatever; having been anciently read for one of the Gospels in the Western church, and often repeated by the priest in the Greek office. Poor Martha's affection and sorrow for her brother had almost swallowed up her faith in Jesus, and it is not unusual for the same passions still to prevail to the same excessive degree: but our Lord here comforts both her and us, by reminding us of his omnipotence, and absolute power to raise the dead, and restore them to life, as well in a natural as a spiritual sense. If then we can recover but the exercise of our faith, we shall be much more at ease; as remembering that the soul of our deceased friend, though parted from his body, is still alive, and that even his corpse, which we follow, shall live again as soon as ever Christ shall call it. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[e] — saith the Lord.] This is one of the very few places, where the compilers of our Liturgy have prefixed to a passage from the Gospel the name of the speaker, when it is not found in the Gospels. Hence some of the Gospels for Sundays and holydays begin too abruptly. The old missals often introduce the passage with "Jesus said," or "at that time;" and sometimes substitute the proper name for the pronoun in the first sentence. Shepherd.

[f] I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c.] The book of Job contains so many lively descriptions of the miseries of human life, and the felicity of a religious and holy death, that it hath been anciently esteemed of special use in this office: and the Western church of old had nine several lessons at burial from hence, beginning at Job vii. 16. And this very sentence is there reckoned the eighth lesson. And it is very proper to this occasion, as being a noble example of the exercise of that faith prescribed in the former verse. And surely if he, who lived among the Gentiles so long before the revelation of Christianity, could sustain his spirit with the hopes of a resurrection; it will be no small reproach to us, who have fuller and better assurances of it, to be slower in our belief of this article than he. The old translation of these verses in Job, (which was retained in our office till the last review, when from the Scotch Liturgy it was changed for the new one,) as it was more agreeable to the ancient versions and the sense of the fathers, so was it more applicable to the present occasion. The words, as they stood then, were as follow: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that I shall rise out of the earth in the last day, and shall be

¶ After they are come into the Church, shall be read one or both of these Psalms[h] following.

Dixi, Custodiam. Psalm xxxix.

I Said, I will take heed to my ways: that I offend not in my tongue.

I will keep my mouth as it were with a bridle: while the ungodly is in my sight.

I held my tongue, and spake nothing: I kept silence, yea, even from good words; but it was pain and grief to me.

My heart was hot within me, and while I was thus musing the fire kindled: and at the last I spake with my tongue;

Lord, let me know mine end, and the number of my days: that I may be certified how long I have to live.

Behold, thou hast made my days as it were a span long: and mine age is even as nothing in respect of thee; and verily every man living is altogether vanity.

For man walketh in a vain shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain: he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them.

And now, Lord, what is my

covered again with my skin, and shall see God in my flesh; yea, and I myself shall behold him, not with other, but with these same eyes." Thus the fathers read it, and accordingly explained it of a particular resurrection of this very body. And in this sense it is an admirable consolation to all that mourn for the loss of friends, namely, to believe with holy Job, that the same person we are now laying in the earth, there to crumble and moulder into dust, shall in due time, by the power of God, arise from his grave, and live again. We lose indeed the sight of him for a season, but "we know that Jesus our Redeemer liveth," who will in due time raise us all from the dust, when both our friend and we shall all behold Him, and even know and distinguish each other again with these very eyes. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[g] We brought nothing into this world, &c.] The next grace to be exercised at this time is patience, which, upon these occasions, is often violently assaulted by worldly considerations: for when we reflect on our own loss, in being deprived of a friend; or descend lower, to reflect upon the comforts of the world which he hath left behind him; our passions are apt to overflow. But here a third sentence comes in to allay both these griefs. We have lost perhaps a tender, dear, and useful friend: but what then? we brought no friends with us into the world, nor can we carry them out from hence. They were given us by God, who can raise up others in their stead; and they are taken away by Him, to wean our affections from any thing here. We should therefore rather bless the giver for the time we have enjoyed them, than murmur at his taking them, after He has lent them us so long.

Again, as to our friend, it is true, he is going naked to the grave: but, alas! he goes no otherwise than he came: for (saith the wise man) "as he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand," Eccles. v. 15. "He shall carry nothing away with him," saith the Psalmist, "when he dieth, neither shall his pomp follow him," Ps. xlix. 17. Whatever he had, or possessed here, was only useful to him so long as he stayed: where is the misfortune then, if, upon removing from hence, he leaves that behind him, which will be of no service to him in the place he is going to? Whilst he was engaged on this stage of the world, God furnished him with a habit suitable to the part which He expected him to perform: shall any of us therefore think it strange, that the actor is undressed when his part is done? In a word, let us consider ourselves under what character we please, there is still the same reason to join with the holy penman in these noble reflections: "We brought nothing into the world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[h] — one or both of these Psalms.] The singing of psalms and hymns at funerals was a custom used among Christians even from the first ages, and mentioned frequently by St. Jerome, St. Chrysostom, and many others. St. Jerome affirms that this usage arose from primitive tradition: which is very likely, if we consider how generally it hath been observed in the Greek rubrick. The like use there is also in the Latin church. In compliance with this ancient and universal custom, we have psalms prescribed also, which are as agreeable to this solemnity, as any that have place in the best offices of this kind now extant in the world. Dean Comber.

The former of these psalms, the 39th, is supposed to have been composed by David, upon Joab's reproaching him for his publick grief for Absalom's death; and is of use in this place, to direct and comfort those that mourn, to check all loud and unseemly complaints, and to turn them into prayers and devout meditations.

The other was composed by Moses in the wilderness, upon the death of that vast multitude, who for their murmuring and infidelity, were sentenced to leave their carcases in the wilderness; and who accordingly wasted by little and little before they came into the land of Canaan. Upon this the prophet breaks forth into these religious meditations, not accusing the divine Providence, but applying all to the best advantage; shewing us withal what thoughts we should entertain, when we have the prospect of a funeral before our eyes; namely, that we should reflect upon, and consider our own lot, and endeavour to apply the instance of mortality now before us, to the bettering and improving of our own condition.

In the first book of King Edward, instead of the psalms, of which we have now been speaking, there were three others appointed, namely, the 116th, the 139th, and 146th. And when they were left out at the hope: truly my hope is even in thee.

Deliver me from all mine offences: and make me not a rebuke unto the foolish.

I became dumb, and opened not my mouth: for it was thy doing.

Take thy plague away from me: I am even consumed by means of thy heavy hand.

When thou with rebukes dost chasten man for sin, thou makest his beauty to consume away, like as it were a moth fretting a garment: every man therefore is but vanity.

Hear my prayer, O Lord, and with thine ears consider my calling: hold not thy peace at my tears.

For I am a stranger with thee: and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.

O spare me a little, that I may recover my strength: before I go hence, and be no more seen.

Glory be to the Father[i], and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be: world without end. Amen.

Domine, refugium. Psalm xc.

LORD, thou hast been our refuge: from one generation to another.

Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made: thou art God from everlasting, and world without end.

Thou turnest man to destruction: again thou sayest, Come again, ye children of men.

For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday: seeing that is past as a watch in the night.

As soon as thou scatterest them, they are even as a sleep: and fade away suddenly like the grass.

In the morning it is green, and groweth up: but in the evening it is cut down, dried up, and withered.

For we consume away in thy displeasure: and are afraid at thy wrathful indignation.

Thou hast set our misdeeds before thee: and our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.

For when thou art angry all our days are gone: we bring our years to an end, as it were a tale that is told.

The days of our age are threescore years and ten; and though men be so strong, that they come to fourscore years: yet is their strength then but labour and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone.

But who regardeth the power of thy wrath: for even thereafter as a man feareth, so is thy displeasure.

O teach us to number our days: that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Turn thee again, O Lord, at the last: and be gracious unto thy servants.

O satisfy us with thy mercy, and that soon: so shall we rejoice and be glad all the days of our life.

Comfort us again now after the time that thou hast plagued us: and for the years wherein we have suffered adversity.

Shew thy servants thy work: and their children thy glory.

And the glorious Majesty of the Lord our God be upon us: prosper thou the work of our hands upon us, O prosper thou our handy-work.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be: world without end. Amen.

next review, there were no other whatever ordered in the room of them, till these were inserted at King Charles's Restoration. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[i] Glory be to the Father, &c.] Each of the psalms is concluded with that ancient and excellent hymn, the Gloria Patri; upon which we may here note, that the Church of England doth not herein follow the church of Rome, who reject this hymn, as being too joyful for the solemnity. Whereas the ancient Christians buried the faithful with all possible demonstrations of joy. And therefore with the Greek church, and indeed with the primitive, we express our gratitude and joy in this eucharistical conclusion of the psalms, as being well assured of the resurrection, and the happiness that shall follow to all that depart hence in the Lord. Dean Comber.

[k] Then shall follow the Lesson &c.] The admirable composers of this office, like that good scribe instructed to the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xiii. 52, do bring forth out of their treasures things new and old; that is, as St. Jerome expounds it, the choicest parts both of the Old and New Testament: after the psalms out of the

I Cor. xv. 20.

NOW is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's, at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all. Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead? and why stand we in jeopardy every hour? I protest by your rejoicing, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die. Be not deceived: evil communications corrupt good manners. Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God. I speak this to your shame. But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: But God giveth it a body, as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead: It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: It is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a

Old Testament therefore, they have added this lesson out of the New. And since the faith of the resurrection is not only the principal article of a Christian's belief, but also that which chiefly concerns us on this occasion, as well to allay our sorrow for the party deceased, as to prepare us freely to follow when God calls; therefore they have chosen this chapter, which, though it stand among the Epistles, is called St. Paul's Gospel, ver. 1, and is the fullest account of the resurrection that the whole Scripture doth afford: that article being here so strongly proved, so plainly described, and so pertinently applied, that nothing could have been so suitable to this purpose, which made it to be anciently taken notice of as a very proper passage for funeral occasions. Hence the Western church of old did read one Epistle out of it, beginning at ver. 51; and our Salisbury office hath taken one little portion out of it, beginning at ver. 20. But our judicious reformers thought not fit to mangle it: beginning therefore with ver. 20, they continue it to the end of the chapter. The lesson consists of three parts: first, the certainty of the resurrection is proved, ver. 20—34. Secondly, the queries relating to it are solved, ver. 35—54. Thirdly, the application of the whole is made, ver. 55—58. Dean Comber.

mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, (for the trumpet shall sound,) and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mystical must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality; then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

¶ When they come to the Grave[1], while the Corpse is made ready to be laid into the earth, the Priest shall say, or the Priest and Clerks shall sing:

Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts; shut not thy merciful ears to our prayer; but spare us, Lord most holy, O God most mighty, O holy and merciful Saviour, thou most worthy Judge eternal, suffer us not, at our last hour, for any pains of death, to fall from thee[m]. [1] When they come to the Grave, &c.] Being come to the grave, which is by the Jews called "the long habitation," and by Christians "the bed of rest," whilst the corpse is made ready to be put into it, instead of those vain and ridiculous blessings of the grave, sprinkling it with holy water, perfuming it with incense, and the like, prescribed by the Roman office; our Church hath drawn up a most pious meditation for the blessing and sanctifying of our own souls, and the application of this example to our spiritual advantage. When the body is stript of all but its grave-attire, and is just going to be put into the ground, it is most likely to make the deepest impression upon us, and to strike us with the most serious apprehensions of our mortality. This happy opportunity the Church is unwilling to lose; and therefore, whilst we are in such good dispositions of mind, she presents us with a noble strain of devotion, consisting of a meditation on the shortness, and misery, and uncertainty of life, together with an acknowledgment of our dependence on God, whom yet we have disobliged and offended with our sins. However, we presume to fly to Him for succour, and beg of Him to preserve us from eternal death hereafter, and to support us under the pains of temporal death here. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[m] —suffer us not, at our last hour, for any pains of death, to fall from thee] That is, we pray God that no pains or terror of temporal death may make us "fall" off from "God" by a dangerous despair; and if we can prevail we shall escape all that is evil in natural death, and be wholly free from eternal death. And here we must note that our Church hath wholly rejected the needless and vain prayers for the dead, and by all these meditations and prayers strives to make the occasion as profitable as may be to the living. Dean Comber.

[n] Then while the earth shall be cast upon the Body, &c.] Next after the sentences follows the solemn interment: immediately before which the Gentiles took "their leave" of their deceased friends, by bidding them "farewell for ever." And the ancient Christians used to give a parting kiss of charity, just as the body was about to be put into the grave, to declare their affection, and evidence that he died in the unity and peace of the church, a custom still retained in the Greek church, and in some of the northern parts of England. Wheatly.

The casting of earth upon the body was esteemed an act of piety by the very heathens; insomuch that to find a body unburied, and leave it uncovered, was judged amongst them a great crime. In the Greek church this has been accounted so essential to the solemnity, that it is ordered to be done by the priest himself. And the same was enjoined by our own rubrick in the first Common Prayer of King Edward VI. But in our present Liturgy it is only ordered that it "shall be cast upon the body by some standing by:" and so it is generally left to one of the bearers, or sexton, who gives three casts of earth upon the body, or coffin, whilst the priest pronounces the solemn form, which explains the ceremony; namely, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." Wheatly.

[o] Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God &c.] The form of words appointed to be said, "while the earth is cast upon the body," is peculiarly pertinent and affecting. The introduction commemorates what has happened: "that God has taken to himself the soul of our departed brother or sister." The form then describes the present act of "committing the body to the ground, earth to earth, ashes to ashes, and dust to dust:" and concludes with a declaration of our firm and stedfast hope of the general resurrection. Shepherd.

¶ Then shall be said or sung,

I Heard a voice from heaven[s], saying unto me, Write, From henceforth blessed are the dead which die in the Lord: even so saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labours. Rev. xiv. 13.

¶ Then the Priest shall say,

Lord, have mercy upon us[t].
Christ, have mercy upon us.
Lord, have mercy upon us.

[p] — to take unto himself the soul &c.] It is said that these words are very improper at the burial of wicked men. But, first, since it hath pleased God to declare, that "he hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather desires that he should turn from his wickedness and live," Ezek. xviii. 23. 32; we may fairly conclude that, when it pleases God to take a wicked man out of the world, He does it in mercy, that he may not go on to "heap up wrath to himself against the day of wrath," Rom. ii. 5. Secondly, since Solomon saith of death with respect to all men, "then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it," Eccles. xii. 7; it follows, that God may be properly said to take the souls of all men that die, to Himself, without excepting the most notorious and impenitent offenders. When good men die, He takes them to Himself, that is, to eternal life and happiness; and though this cannot be said of wicked men, yet it is as true that He takes them to Himself, that is, to his own most righteous and just judgment. Veneer.

When we say, that God has taken a person to Himself, we must not be understood to mean, that the person is undoubtedly gone to heaven. For the wise man says of men in general, and consequently of the wicked, whose portion is not in heaven, that at their death "the spirit returns to God who gave it," Eccles. xii. 7. And if the spirits of all men go to God, then God certainly takes them to Himself. Dr. Bennet.

When the soul, by which the body lives, is once recalled by Him who first placed it therein, death doth immediately follow that separation: and those several parts, the body and soul, go to receptacles as distant as those originals are, whence they had their beginning, Eccles. xii. 7. God disposes of the soul Himself, and leaves the corruptible carcase to our care. It seems both unreasonable and absurd for the Roman office now to commend a soul to God's hands, which He hath already disposed of, and which the ancient church commended to God before it was departed: and indeed it is best done by the party himself, while his life remains. And concerning that better and nobler part we have nothing to do now, but only to acknowledge that God hath disposed of that according to his good pleasure; which is seasonably intimated here, because our passions are usually at the very highest upon this last parting. Dean Comber.

[q] — here departed,] This is the phrase of holy Scripture, Luke ii. 29; Phil. i. 23; and the sense of all good Christians concerning death; that it is but the entrance into a long journey, the going a little before in that path, wherein we must all shortly follow: so that we may comfort ourselves concerning them with David, saying, "We shall go to them, but they cannot come back to us," 2 Sam. xii. 23. Dean Comber.

[r] — we therefore commit his body to the ground; &c.] This phrase, of "committing his body to the ground," implies, that we deliver it into safe custody, and into such hands as will faithfully restore it again. We do not cast it away as a lost and perished carcase; but carefully lay it in the ground, as having in it a seed to eternity, and "in sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life:" not that we believe that every one we bury shall rise again to joy and felicity, or profess this "sure and certain hope" of the resurrection of the person who is now interred. It is not his resurrection, but the resurrection, that is here expressed: nor do we go on to mention the change of his body in the singular number, but of "our vile body," which comprehends the bodies of Christians in general. That this is the sense and meaning of the words, may be shewn from the other parallel form, which the Church has appointed to be used at the burial of the dead at sea. And this being a principal article of our faith, it is highly reasonable, that we should publickly acknowledge and declare our stedfastness in it, when we lay the body of any Christian in the grave. Wheatly.

[s] I heard a voice from heaven, &c.] After the foregoing form follows a consolatory sentence from Rev. xiv. 13, "to be said" by the priest alone, or to be "sung" by him and the clerks together. The propriety of it to the present solemnity occasioned its being used in the Western church many centuries ago. It is a special revelation that was made to St. John, and ordered to be recorded for ever by him to be a perpetual consolation in relation to the state of departed saints. For since Jesus hath now conquered death, "from henceforth blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." They are no more to be lamented, but to be the subjects of our joy. The Spirit assures us that they "rest from their labours," their work is done, their warfare accomplished, and now they enjoy crowns of victory as the rewards of their pains. Wheatly.

This Scripture was anciently appropriated to this office, being read in some parts of the Western church of old, at the ending of the lessons; and since it is generally used for one of the Epistles. Nor had we any reason to leave it out, but only to set it in a more proper place. And, as it stands now in our service, we may consider it, first, as it looks back to the interment; where, having declared our hope of the resurrection, we bring a further confirmation of it from this place, which was a special revelation by an immediate voice from heaven, ordered to be recorded for the preservation thereof, and attested peculiarly by the Spirit; and is singularly well calculated to allay grief on account of all holy persons deceased, who are here declared to be in a blessed condition. Secondly, the Protestant Church placed this sentence here before the succeeding collects, to give a just reason, why we do not therein pray for the dead; who, if they have died in the Lord, are blessed already, so that we cannot with any sense

OUR Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

Priest.

Luke xx. 38. Exod. iii. 6.

ALMIGHTY God, with whom do live the spirits[u] of them that depart hence in the Lord, and with whom the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity; Job i. 21. We give thee hearty thanks for that it hath pleased thee to deliver this our brother out of the miseries of this sinful world; beseeching thee, that it may please thee[x], of thy gracious goodness, shortly to accomplish the number of thine elect, and to hasten Matt. vi. 10 thy kingdom; that we, with all those that are departed in the true faith of Heb. xi. 40. pray for them to obtain that, which they actually enjoy. Dean Comber.

[t] Then the Priest shall say, Lord, have mercy upon us. &c.] Having sufficiently improved this occasion by way of instruction and pious meditation, we now address our requests to Almighty God in our own behalf, who alone are capable of receiving benefit by these prayers: praying for mercy, 1. to the Father, that He may deliver us from the miseries of this life: 2. to the Son, that He may pardon us the guilt of our sins: 3. to the Holy Ghost, that He may sanctify us, and cleanse us from our corruptions. And because we need all manner of good things, and know not what to ask for as we ought, to these supplications we add the Lord's Prayer, the petitions of which comprehend every blessing, that we can require. In it we acknowledge, that, though we have lost a friend on earth, we have a greater, "Our Father, which is in heaven." At this dispensation we do not murmur, but "hallow his name;" and pray, that "his kingdom" of glory may "come," when we and all our friends shall meet again; and that, whether He ordain life or death, "his will," and not ours, "be done." The rest of the prayer depicts our miserable condition in this life. We require "daily bread," to sustain us: mercy to "forgive us:" and grace to "deliver us from evil," both temporal and eternal. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[u] Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits &c.] The primitive Christians used many religious solemnities at the burial of their dead, and particularly made prayers upon the occasion, as is done at this day in all Christian countries as well as ours. Our forms however are generally our own; being composed by the compilers of our Liturgy, who could have very little assistance in this matter from the Roman offices, which are filled with vainly repeated and ridiculous petitions for the dead, whose doom is already certain; and have no respect to the living, for whose sakes, as St. Augustin affirms, these things are chiefly intended. Dean Comber.

In each of the two following prayers, there is such a noble mixture of acts of faith and hope concerning the state of our deceased friend, and of prayers and petitions for our happiness with him, as, being duly attended to, will effectually pacify that unnecessary grief, which is pernicious to ourselves, without benefiting the deceased; and will turn our thoughts to a due care of our own souls, in order to our meeting again, with infinitely more joy, than we now part with sorrow and grief. Wheatly.

The former of the two prayers consists of three parts. In the introduction, which is a paraphrase of the words of our Saviour, Luke xx. 38, we profess our belief of the happy state of the spirits of good men departed. We then give thanks to God for having delivered our deceased friend from the miseries of this sinful world, knowing, that the longer he had continued here, the more sins he would have committed, and the more calamities he would have endured. And in the last place we pray for the speedy advent of Christ's kingdom, that "we with all those, that are departed in the true faith of his holy name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in his eternal and everlasting glory."

It has been objected to this prayer, that to give thanks for the death of a friend is unnatural. It would indeed be unnatural not to be affected by the death of a relation or friend. But, while we feel, as men, the loss that we have sustained, we should learn to bear it, as Christians: and, when we consider, from what our departed friend is delivered, and what he has gained, not to be thankful for this is an act of unkindness to him, and of ingratitude to God. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

[x] —beseeching thee, that it may please thee, &c.] This petition follows after the preceding Eucharist in the very method of the Lord's Prayer: the act of praise being a paraphrase of "Hallowed be thy name;" and this petition the explication of "Thy kingdom come." We have hitherto been considering the miseries of this life, and the happy estate of those that are religiously departed in peace: whereupon we cannot but wish ourselves in the same blessed condition with those holy souls that are gone before us; at least, that we may happily meet each other in the kingdom of heaven, when God's good time is come. We know, so long as this world endures, Satan will rage, and sin will reign; enemies will oppress us, and miseries disquiet us and all good people that live in it. Wherefore we are not only willing, but desirous, that the last and great day may come, when those that love God, and are beloved by Him again, those choice and excellent persons, whom the Scripture calls the elect, who are scattered here, shall be gathered together from the four winds, Matt. xxiv. 31; and all of that blessed number shall have their wrongs righted, their miseries eternally removed, and their enemies finally vanquished: and then both those deceased, and such as remain alive, shall begin their never-ceasing felicity. And is there not good reason we should pray for the hastening of this blessed time, and say, "Lord Jesus, come quickly?" Rev. xxii. 20. Here we serve; there we shall reign: here we are afflicted; there we shall be happy: and, when his kingdom begins, ours begins also. Neither the saints departed, nor we, have our perfect consummation in bliss as yet: we are imperfect, both in body consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in thy eternal and everlasting glory; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Collect[y].

O Merciful God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life; in whom whosoever believeth shall live, though he die; and whosoever liveth, and believeth in him, shall not die eternally; who also hath taught us, by his holy Apostle Saint Paul, not to be sorry, as men without hope[z], for them that sleep in him; We meekly beseech thee, O Father, to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness; that, when we shall depart this life, we may rest in him, as our hope is this our brother doth[a]; and that, at the general Resurrection in the last day, we may and soul; and till the resurrection their felicity is not complete, "that they without us should not be made perfect," Heb. xi. 40. So that they, as well as we, do wish and pray for the coming of this last day, and the completing of Christ's kingdom, Rev. vi. 10: that being the time, which will unite the church militant and triumphant, and give unto all saints their perfect consummation of bliss both in body and soul. Dean Comber.

[y] The Collect.] This prayer is called the Collect, because in King Edward's first book, at the end of the burial-office, there is an order for "the celebration of the holy Communion, when there is a burial of the dead." The forty-second psalm is appointed for the introit. The prayer I am now speaking of, with a little alteration at the end, stands there for the Collect: 1 Thess. iv. 13 to the end is ordered for the Epistle; and for the Gospel, John vi. 37—48. Wheatly.

The former prayer seems to respect the whole company; whereas this is peculiarly designed for the comfort of the relations and friends of the deceased: and it may well be called a Collect, because it is a collection of the choicest sentences of holy Scripture, which may minister thereunto; being intermingled with such acts of hope concerning the deceased, and such a prospect of the means to make us happy with him, as, being duly considered and devoutly recited, will effectually remove that unnecessary grief, which hurts us, and helps not him; and will turn our thoughts and endeavours towards the more useful exercises of repentance, in order to our meeting again with more joy than now we part with sorrow. Dean Comber.

In the introduction, borrowed from the words of our Saviour, we declare our certainty of the resurrection of all true believers to eternal life; assign a reason from St. Paul, why we should not grieve immoderately, like infidels, who have no hope. This is followed by supplications for ourselves: first, that we may be partakers of the first or spiritual resurrection here, by "rising from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness;" secondly, that, when we depart this life, "we may rest in Christ;" and thirdly, that at our resurrection at the last day we may "receive that blessing, which will then be pronounced to all that love and fear him." To evince the earnestness of our desire, we iterate our petitions; and beseech "our merciful Father, through Jesus Christ our Redeemer," to grant our requests. Shepherd.

[z] — not to be sorry, as men without hope, &c.] The former Scripture shewed us, why we should not grieve extremely: these words are a plain prohibition of excessive grief. They have been generally thought very proper to restrain extravagant sorrow, being found in the offices of the Eastern, as well as those of the Western church: and they are most judiciously inserted in this consolatory prayer, where they may be most likely to have their desired effect; being very duly inferred from the preceding assurance of the resurrection, since whosoever firmly believes that, cannot rationally grieve in excess. It is for those to be immoderate in their grief, who have no mixture of hope to alleviate and allay their sorrow. Still Christianity doth not prohibit the shedding of some pious tears. The apostle, as St. Augustine notes, says not, Be not sorry at all; but, Be not sorry as infidels without hope. Jesus Himself wept at Lazarus's grave, John xi. 35. And the primitive saints made great lamentation at St. Stephen's burial, Acts viii. 2. Christianity will allow us to express our love to our departed friends, so it be within the bounds of moderation; and provided it make us not forget those divine comforts, wherewith religion refreshes us again. "We are troubled," saith St. Augustine, "at the death of our friends, because of our loss in parting with them, but not without hope of meeting them again. By that we are perplexed: by this we are comforted. On that side our infirmity affects us: on this side our faith revives us. On that side we lament the condition of man: on this we are cheered with the promise of God." Dean Comber.

[a] — as our hope is this our brother doth;] Of whose final estate being not absolutely certain, we are bound in charity to hope the best. Dean Comber.

Against this passage it is often objected, that we make declaration of "hope," that all the persons, whom we bury, are saved. In order to appease the scruples about which, as far as the nature of the expression will bear, we desire it may be considered, that there are very different degrees of hope, the lowest of which is but one remove from despair. Now there are but very few, with whom we are concerned, that die in a state so utterly desperate, as that we may positively affirm they are damned; which yet we might do, did we absolutely and entirely despair of their salvation. It remains therefore that we must have some, though very faint, hopes of their salvation: and this seems sufficient to warrant this declaration, especially if it be pronounced as faintly as the hope itself is entertained. Wheatly.

We are often said to hope that, which we do only wish or desire, but have not particular grounds to believe; only we are not sure of the contrary, or that the thing is impossible. For instance, suppose that in a storm we should speak of a friend at sea. One man, considering the greatness of the tempest, and the circumstances we imagine our friend to be in, says, I fear he is lost. Another replies, I hope not. What now is meant by this hope? No assurance can be had on either side. One hopes, and another fears: and both consistently. The hope therefore denotes no more than a charitable wish or desire that it may be as we speak. Now this hope may be accompanied with the greatest fear. There is therefore a twofold hope: the one of assurance, built upon grounds of belief, which rises or falls according to the appearance of evidence; the other of desire, built upon our affections, which rises or falls according to the degrees of probability and charity. Now the hope in this place is of the latter sort: by which we may hope well of a person, unless we are absolutely sure that it is ill with him. And consequently we may hope, that the deceased does "rest in Christ," unless we are absolutely sure, which we can hardly be, that he is doomed to hell fire. Dr. Bennet.

be found acceptable[b] in thy sight; and receive that blessing, which thy well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all that love and fear thee, saying, Come, ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world: Grant this, we beseech thee, O merciful Father, through Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer. Amen.

The Church supposes her children will take all her offices together; and the person now buried is by the Church supposed to have repented his sins and received the holy Sacrament according to her directions: and surely she may well judge and hope the best concerning those who are thus prepared for the grave. However, let us suppose the men, who take exceptions at this passage, were left at liberty to omit it to any particular person which they were to bury. Doubtless they would be much at a loss to know, which were the men and women of whose resting in Christ they could have no hope at all, since none can set bounds to God's mercy, not till the final sentence that shall pass upon any single person: and, if they did presume at any time to limit it, their blindfold censoriousness might be reproved justly with that saying of St. Paul, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" Rom. xiv. 4: and they ought to tremble when they remember, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," Matt. vii. 1. I am sure our Lord severely checked the Jews for their presumptuous censure of some, that they supposed to die in their sins, Luke xiii. 1, 2. We will easily grant them, that all professed Christians do not sleep in Christ: but, since we bury single persons, we cannot certainly know the state of particular men; and, where we are ignorant, it is safest to speak and hope the best.

If it be alleged that evil men will hereby be encouraged to continue in their sins, I answer, that the whole office confutes that vain conceit, for it promises happiness only to the pious: and particularly the very clause preceding this does plainly obviate this misconstruction by moving every by-stander to pray, that he may be raised from the death of sin here, without which the Church declares that he cannot hope for a happy death or a joyful resurrection. And, if it be well observed, we suppose the party deceased to have had his share in the work of grace, before he obtained a portion in glory: and accordingly we pray for the first, as to ourselves, before we presume to ask the latter. Dean Comber.

[b] — and that—we may be found acceptable &c.] As to our brother departed, we can only exercise our charity and our hope; but for ourselves we have need to pray, that we may by holiness here be fitted for happiness hereafter: for in vain do we hope to be found acceptable at the last day, if we do not please God now. That blessing is only to be pronounced on those who love and fear Him: God is a holy God, and heaven a holy place: the saints and angels are all holy: nor can any dwell in that society, who is not first made holy. If we could suppose an evil man should carry his evil inclinations of pride and envy, malice and revenge, lust and intemperance, to that glorious kingdom with him, heaven would be no heaven to such an one: the place would be odious; the company troublesome; the employment ungrateful; and the eternity a burden intolerable: he would be uneasy to holy souls, and they to him. He, that is a good man, hath his heaven begun in the peace of his own conscience; and he is going thither where it will be completed. Dean Comber.

[c] The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c.] This benediction was added at the last review. In it we pray, that the merits of Christ, the love of the Father, and the aid of the Holy Spirit, may secure and protect us in our passage through this sublunary world, and bring us at length to the haven, where we would be. Dean Comber, Shepherd.

In the course of the foregoing service we have triumphant hymns over death, taken from holy Scripture: then a lesson out of St. Paul, to the same purpose: then a thanksgiving for our departed brother's safe delivery out of misery: lastly, a prayer for our consummation in glory, and joyful absolution at the last day. By all which prayers, praises, and holy lessons, and decent solemnities, we do glorify God, honour the dead, and comfort the living. "Take away these prayers, praises, and holy lessons," saith Hooker, "which were ordained to shew at burials the peculiar hope of the Church concerning the resurrection of the dead; and in the manner of the dumb funerals, what one thing is there, whereby the world may perceive that we are Christians?" There being in those dumb shows nothing but what heathens and pagans do; how can any unlearned or unbeliever be convinced by them, that either we, who are present at them, do, or that he ought to, believe any part of Christian religion? But when the unlearned or unbeliever hears us sing triumphant songs to God for our victory over death; when he hears holy lessons and discourses of the resurrection; when he hears us pray for a happy and joyful resurrection to glory; by all these he must be convinced, that we do believe the resurrection, which is a principal article of Christian faith; and the same may be the means to convince him also, and make him believe the same, "and so fall down and worship God." And this is according to St. Paul's rule, 1 Cor. xiv. 23—25: who thence concludes, that all our publick religious services ought to be so done, that the "unlearned or unbeliever may be convinced, and brought to worship God." Bp. Sparrow.

Let us not then stand at the grave weeping. Let us go home silently, and study how by holiness we may come to that felicity, to which they are gone before us. The Lord pardon and amend us all! And then we shall courageously meet death ourselves, and patiently bear it in others, till they and we be awakened by the voice of Jesus, to receive us to his everlasting kingdom. Dean Comber.

THE

THANKSGIVING OF WOMEN AFTER CHILD-BIRTH[d],

COMMONLY CALLED, THE

CHURCHING OF WOMEN.

¶ The Woman, at the usual time after her Delivery[e], shall come into the Church[f] decently apparelled[g], and there shall kneel down in some convenient place, as

[d] The thanksgiving of women after child-birth, &c.] The birth of man is so truly wonderful, that it seems to be designed as a standing demonstration of the omnipotence of God. And therefore that the frequency of it may not diminish our admiration, the Church orders a publick and solemn acknowledgment to be made on every such occasion by the woman on whom the miracle is wrought; who still feels the bruise of our first parents' fall, and labours under the curse which Eve then entailed upon her whole sex.

As to the original of this custom, it is not to be doubted, but that, as many other Christian usages received their rise from other parts of the Jewish œconomy, so did this from the rite of purification, which is enjoined so particularly in the twelfth chapter of Leviticus. Not that we observe it by virtue of that precept, which we grant to have been ceremonial, and so not now of any force; but because we apprehend some moral duty to have been implied in it by way of analogy, which must be obligatory upon all, even when the ceremony is ceased. The uncleanness of the woman, the set number of days she is to abstain from the tabernacle, and the sacrifices she was to offer when she first came abroad, are rites wholly abolished, and what we no ways regard: but then, the open and solemn acknowledgment of God's goodness in delivering the mother, and increasing the number of mankind, is a duty that will oblige to the end of the world. And therefore though the mother be now no longer obliged to offer the material sacrifices of the law; yet she is nevertheless bound to offer the evangelical sacrifice of praise. She is still publickly to acknowledge the blessing vouchsafed her, and to profess her sense of the fresh obligation it lays her under to obedience. Nor indeed may the Church be so reasonably supposed to have taken up this rite from the practice of the Jews, as she may be, that she began it in imitation of the blessed Virgin, who though she was rather sanctified than defiled by the birth of our Lord, and so had no need of purification from any uncleanness, whether legal or moral; yet wisely and humbly submitted to this rite, and offered her praise, together with her blessed Son, in the temple. And that from hence this usage was derived among Christians, seems probable, not only from its being so universal and ancient, that the beginning of it can hardly any where be found; but also from the practice of the Eastern church, where the mother still brings the child along with her, and presents it to God on her churching-day. The priest indeed is there said to "purify" them: and in our first Common Prayer, this office with us was entitled "The order of the Purification of Women." But that neither of these terms implied, that the woman had contracted any uncleanness in her state of child-bearing, may not only be inferred from the silence of the offices both in the Greek church and ours in relation to any uncleanness; but is also farther evident from the ancient laws relating to this practice, which by no means ground it upon any impurity, from which the woman stands in need to be purged. And therefore, when our own Liturgy came to be reviewed, to prevent all misconstructions that might be put upon the word, the title was altered, and the office named, (as it is still in our present Common Prayer Book,) "The Thanksgiving of Women after Child-birth, commonly called, The Churching of Women." Dean Comber, Wheatly.

When holy Scripture describes excessive sorrow in the most expressive manner, it likens it to that of a woman in travail. And if this sorrow be so excessive, how great must the joy be to be delivered from that sorrow? Commensurate certainly, and of adequate proportion, must be the debt of thankfulness to the benefactor, the donor of that recovery; whence a necessity of "thanksgiving of women after child-birth." If it be asked, why the Church hath appointed a particular form for this deliverance, and not for deliverance from other cases of equal danger? the answer is, the Church did not so much take measure of the peril, as accommodate herself to that mark of separation, which God Himself hath put between this and other maladies. "To conceive and bring forth in sorrow" was signally inflicted upon Eve: and, in her, upon all mothers, as a penalty for her first disobedience, Gen. iii. 16: so that the sorrows of child-birth have, by God's express determination, a more direct and peculiar reference to Eve's disobedience than any other disease whatsoever: and, though all maladies are the product of the first sin, yet is the malediction specifically fixed and applied to this alone. Now, when that, which was ordained primarily as a curse for the first sin, is converted to so great a blessing, God is certainly in that case more to be praised in a set and solemn office. L'Estrange.

[e] The Woman, at the usual time after her Delivery, &c.] In the Greek church the time for performing this office hath been accustomed[h], or as the Ordinary shall direct: And then the Priest shall say unto her[i], is limited to be on the fortieth day. But in the West the time was never strictly determined. And so our present rubriek does not pretend to limit the day when the woman shall be churched, but only supposes that she will come "at the usual time after her delivery." The "usual time" is now about a month: for the woman's weakness will seldom permit her coming sooner. And if she be not able to come so soon, she is allowed to stay a longer time; the Church not expecting her to return her thanks for a blessing before it is received. Wheatly.

[f] — shall come into the Church] It is required, that whenever she does it, she "shall come into the church." And this is enjoined, first, for the honour of God, whose marvellous works in the formation of the child, and the preservation of the woman, ought publickly to be owned, that so others may learn to put their trust in Him. Secondly, that the whole congregation may have a fit opportunity for praising God for the too-much-forgotten mercy of their birth. And, thirdly, that the woman may in the proper place own the mercy now vouchsafed her, of being restored to the happy privilege of worshipping God in the congregation of his saints.

How great therefore is the absurdity which some would introduce of stifling their acknowledgments in private houses, and of giving thanks for their recovery and enlargement in no other place than that of their confinement and restraint! a practice which is inconsistent with the very name of this office, which is called "The Churching of Women," and which consequently implies a ridiculous solecism of being "churched at home." Nor is it any thing more consistent with the end and devotions prescribed by this office, than it is with the name of it. For with what decency or propriety can the woman pretend to "pay her vows in the presence of all God's people, in the courts of the Lord's house," when she is only assuming state in a bed-chamber or parlour, and perhaps only accompanied with her midwife or nurse? To "give thanks therefore at home" (for by no means call it "churching") is not only an act of disobedience to the Church, but a high affront to Almighty God; whose mercy they scorn to acknowledge in a church, and think it honour enough done Him, if He is summoned by his priest to wait on them at their houses, and to take what thanks they will vouchsafe Him there. But methinks a minister, who has any regard for his character, and considers the honour of the Lord he serves, should disdain such a servile compliance and submission, and abhor the betraying of his Master's dignity. Here can be no pretence of danger in the case, should the woman prove obstinate upon the priest's refusal; (which ministers are apt to urge for their excuse, when they are prevailed upon to give publick baptism in private;) nor is the decision of a council wanting to instruct him (if he has any doubts upon account of the woman's ill health) that "he is not to perform this office at home, though she be really so weak as not to be able to come to church." For if she be not able to come to church, let her stay till she is; God does not require any thanks for a mercy, before He has vouchsafed it: but if she comes as soon as her strength permits, she discharges her obligations both to Him and the Church. Wheatly.

[g] — decently apparelled,] That is, as the order and custom was formerly, with a white covering or veil. And this custom was maintained as late as in the reign of King James I.; but, it having been now for some time discontinued, long enough to make it obsolete, the decency of the woman's apparel seems to be left intirely to her own discretion. Wheatly.

[h] — in some convenient place, as hath been accustomed,] That is, at the communion-table, or altar, where the ordinary has not otherwise enjoined. Wheatly. See the note from Dean Comber, page 438.

[i] — And then the Priest shall say unto her,] This office consists of three parts: first, the preface, shewing the reason and occasion of the duty; secondly, the praises contained in the two proper psalms; thirdly, the prayers fitted to the present case, contained in the lesser Litany, Lord's Prayer, Suffrages, and Collect of thanksgiving. Dean Comber.

[k] Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God &c.] It is a common defect in all other Liturgies, that they have no preface to introduce the several offices, and to prepare the parties concerned to do their duties with understanding. But it is the peculiar care of the Church of England to instruct us how to do every duty, as well as to assist us in the doing it. Hence the daily prayers begin with an exhortation, as do most of the other offices of the church. Even this short one is not without a suitable preface directed to the woman, whereby the priest first excites her to a thankful acknowledgment for the mercy she has received, and then directs her in what words to perform it. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[l] — you shall therefore give hearty thanks unto God, and say,] The praises of the woman, as they must be "hearty," so also must be publick: for she is required to "say" the psalm of thanksgiving, that is, to repeat it with an "audible voice," as she does the daily confession, after the minister. For the psalm is properly applicable to her alone; and the minister reads it, not upon his own account, but only to instruct and lead the woman, by going before her, and, as it were, putting into her mouth what words she must say. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

[m] — the 116*th Psalm,*] The Psalm, appointed on this occasion, in all the Common Prayer Books till the last review, was the 121st, which with the 128th was also prescribed by the office used in the church of Rome. But neither of these is so very apt to the case, as those are which we have now. The first of which, though composed by David upon his recovery from some dangerous sickness, is yet, by leaving out a verse or two, which makes mention of the other sex, easily enough applicable to the case of a woman, who comes to give her thanks for so great a deliverance. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

Dilexi quoniam.

I Am well pleased : that the Lord hath heard the voice of my prayer;

That he hath inclined his ear unto me : therefore will I call upon him as long as I live.

The snares of death compassed me round about : and the pains of hell gat hold upon me.

I found trouble and heaviness, and I called upon the Name of the Lord : O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.

Gracious is the Lord, and righteous : yea, our God is merciful.

The Lord preserveth the simple : I was in misery, and he helped me.

Turn again then unto thy rest, O my soul : for the Lord hath rewarded thee.

And why? thou hast delivered my soul from death : mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling.

I will walk before the Lord : in the land of the living.

I believed, and therefore will I speak; but I was sore troubled : I said in my haste, All men are liars.

What reward shall I give unto the Lord : for all the benefits that he hath done unto me?

I will receive the cup of salvation : and call upon the name of the Lord.

I will pay my vows now in the presence of all his people : in the courts of the Lord's house, even in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise the Lord.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

Or, Psalm cxxvii[n]. Nisi Dominus.

EXCEPT the Lord build the house : their labour is but lost that build it.

Except the Lord keep the city : the watchman waketh but in vain.

It is but lost labour that ye haste to rise up early, and so late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness : for so he giveth his beloved sleep.

Lo, children and the fruit of the womb : are an heritage and gift that cometh of the Lord.

Like as the arrows in the hand of the giant : even so are the young children.

Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them : they shall not be ashamed when they speak with their enemies in the gate.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

[n] Or Psalm 127.] This second Psalm more regards the birth of the child, and is very seasonable to be used whenever it is living, to excite the parents to the greater thankfulness. And as the first is most proper, when we respect the pain and peril which the mother has gone through: so the last ought to be used when an heir is born, or a child bestowed on those who wanted and desired one. Nor may it less aptly be used when those of meaner condition are churched: for by enlarging on the blessings of a numerous family, it obviates the too common murmurings of those discontented persons, who think themselves oppressed by such an increase. Wheatly.

[o] Then the Priest shall say, Let us pray, &c.] That part of this office, which is petitionary, is modelled exactly by the great Apostle's rule, 1 Tim. ii. 1: consisting, first, of "supplications" in the lesser Litany; secondly, "prayer," in the Lord's Prayer; thirdly, "intercession," in the suffrages; fourthly, "giving of thanks," in the Collect.

The hymn being over, the Church intimates that another part of duty, namely, prayer, is beginning: and that the woman and the whole congregation may unite therein, the priest excites them by the invitation, "Let us pray." And that the address may be humble, it is begun with the short Litany, "Lord, have mercy upon us, &c.:" that it may be also effectual, it is continued in the Lord's Prayer, to which the doxology was added at the last review, by reason of its being an office of thanksgiving: and, that all may bear a part, two or three short responses are added for the woman's safety and defence. And at last the whole office is closed with a short and pious Collect: consisting of a devout mixture of prayer and praise, so peculiarly fitted to the present occasion, that it needs no enlargement to shew its propriety. Wheatly.

¶ The Woman, that cometh to give her Thanks, must offer[q] accustomed Offerings; and, if there be a Communion, it is convenient that she receive the holy Communion.

[p] O Almighty God, &c.] This Collect hath some similitude to the old Western form, but is much improved in style and method. The offices of other churches have larger and more prayers; but they exceed this in multitude of words, not in perfection of sense; for this contains all that remains to be done in this case. Dean Comber.

[q] The Woman, that cometh to give her Thanks, must offer &c.] By "the accustomed offerings" is to be understood some offering to the minister, who performs the office, not under the notion of a fee or reward, but of something set apart as a tribute or acknowledgment due to God, who is pleased to declare Himself honoured or robbed according as such offerings are paid or withheld. We see under the law, that every woman, who came to be purified after child-bearing, was required to bring something that put her to an expense; even the poorest among them was not wholly excused, but obliged to do something, though it were but small. And though neither the kind nor the value of the expense be now prescribed; yet sure the expense itself should not covetously be saved: a woman that comes with any thankfulness or gratitude should scorn to offer what David disdained, namely, "of that which costs nothing." And indeed with what sincerity or truth can she say, as she is directed to do in one of the Psalms, "I will pay my vows now in the presence of all his people," if at the same time she designs no voluntary offering, which vows were always understood to imply?

But, besides the accustomed offering to the minister, the woman is to make a yet much better and greater offering, namely an offering of herself, to be a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice to God. For the rubrick declares, that "if there be a communion, it is convenient that she receive the holy Communion;" that being the most solemn way of praising God for Him by whom she received both the present, and all other God's mercies towards her: and a means also to bind herself more strictly to spend those days in his service, which, by this late deliverance, He hath added to her life. Wheatly.

In the Greek and Ethiopick churches women upon these occasions always did receive the holy Sacrament: and it seems in this very Church above a thousand years ago: and still we carry them up to the altar to remind them of their duty. And doubtless the omission of it occasions the too soon forgetting of this mercy, and the sudden falling off from piety, which we see in too many. Here they may praise God for our Lord Jesus Christ, and for this late temporal mercy also: here they may quicken their graces, seal their vows and promises of obedience, offer their charity, and begin that pious life to which they are so many ways obliged. To receive the Sacrament, while the sense of God's goodness and her own engagements is so fresh upon her, is the likeliest means to make her remember this blessing long, apply it right, and effectually to profit by it. Wherefore let it not be omitted on this occasion. Dean Comber.

A COMMINATION,

OR

DENOUNCING OF GOD'S ANGER[r] AND JUDGEMENTS AGAINST SINNERS,

With certain Prayers to be used on the First Day of Lent, and at other times, as the Ordinary shall appoint.

¶ After Morning Prayer, the Litany ended according to the accustomed manner, the Priest shall, in the Reading-Pew or Pulpit[s], say,

[r] A Commination, or denouncing of God's anger, &c.] The preface, which the Church has prefixed to this office, will supply the room of an introduction. It informs us, that "in the primitive Church there was a godly discipline: that at the beginning of Lent such persons, as stood convicted of notorious crimes, were put to open penance, and punished in this world, that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord; and that others, admonished by their example, might be the more afraid to offend." The manner, in which this discipline was inflicted, is thus recorded by Gratian: On the first day of Lent the penitents were to present themselves before the bishop clothed with sackcloth, with naked feet, and eyes turned to the ground: and this was to be done in the presence of the principal clergy of the diocese, who were to judge of the sincerity of their repentance. These introduced them into the church, where the bishop, all in tears, and the rest of the clergy, repeated the seven penitential psalms. Then, rising from prayers, they threw ashes upon them, and covered their heads with sackcloth: and then with mournful sighs declared to them, that, as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they must be cast out of the Church. Then the bishop commanded the officers to turn them out of the church doors; and all the clergy followed after, repeating that curse upon Adam, "In the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread." The like penance was inflicted upon them the next time the sacrament was administered, which was the Sunday following. And all this was done to the end that the penitents, observing how great a disorder the Church was in by reason of their crimes, should not lightly esteem of penance.

Though this discipline was severe, yet the many good consequences of it shewed it worthy the imitation of the Church in succeeding ages: so that it was anciently exercised in our own, as well as in foreign churches. But in latter ages, during the corruption of the church of Rome, this godly discipline degenerated into a formal and customary confession upon Ash-Wednesdays, used by all persons indifferently, whether penitents or not, from whom no other testimony of their repentance was required, than that they should submit to the empty ceremony of sprinkling ashes upon their heads. But this our wise Reformers prudently laid aside as a mere shadow and show; and not without hearty grief and concern, that the long continuance of the abominable corruptions of the Romish church, in their formal confessions and pretended absolutions, in their sale of indulgences, and their sordid commutations of penance for money, had let the people loose from those primitive bands of discipline, which tended really to their amendment, but to which through the rigour and severity it enjoins, they found it impracticable to reduce them again. However, since they could not do what they desired, they desired to do as much as they could: and therefore till the said discipline may be restored again, (which is rather to be wished than expected in these licentious times,) they have endeavoured to supply it as well as they were able, by appointing an office to be used at this season, called "A Commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgments against sinners:" that so the people, being apprized of God's wrath and indignation against their wickedness and sins, may not be encouraged, through the want of discipline in the Church, to follow and pursue them; but be moved, by the terror of the dreadful judgments of God, to supply that discipline to themselves, by severely judging and condemning themselves, and so to avoid being judged and condemned at the tribunal of God.

2. But besides "the first day of Lent," on which it is expressly enjoined, it is also supposed in the title of it to be used "at other times, as the ordinary shall direct." This was occasioned by the observation of Bucer: for it was originally ordered upon Ash-Wednesdays only; and therefore in the first Common Prayer Book it had no other title, but "The first day of Lent, commonly called Ash-Wednesday." But Bucer approving of the office, and not seeing reason why it should be confined to one day, and not used oftener, at least four times a year, the title of it was altered when it came to be reviewed; from which time it was called, "A Commination against sinners, with certain prayers to be used diverse times in the year." How often, or at what particular times, we do not find prescribed; except that Bishop Cosin informs us from the Visitation Articles of Archbishop Grindal for the province of Canterbury, in the year 1576, that it was appointed three times a year; namely, on one of the three Sundays next before Easter, on one of the two Sundays next before

BRETHREN, in the Primitive Church[t] there was a godly discipline, that, at the beginning of Lent, such persons as stood convicted of notorious sin were put to open penance[u], and punished in this world, that their souls might be
1 Cor. v. 7. saved in the day of the Lord; and that others, admonished by their ex-

Instead whereof, (until the said discipline may be restored again, which is much to be wished,) it is thought good that at this time (in the presence of you all) should be read the general sentences of God's cursing[x] against impenitent sinners, gathered out of the seven and twentieth Chapter of Deuteronomy, and other places of Scripture; and that ye should answer to every Sentence, Amen[y]: To the intent that, being admonished of the great in-

Pentecost, and on one of the two Sundays next before Christmas; that is, I suppose the office was appointed yearly to be used on these three days, as well as on Ash-Wednesday. For that Ash-Wednesday was then the solemn day of all, and on which this office was never to be omitted, may be gathered from the preface, which is drawn up for the peculiar use of that day. And accordingly we find, that in the Scotch Common Prayer a clause was added, that it was to be used "especially on the first day of Lent, commonly called Ash-Wednesday." However, in our own Liturgy, the title stood as above, till the last review, when a clause was added for the sake of explaining the word Commination; and the appointing of the times, on which it should be used, was left to the discretion of the bishop, or the ordinary. So that the whole title, as it stands now, runs thus: "A Commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgments against sinners, with certain prayers to be used on the first day of Lent, and at other times, as the ordinary shall appoint." The ordinaries indeed seldom or never make use of the power here given them, except that sometimes they appoint part of the office, namely, from the fifty-first Psalm to the end, to be used upon solemn days of fasting and humiliation. But as to the whole office, it is never used entirely but upon the day mentioned in the title of it, namely, "The first day of Lent." Wheatly.

[t] — the Priest shall, in the Reading-Pew or Pulpit,] Till the Restoration the priest was to go into the pulpit, and say the following preface and exhortation. And indeed that is a place not improper for the office, since the denouncing of God's judgments is as it were the preaching of his word. And it is certain that the pulpit was at first designed, not only for preaching, but for any thing else that tended to the edification of the people. There the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, were formerly appointed to be read to the people in English on every holy-day in the year, when there was no sermon to hinder it: and there also at the beginning of the Reformation, whilst the Romish Mass was continued till the English Liturgy could be prepared, the Epistle and Gospel for the day, with a Lesson out of the New Testament in the morning, and another out of the Old Testament in the afternoon, were read to the people in the English tongue. However, reading-pews having been generally brought into use before the Restoration, it was not then thought proper to confine the use of this office any longer to the pulpit, but to allow it to be said as the ministers should think proper, either there or in the reading-pew. Wheatly.

[t] Brethren, in the Primitive Church &c.] To bring the minds of the congregation into a serious composure, the office is introduced with a grave and solemn preface; by which the Church informs them, in the first place, of the ancient discipline, and then proposes to them the best means to supply it. The ancient discipline, she tells them, was "to put those to open shame," who by "any notorious sins" had given publick scandal and offence. By which means both the souls of those that sinned were often rescued from damnation, and others also, being admonished by their example, were deterred from incurring the same danger or punishment. But as this discipline is now lost through the degeneracy of the times, and even beyond retrieval as affairs stand now, she proposes that the congregation would supply it to themselves, by hearing the curses which God has denounced against impenitent sinners; by which means, as in a glass, each one will be able to discern his own sins, and the curses he is exposed to; the serious prospect of which will be apt to awaken them from their thoughtlessness and security, and to put them upon flying from such imminent danger, by having recourse to a speedy repentance. Wheatly.

[u] — were put to open penance,] In this prefatory introduction, and in the following exhortation, it must be remembered that the word "penance" sometimes signifies repentance, and at other times a punishment inflicted upon a sinner, either by himself, or by ecclesiastical authority, for some offence committed by him. In the latter sense it is here used: and in the former sense it is used in the exhortation. Dr. Bennet.

[x] — the general sentences of God's cursing &c.] The original of repeating the curses in the manner wherein we now use them, was a positive and divine institution, which twice enjoined it by Moses, Deut. xi. 29; xxvii: and in obedience to which we find Joshua afterwards most religiously observed it, Josh. viii. 33. And Josephus also reckons it amongst those things which the Jews always used to perform. And though the circumstances in the Jewish manner of reciting these curses were purely ceremonial, yet doubtless the end for which this duty was prescribed was truly moral. For to publish the equity and truth of God, and to profess our belief that his laws are righteous, and the sanctions thereof just and certain, is an excellent means of glorifying God, and a proper method for converting sinners. So that it cannot be unfit for the Gospel-times, nor at all unsuitable to our Christian worship; especially when the necessities of the Church require the sinner should be warned and brought to repentance. Christ indeed hath taken away the curse of the law, by being Himself made "a curse for us;" but this is only with respect to those that truly repent; for as to all others the curse stands in full force still. It is therefore fit, that all should declare their belief of the truth and reasonableness of these curses: the good man, to own what his sins had deserved, and to acknowledge his obligation to our Lord for redeeming him; the bad man, to awaken him from his security and ease, and to bring him to repentance before it be too late. Dean Comber, Wheatly.

† — and that ye should answer to every Sentence, Amen :] The word "Amen," which is to be said after the curses, being commonly used after prayers, may perhaps here be accounted by some, a wish or prayer, and so the people be thought to curse themselves. For the satisfying of which scrupulosity, it is enough to say, that God Himself commanded these Amens to be said after these curses, Deut. xxvii; and therefore good there may be in saying them, but harm there can be none, if men, when they say them, understand them. Now that we may understand them, when we use them, let us consider, that Amen is not always a wish or prayer. For it signifies no more but verily, or truly, or an assent to the truth of that, to which it is added. If that, to which it is added, be a prayer, then this must needs be a joining in the prayer, and is as much as "so be it;" but if that, to which it is added, be a creed, or any affirmative proposition, such as these curses are, then the Amen is only an affirmation, as that is, to which it is annexed. In this place therefore it is not a wishing, that the curses may fall upon our heads, but only an affirming with our own mouths, "that the curse of God is indeed due" to such sins; as the Church here propounds it. The use of it is, to make us flee such vices for the future, and earnestly repent of them, if we be guilty; since, as we acknowledge, the curse and vengeance of God doth deservedly follow such sins and sinners. Bp. Sparrow.

This pious and rational office hath been traduced and derided by some, who pretend the saying of Amen to these sentences of God's law is a cursing of ourselves, and a wicked as well as a foolish thing. But let it be considered, first, that God Himself commanded this very manner of answering: so that it can be no less than blasphemy to call it either wicked or foolish; yea, though it had been purely ceremonial, since it is a divine institution, it cannot be impious or ridiculous: but they are so in the highest degree, who affront Heaven, while they endeavour to vilify our sacred usages.

Secondly, Nor do they shew less ignorance than impiety, while they affirm this Amen to be a wishing of ourselves accursed; since Amen is not originally nor properly an adverb of wishing, but affirming; being derived from a root signifying truth, whence it is so often translated "verily" in the Gospels; and Jesus, who is the truth, is called "the Amen," Rev. iii. 14; that is, the faithful and true witness: and in Him the promises are yea and Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20; that is, certain and true; in which sense the primitive Christians said Amen at the receiving of the Eucharist, to testify their belief that it was truly the body and blood of Christ, 1 Cor. xiv. 16. So also in that mystical vision, the truth of those promises is sealed with Amen, Rev. vii. 10. 12; v. 12—14. Nor did the people curse themselves; but only testified their belief that God would curse them who stood not to Nehemiah's covenant, Nehem. v. 13. Even so, when the people said in Joshua's time, and we, in imitation of them, say Amen, after the reading of this divine malediction, we do no more but to set to our seal that God is true, and his threatening to be feared. Nor doth this assenting to the truth of God's word bring any curse on the penitent, nor so much as make the impenitent any other ways or more accursed than they were before. Though they be guilty, it brings not the curse on them, but it shews it to them at a distance, to affright them into the avoiding of it by repentance, and so it proves a blessing in the event; being like our Saviour's woes, of which the Gospel is so full, not wishes or procurers of evil, but compassionate predictions of it, in order to prevent it. It is certain that sinners, while they remain such, are really accursed: and to convince them of this, and make them own it, is the truest blessing we can give them; and to bless them in that estate is to curse them, Deut. xxix. 19; Ps. x. 3. So that Amen is no more here than a declaration, that he whom God blesseth is blessed, and he whom God curseth is cursed: and if we believe this with our hearts, when we say it with our lips, it will shew us our danger, and bring us to repentance.

As for the sins here enumerated in the order wherein they lie in holy Scripture, they are of the greatest and worst kind, and such as are threatened with curses and damnation in the Law, the Prophets, and the New Testament. Idolatry against God; disobedience to parents; injustice to neighbours; contempt of the miserable; oppression of the helpless; secret mischief; adultery; bribery and corruption; relying on the creatures: to which are added those sins, which the Gospel reckons to be damnable; namely, uncharitableness, fornication, lust, covetousness and spiritual idolatry, slander, drunkenness, and extortion. Now surely those, who are guilty of these crimes, are in a state of condemnation, whether they answer Amen or not; and had need judge themselves impartially, repent heartily, and amend speedily, that they may escape the wrath to come: and, to move them to this necessary duty, the following exhortation is admirably contrived. Dean Comber.

NOW seeing that all they are
Ps. cxix. 21. accursed[z] (as the prophet David beareth witness) who do err and go astray from the commandments of God; let us (remembering the dreadful judgement hanging over our heads, and always ready to fall upon us) return unto our Lord God, with all contrition and meekness of heart; bewailing and lamenting our sinful life, acknowledging and confessing our offences, and seeking to bring

Ps. xi. 6. the living God: he shall pour down rain upon the sinners, snares, fire and brimstone, storm and tempest; this shall be their portion to drink. For lo, the Lord is come out of his Isa. xxvi. 21 place to visit the wickedness of such as dwell upon the earth. But who Mal. iii. 2. may abide the day of his coming? Who shall be able to endure when he appeareth? His fan is in his Matt. iii. 12. hand, and he will purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the barn; but he will burn the chaff with unquenchable fire. The day of the 1 Thess. v. Lord cometh as a thief in the night: 2, 3. and when men shall say, Peace, and all things are safe, then shall sudden destruction come upon them, as sorrow cometh upon a woman travailing with child, and they shall not escape. Then shall appear the wrath Rom. ii. 4, 5. of God in the day of vengeance, which obstinate sinners, through the stubbornness of their heart, have heaped unto themselves; which despised the goodness, patience, and long-sufferance of God, when he calleth them continually to repentance. Then shall they call upon Prov. i. 28—me, (saith the Lord,) but I will not 30. hear; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me; and that, because they hated knowledge, and received not the fear of the Lord, but abhorred my counsel, and despised my correction. Then shall it be too Matt. xxv. 10—12.

[z] Now seeing that all they are accursed &c.] Having declared to what sins the curse of God is due, the Church has too much reason to conclude that we are all of us guilty of more or fewer of them; and consequently all of us in danger of God's wrath, except we repent. To excite us therefore to so necessary a duty, that so we may escape those dreadful judgments, she hath collected a pious and pathetick discourse, to set home the foregoing denunciations to our consciences. It is all of it gathered from holy Scripture, that it may be more regarded as coming directly from the word of God: and it is so methodical, and apt to the occasion, that the fault must be in the hearers, if the delivery of it be not attended with a happy effect. Wheatly.

In this application there is, first, a general exhortation to repentance: because we all have sinned, and so are in danger of God's wrath, we ought all to go to Him with inward grief and outward expressions of sorrow, confessing our sins before Him now, and resolving to forsake them for the time to come. Secondly, here are divers motives to bring us to this hearty repentance. First, the consideration of God's wrath against impenitent sinners. He proceeds strictly when He begins with them, Matt. iii. 10; his judgments are "fearful," Heb. x. 31; terrible and unavoidable, Psalm xi. 6. He Himself will manage it, Isa. xxvi. 21. And no guilty person can either "abide," Mal. iii. 2, or "escape" discovery, Matt. iii. 12. Nor will there be any time to repent then, for his wrath comes "suddenly," 1 Thess. v. 1, 2; like a thief in the night, or pains on a labouring woman. Nor can they make any excuse, because it is so justly deserved by them, Rom. ii. 3—5. Or if they do entreat, they shall not then be heard, Prov. i. 28—30. For Christ comes then not to argue but to condemn and pronounce the dreadful sentence, Matt. xxv. 41; which consigns them over to eternal misery. Wherefore, secondly, here are other motives taken from God's mercy to the penitent, who may be forgiven if they repent presently, Heb. iii. 7; before the time be past, John xii. 35, 36. For He hath promised upon these terms to forgive, Isa. lv. 7. So that if our sins be never so heinous, they may be pardoned, Isa. i. 18. Yea, they shall be forgiven if we forsake them, Ezek. xviii. 30. And the reason is, because Christ who died for our sins on earth, is "now our Advocate" to beg our pardon in heaven, 1 John ii. 1, 2. Thirdly, upon these grounds we exhort all present to "turn to him," firmly assured of his willingness to receive us, and fully resolved to amend our lives, and "take the easy yoke" of his commandments upon us for the time to come, Matt. xi. 28—30. And lastly, here is shewed the benefit of so doing, for hereby we shall certainly be delivered from the curses of the law, Gal. iii. 13; and be acquitted at Christ's last tribunal by that joyful sentence, Matt. xxv. 33, 34: which shall consign us unto eternal happiness. Dean Comber.

Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou that art the God of my health : and my tongue shall sing of thy righteousness.

Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord : and my mouth shall shew thy praise.

For thou desirest no sacrifice, else would I give it thee : but thou delightest not in burnt offerings.

The sacrifice of God is a troubled spirit : a broken and contrite heart, O God, shalt thou not despise.

O be favourable and gracious unto Sion : build thou the walls of Jerusalem.

Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifice of righteousness, with the burnt offerings and oblations : then shall they offer young bullocks upon thine altar.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son : and to the Holy Ghost;

Answer. As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be : world without end. Amen.

Lord, have mercy upon us.
Christ, have mercy upon us.
Lord, have mercy upon us.

OUR Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, As it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation ; But deliver us from evil. Amen.

Minister. O Lord, save thy servants ;

Answer. That put their trust in thee.

Minister. Send unto them help from above.

Answer. And evermore mightily defend them.

Minister. Help us, O God our Saviour.

Answer. And for the glory of thy Name deliver us; be merciful to us sinners, for thy Name's sake.

Minister. O Lord, hear our prayer.

Answer. And let our cry come unto thee.

Minister. Let us pray[b].

O Lord, we beseech thee, mercifully hear our prayers, and spare all those who confess their sins unto thee ; that they, whose consciences by sin are accused, by thy merciful pardon may be absolved ; through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Job vii. 20, 21. Matt. v. 4. Rom. v. 1.

O Most mighty God, and merciful Father, who hast compassion upon all men, and hatest nothing that thou hast made ; who wouldest not the death of a sinner, but that he should rather turn from his sin, and be saved; Mercifully forgive us our trespasses ; receive and comfort us, who are grieved and wearied with the burden of our sins. Thy property is always to have mercy ; to thee only it appertaineth to forgive sins. Spare us therefore, good Lord, spare thy people, whom thou hast redeemed ; enter not into judgement with thy servants, who are vile earth, and miserable sinners ; but so turn thine anger from us, who meekly acknowledge our vileness, and truly repent us of our faults, and so make haste to help us in this world, that we may ever live with thee in the world to come ; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Ps. cxlv. 8, 9. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Heb. viii. 12. Prov. xviii. 14. 2 Thess. ii. 16, 17. Ps. cxxxvi. 1. Mark ii. 7. Joel ii. 17. 1 Pet. i 18. Ps. cxliii. 2. Ps. ciii. 14. Ps. lxxxv. 4. Prov. xxviii. 18. Jer. iii. 23. Rom. vii. 25. Heb. iv. 16. Ps. xxii. 19. Rom. v. 20, 21.

¶ Then shall the people say this[c] that followeth, after the Minister.

TURN thou us, O good Lord, and so shall we be turned. Be favourable, O Lord, be favourable Jer. xxxi. 18.

[b] Let us pray.] Of the lesser Litany, the Lord's Prayer, and suffrages, which introduce these devotions, we have spoken before. The rest are three Collects, two of them to be repeated by the minister alone, the third by the priest and people together; but all of them are earnest petitions for pardon. We dare not here, with the Roman church, in a mixed assembly, pronounce a positive and formal absolution to all : yet we address ourselves to Almighty God, who best knows who needs a pardon, and who is fit for it; beseeching Him importunately to grant it to all such. Dean Comber.

[c] Then shall the people say this &c.] The priest having made way by the foregoing importunate addresses, the people are now prepared and allowed to open their lips, and to plead for their own pardon :

to thy people, Who turn to thee in weeping, fasting, and praying. For thou art a merciful God, Full of compassion, Long-suffering, and of great pity. Thou sparest when we deserve punishment, And in thy wrath thinkest upon mercy. Spare thy people, good Lord, spare them, And let not thine heritage be brought to confusion. Hear us, O Lord, for thy mercy is great, And after the multitude of thy mercies look upon us; Through the merits and mediation of thy blessed Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Job xxxiii. 26.
Joel ii 12, 13.
Ezra ix. 13.
Ps. lxxviii. 38, 39.
Joel ii. 17.
Ps lvii. 10; lxix. 13.

THE Lord bless us, and keep us; the Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon us, and give us peace, now and for evermore. Amen.

Numb. vi. 24—26.

and they are here furnished with so proper a form, that, if it be presented with an united devotion suitable to the expressions of it, it cannot but prevail, and will fit us all to receive the following blessing. Dean Comber.

[d] Then the Minister alone shall say.] After the congregation hath expressed so much penitence and devotion, so humbly confessed their sin, and so heartily begged their pardon, the Church pronounces a blessing in God's name, taken from that divine form of his own composing, Numb. vi. 24. So that all, who are prepared to receive the benefit of it, must kneel humbly; and may believe firmly, that He who prescribed it will ratify it to their infinite advantage, and endless comfort. Dean Comber.

NOTES

INTRODUCTORY TO THE PSALMS.

The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world; the dispensations of Providence, and the economy of grace; the transactions of the patriarchs; the exodus of the children of Israel; their journey through the wilderness, and settlement in Canaan; their law, priesthood, and ritual; the exploits of their great men, wrought through faith; their sins and captivities; their repentances and restorations; the sufferings and victories of David; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon; the advent of Messiah, with its effects and consequences; his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood; the effusion of the Spirit; the conversion of the nations; the rejection of the Jews; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church; the end of the world; the general judgment; the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditations. We are instructed how to conceive of them aright, and to express the different affections which, when so conceived of, they must excite in our minds. They are, for this purpose, adorned with the figures, and set off with all the graces of poetry; and poetry itself is designed yet farther to be recommended by the charms of musick, thus consecrated to the service of God; that so delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom, while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the harp of the son of Jesse. This little volume, like the paradise of Eden, affords us in perfection, though in miniature, every thing that groweth elsewhere, "every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food:" and, above all, what was there lost, but is here restored, the tree of life in the midst of the garden. That which we read, as matter of speculation, in the other Scriptures, is reduced to practice, when we recite it in the Psalms; in those, repentance and faith are described, but in these, they are acted; by a perusal of the former, we learn how others served God, but by using the latter, we serve Him ourselves. "What is there necessary for man to know," says the pious and judicious Hooker, "which the Psalms are not able to teach? They are to beginners an easy and familiar introduction, a mighty augmentation of all virtue and knowledge in such as are entered before, a strong confirmation to the most perfect among others. Heroical magnanimity, exquisite justice, grave moderation, exact wisdom, repentance unfeigned, unwearied patience, the mysteries of God, the sufferings of Christ, the terrors of wrath, the comforts of grace, the works of Providence over this world, and the promised joys of that world which is to come; all good neeessary to be either known, or done, or had, this one celestial fountain yieldeth. Let there be any grief or disease incident unto the soul of man, any wound or sickness named, for which there is not, in this treasure-house, a present comfortable remedy at all times ready to be found." In the language of this divine book, therefore, the prayers and praises of the Church have been offered up to the throne of grace, from age to age. And it appears to have been the manual of the Son of God, in the days of his flesh; who, at the conclusion of his last supper, is generally supposed, and that upon good grounds, to have sung an hymn taken from it; who pronounced, on the cross, the beginning of the twenty-second Psalm, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and expired with a part of the thirty-first Psalm in his mouth, "Into thy hands I commend my spirit." Thus He, who had not the Spirit by measure, in whom were hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who spake as never man spake, yet chose to conclude his life, to solace Himself in his greatest agony, and at last to breathe out his soul, in the Psalmist's form of words rather than his own. No tongue of man or angel, as Dr. Hammond justly observes, can convey an higher idea of any book, and of their felicity who use it aright. Bp. Horne.

The Psalms very justly make a principal part of the joint praises that we offer up to God. For though several of them were composed on particular occasions, yet they are plainly fitted for general use; and their insertion into the canon of Scripture proves them to be designed for it: the Jews anciently recited them in the temple, and do still in their synagogues: the New Testament hath recommended them to Christians; and the whole Church hath sung them ever since. Indeed the subject-matter of them is very different: but those of joy are much more numerous than any other sort: and all of them afford ground of praise at least; the doctrinal, the exhortatory, the historical, as well as the rest. Even the plaintive and petitionary minister cause of thanksgiving to Him, who hath promised to hear and support and deliver, and make all "things work together for good to them that love him," Rom. viii. 28. Glory therefore to the blessed Three in One is a fit conclusion to every Psalm.

But in reading them it must be carefully observed, and may with moderate care be commonly distinguished, in whose person the several sentences are spoken. In some Psalms, or portions of Psalms, it is God, or Christ; in others it is wicked men, that speak. These we must repeat as their sayings: and none as our own, but what were intended for us. Even the words of the Psalmist, if we are to adopt them, may frequently seem so unapplicable to the outward condition, or inward frame, of many in every congregation, that, if they attend to them, they cannot say them with truth. But most of them all good people may say, even of themselves singly, with much truth. For they have constantly enemies, temporal or spiritual, afflictions more or less heavy, valuable mercies, and at times warm feelings of pious dispositions: which if not present, may be so recalled, and made their own again, as to be very sincerely expressed to God. And what they cannot say in their own name separately, they may truly say in the name of Christ's church, of which they are members: and they ought, and surely do, bear some share of the mercies and sufferings, the fears and desires, of every part of it, in every state. And as David, in some of the Psalms, takes on him the person of Christ; in others he seems to take that of his disciples; and to speak, not in any one particular character, but as representing the whole body of believers. Or if there be any passages, which neither of these methods will suit; still we may rehearse them as expressing the case of some eminent worthy of old times, and be affected by it accordingly: for we often are strongly affected by the circumstances, well described, not only of distant but of imaginary persons. We may consider, as we go on, the likeness, or the difference, between his situation, his temper, and our own: and raise from it many reflections of sympathy and caution, of humiliation, encouragement, and thankfulness. Thus, at least, we may bring every thing we say home to ourselves: and by so doing furnish our minds with a most valuable store of devout thoughts and language, perhaps for many future occasions of our own or others. For the book of Psalms is so inexhaustible a treasure of every branch of piety, that a more constant use of it, than of any other in the whole Bible hath, with very just reason, been appointed in publick forms of prayer, and recommended in private ones.

It may be objected, that in several of them David utters most bitter imprecations against his enemies: in which, to say nothing harsher, we cannot follow him; for the rule of the New Testament is, "Bless and curse not," Rom. xii. 14. But indeed most, if not all, the places, which appear wishes of evil, may, according to the confessed import of the original, be understood only as predictions of it. Or, supposing them wishes, David might be directed by infinite wisdom to pronounce them even against the opposer of his reigning over Israel; who opposed, at the same time, the known decree of Providence. Repeating them in this view, solely as his, must be innocent: and strongly suggest an important admonition, "not to fight against God," Acts xxiii. 9. But perhaps in some of these, as well as other passages, he speaks in the person of the whole church of God, against all its irreconcileable adversaries, whoever they be. Such was Judas: to whom therefore the two most dreadful of these Psalms are applied, Acts i. 20: and, with the utmost tenderness to the whole of God's creation, we may and must desire the overthrow of them, who obstinately hate Him and his laws. For, though we ought much more to desire the repentance, than the death of a sinner, as He Himself doth: yet if they will not repent, we ought to think and speak with approbation and satisfaction, yet mixed with an awful concern, of their punishments here, and sentence hereafter: which last, St. Paul represents good persons as joining to pronounce: "Do ye not know, that the saints shall judge the world?" 1 Cor. vi. 2.

It may be objected further, that, however this be, the Psalms are unfit for our use on another account: they are full of Jewish notions and phrases. But they were composed by the aid of the Holy Spirit with a view to Christian times: our Saviour appeals particularly to those things, "which are written in the Psalms concerning him," Luke xxiv. 44: and they are many. Nor is the difficulty great, in applying the peculiarities of one dispensation to what answers them in the other: of understanding by the law, the doctrine of Him, who came to fulfil it; by Jerusalem and Zion, the Christian church; by the several sacrifices, that of our blessed Lord, or of our own prayers and praises offered up in his name; by the altar, the holy table; by temporal enemies and deliverances, spiritual ones; and so of the rest: thanking God, at the same time, that we have light afforded us to see so much deeper into this and every book of the Old Testament, than they who wrote it.

Still there may be more passages than a few in the Psalms which many understand not. However, even these they may allowably read over, as undoubtedly they often do other things, in order and in hope to understand them: and by reading with attention, they will come gradually to understand more and more of them. But they would make this much easier to themselves, by reading carefully in private some paraphrase of the Psalms, if they are able to procure one, along with them: such as the larger of Dr. Hammond, or rather of Bishop Patrick, or the smaller of Dr. Nicholls, or Mr. Johnson (or Mr. Travell). The particular passages, which one or other may find obscure to him, are too many to be explained from the pulpit. But the darkest and least edifying in appearance will, by the use of any of these authors, be perceived, either to have some one determined sense of importance, or at least to be capable of several such.

And indeed all considerate Christians will acknowledge the excellence of the Psalter in a good translation. But some object against that, which we have in our Prayer Books, as made in times of less learning and exactness, than the other in our Bibles: which being more correct, they conceive ought to be used instead of it. But indeed as the latter is, in some places, juster than the former; so is the former, in some, juster than that: and it hath one general ground of preference; that, not rendering the words of the Hebrew so strictly, it gives the sense of them more intelligibly: notwithstanding that a few expressions, and but very few, are become in the space of 200 (270) years, which have passed since it was made, less clear or proper than they were at first. Indeed this old version hath here and there additions to what we now find in the original. But the only considerable one is taken from, if not warranted by, the New Testament: they are all harmless: they are most of them founded on authorities not contemptible, particularly on that of the very ancient Latin interpreter, departing from which, without necessity, would have given occasion of cavil to the Romanists. And, as this translation in our Prayer Books was made by martyrs and confessors for the Protestant religion, so it was with reason highly esteemed by the people; and soon grew, by often repeating it, so familiar to them, that changing it for another, though somewhat better on the whole, would have been disagreeable to them. Therefore the sense of both being sufficiently the same, as any one, by comparing them, will be convinced, the words to which the congregation were accustomed, have been retained to this day.

It hath been further objected, that, granting the use of this translation to be justifiable, yet the manner in which we use it is not. For we read it on, just as the Psalms lie: and thus we blend together those of joyful and those of sorrowful import, without distinction and without method; yet we cannot be supposed to vary our affections so quick as this requires. But it should be remembered that on the principal stated fasts and festivals, and on all occasional ones, Psalms proper to them are appointed out of the common course. On days indeed, which have nothing so particular in them, we follow the order in which they are set down. For we could not vary it, without omitting some of them, which none of them deserve; or disposing them in a way intirely new. Now what that should be, would be very hard to settle: and whatever was done, at least as many faults would be found then, as now. The present arrangement is certainly older than our Saviour's days: the publick offices of the whole Christian churches have followed it from the very first account of them that we have; and why should we make alterations, only to raise perplexities? The Psalms are indeed miscellaneous: but so are many other parts of Scripture. The Book of Proverbs is vastly more so. Yet no one objects against reading those as they lie. In truth, scarce a chapter of the Bible or any author whatever can be read, but what calls for variety of dispositions and affections to be exercised, within a very small compass. Even in a short prayer is there not great variety if it be well considered? In poetry and musick these transitions are often extremely abrupt and sudden, from one thing to its contrary in the highest degree. Yet the mind goes along with them very easily. Much more then may it do so, when prepared, as in the present case, by a previous knowledge of what is to come next, and long practice in the change. And if repeating the Psalms in course be right, we have certainly fixed a right period of this course, that of a month: whereas the church of Rome goes through them in a week, which is making one part of the service too long; and the Greek church in twenty days, which is making it hard to find. On the whole then let us but be careful that our behaviour be as good in this branch of worship, as the regulation concerning it is: and notwithstanding the unhappy disadvantage of barely saying, what ought to be enlivened by the power of harmony, we may still, through God's grace, be warned and filled with his Spirit while we "speak to one another and ourselves," as the apostle directs, "in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody," if not with our voices, yet "in our hearts, to the Lord," Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16. Abp. Secker.

That the reader may the more easily turn to such Psalms as will best suit the present state of his mind, according to the different circumstances, whether external or internal, into which, by the changes and chances of life, or the variations of temper and disposition, he may at any time be thrown, the common Table of Psalms, classed under their several subjects, is here subjoined.

A SHORT VOCABULARY,

Giving the signification of some old English words used in this translation, but not commonly spoken or written in this age, at least not in that sense in which our Translators took them (Abridged from "Holy David and his Old English Translators clear'd," 8vo. 1706.)

Beast. Any living creature, except man; not only our Translators, but Mr. Ainsworth, calls serpents and fish "beasts," Gen. iii. 1; Ps. civ. 25. And indeed our last Translators do the same; which shews that the word was taken in this sense for above sixty years after this translation was made.

Blasphemе. To speak reproachfully either of God or man. If we respect the etymology only, it is more properly applicable to man than to God: for it properly signifies to hurt the fame or credit of another. Ps. iv. 2.

Blasphemy. Reproach or slander, either against God, or man, Ps. lxxiii. 8.

Commune. To discourse familiarly, to confer notes.

Counsel. Design, device, decree, or resolution, and not only advice or direction, as it is now commonly taken; Ps. xxxiii. 10.

Eschew. Avoid, shun, decline.

Fain. Glad, merry. We now use it adverbially, namely, "I would fain," that is, gladly: but we do not commonly use it as an adjective, as our ancestors did. See Ps. lxxi. 21.

Flitting. A hasty removal, or flight. It is still used in this sense in some parts of England. Ps. lvi. 8.

Flood. A river or stream. See Ps. lxxii. 8; lxxxix. 26. It should seem this word retained this signification commonly in our language at the beginning of the seventeenth century; for our last Translators use it in this sense, Josh. xxiv. 3; Ps. xcviii. 8.

Health. Safety, protection, power of saving, salvation both spiritual and temporal. It evidently comes from the old English hæl, which had the very same signification, Ps. xxii. 1, &c.; and our last Translators used the word "health" in this sense, Ps. xlii. 11.

Hell. Not only the place of torments, but the place or state of deceased souls, or what we commonly call the other world. It seems to come from "Helan," to cover, or hide, as the Greek "Hades" likewise signifies an obscure or unknown place. Our Translators did well to retain the word in this sense, as they do, Ps. xxx. 3, and often elsewhere: for this helps us to understand those words of our Christian faith, "He descended into Hell;" whereas, by losing the ancient signification of words, the people are in danger to lose the sense and meaning of their Creed. Further, sometimes "Hell" signifies death only, as Ps. xviii. 4; cxvi. 3.

Host. Army, or very great company, very often.

Imagine. To contrive, plot, design; so it signifies in the statute of treason, which makes it a crime punishable with death "to imagine the death of the King," &c. as Ps. ii. 1, and very often.

Instantly. Importunately, zealously, Ps. lv. 18. We still say that a thing was done "at the instance," that is, at the earnest request, of another. The adjective INSTANT signifies importunate, in our last translation, Luke xxiii. 23, and in other places.

Leasing. Lying, cheating, dissembling, Ps. iv. 2.

Lust. Not only filthy carnal desires, but any eagerness of appetite, or violent irregular inclination, Ps. x. 2. So to "lust," and to "list," signify the same thing in this translation, Ps. lxxiii. 7.

Malicious. Very bad, evil, &c. Ps. lix. 5. We now commonly understand by this word, spiteful, envious; the ancients did not so.

Nethermost. Lowest, Ps. lxxxvi. 13. "Nether" is used for lower, by our last Translators, Deut. xxiv. 6, &c.

Plague. Any blow or stroke of God's correcting or punishing hand, Ps. xxxviii. 17; not the pestilence only. "To plague," in common discourse, signifies, to use any severe proceedings.

Port. Gate, from the Latin "Porta." We still call him who keeps the gate porter, Ps. ix. 14.

Preacher. Not only he that discourses publickly of religion, but any one that publishes or declares any thing, Ps. lxviii. 11; lix. 12. So "to preach" signifies to publish or declare.

Prevent. To go, or be before. There are two designs which one may have in "going before" another; either to guide and help, or to hinder or stop: accordingly the word signifies two contrary things, namely, to help forward, and to oppose, hinder, &c. In the Scripture and Liturgy, it is for the most part taken in the good sense, to guide, help forward, assist, or be beforehand in kindness, as Ps. xxi. 3; sometimes in the bad sense to hinder, stand in one's way, &c. Ps. xviii. 18: at other places barely to go, or be before, as Ps. cxix. 148; and 1 Thess. iv. 15.

Quick. Alive; and so to "quicken," signifies to give or restore life, to revive or enliven, Ps. cxxiv. 2; xxii. 30.

Rebuke. Not only severe reprehension, but any manner of hard or reproachful language. Ps. lxix. 21.

Reproof is used in much the same sense with the former word rebuke, and does not only import, grave and severe admonition, but any manner of reproachful language, any speech whereby we shew our dislike of another's words or actions. Ps. lxix. 20.

Simple. Unmixt, plain, without any fraud or guile, or worldly policy; like a child, that has no heart or cunning to help himself in any difficulty, and therefore is often oppressed and over-reached by crafty and sharp men. It is generally used in a good sense in the Psalms and New Testament; namely, for plain, undesigning, though abused men; but then, because such are subject to be caught and drawn into evil, by political and artificial men, therefore sometimes it denotes those who by this means are betrayed to sin, and a fault committed through this easy unwary temper, is called "simpleness," Ps. lxix. 5.

Well. A spring, fountain, or small stream, not only a deep dug pit, as now it commonly signifies, Ps. xxxvi. 9; lxxxiv. 6.

Wholesome. Safe. We still say, "wholesome food, air, law, counsel," Ps. xx. 6.

Wiliness. Cunning, guile. We still use the word "wiles," from whence this comes, Ps. x. 2.

World. Age, time, not only the universe or earth: thus it signifies in the doxology "world," that is, age, or time, "without end." So in the Nicene Creed, "before all worlds;" that is, before all ages, or before time itself was, Ps. xlv. 18.

Worship. Majesty, dignity, excellency, what deserves to be honoured, or is honoured; that glory and power in God, to which we pay our devotion: for so it signified to our Saxon ancestors. Our Translators use the word in this sense, Ps. iii. 3; xcvi. 6; and elsewhere. We now by "worship," most commonly mean that honour which we pay to God; and our Translators often take it in that sense also. Further; "worship" does not only signify the eminent dignity which is in God, but that which is in a low degree in man: and this sense of the word is not yet lost even in our own common language; for we still call that honour and authority which belongs to a magistrate, "his worship." Our Translators retain the word also in this sense, when they say that "God gives worship," that is, honour and dignity, "to them who lead a godly life," Ps. lxxxiv. 12. Nay, our last Translators use the word in the same sense, Luke xiv. 10: where it is said, that the humble guest "shall have worship in the presence of those who sit at meat with him." Who can then wonder, that in the matrimonial office the husband is taught to "worship" his wife? that is, to pay her all due respect. For no one ever understood more by that expression, except he were blinded by unpardonable ignorance, or prejudice. There is then an honour, glory, dignity, or worship in the divine nature; and so there is, or may be, in men too. We must pay honour, glory, worship, principally to God, but in an inferior sense to men. It has been said that most controversies now depending, are chiefly a strife about words. And from what has been said briefly concerning this and other words in this short vocabulary, it will appear, that several particulars which have been objected against in our Psalter, our Liturgy, and our very Creed, are far enough from being faulty in themselves, and have been thought so by some men, merely because they do not understand their own tongue.

THE

THE FIRST DAY.

MORNING PRAYER.

PSALM i.[b] Beatus vir, qui non abiit &c.

BLESSED is the man[c] that hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners: and hath not sat in the seat of the scornful.

2 But his delight is in the law of the Lord[d]: and in his law will he exercise himself day and night.

doth he meditate. Bib. Trans.

3 And he shall be like a tree[e] planted by the water-side: that will bring forth his fruit in due season.

4 His leaf also shall not wither: and look, whatsoever he doeth, it shall prosper.

5 As for the ungodly, it is not so with them: but they are like the chaff, which the wind scattereth away from the face of the earth.

6 Therefore the ungodly[f] shall not be able to stand in the judgement: shall not be acquitted. See Luke xxi. 36.

[a] The Psalms of David.] The whole collection of Psalms goes by the name of "The Psalms of David," not because they were all composed by him, but because most of them were: the whole receiving their denomination from the greater part. Some were written before David's time, as the 90th Psalm by Moses: some after the Babylonian Captivity, as the 126th and 127th. Dr. Nicholls.

[b] PSALM i.] This Psalm, which is generally looked upon by expositors as a preface or introduction to the rest, describes the blessedness of the righteous: consisting, ver. 1, negatively, in their abstaining from sin; 2, positively, in holy meditation on the Scriptures, productive of continual growth in grace; which, 3, 4, is beautifully represented under an image borrowed from vegetation: as, 5, is the opposite state of the unbelieving and ungodly by a comparison taken from the threshing-floor. The two last verses foretel the final issue of things, with respect to both good and bad men, at the great day. Bp. Horne. The end of man is blessedness; and the way to it observance of God's law: which the Psalmist lays down here, as the foundation of the whole ensuing work. Bp. Patrick.

[c] 1. Blessed is the man &c.] The Psalter, like the sermon on the Mount, openeth with a beatitude for our comfort and encouragement, directing us immediately to that happiness, which all mankind, in different ways, are seeking and inquiring after. All would secure themselves from the incursions of misery; but all do not consider that misery is the offspring of sin, from which it is therefore necessary to be delivered and preserved, in order to become happy or blessed. Bp. Horne.

[d] 2. But his delight is in the law of the Lord: &c.] He, who hath once brought himself to delight in the Scriptures, will find no temptation to exchange that pleasure for any which the world or the flesh can offer him. Such an one will make the lively oracles of God his companions by day and by night. He will have recourse to them for direction, in the bright and cheerful hours of prosperity; to them he will apply for comfort, in the dark and dreary seasons of adversity. Bp. Horne.

[e] 3, &c. And he shall be like a tree &c.] By continual meditation in the sacred writings, a man as naturally improves and advances in holiness, as a tree thrives and flourishes in a kindly and well-watered soil. In this description of the righteous all appears verdant and fruitful, lovely and enduring: but in that, which follows, of the ungodly, we are by way of contrast presented with nothing but what is withered and worthless, without form or stability, blown about by every wind, and at length finally dispersed from the face of the earth by the breath of God's displeasure, and driven into the fire prepared for it. Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. Therefore the ungodly &c.] The judgment here intended is evidently the last judgment, and the congregation of the righteous is their assembly at the tribunal of Christ at the last day. Bp. Horsley. A day is coming, when the divine Husbandman shall appear with his "fan in his hand," and shall "throughly purge his floor." The wheat, which shall stand the winnowing of that day, will be gathered into the celestial granary; while the chaff, for ever separated from it, shall be hurried out of the floor, and carried, by a mighty whirlwind, to its own place. Then shall there be a "congregation of the righteous," in which "sinners shall not stand." At present wheat and chaff lie on one floor; wheat and tares grow in one field; good and bad fishes are comprehended in one net; good and bad men are contained in the visible church. But, however we may be deceived in the judgment we form of men in this scene of confu-neither the sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

approves and highly esteems their obedience. Bp. Patrick.

7 But the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous : and the way of the ungodly shall perish.

Easter Day, first Psalm Morn. Serv.

PSALM ii.[g] Quare fremuerunt gentes?

WHY do the heathen[h] so furiously rage together : and why do the people imagine a vain thing?

contrive, devise. See Vocab.

2 The kings of the earth stand up, and the rulers take counsel together : against the Lord, and against his Anointed.

3 Let us break their bonds[i] asunder : and cast away their cords from us.

4 He that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh them to scorn[k] : the Lord shall have them in derision.

5 Then shall he speak[l] unto them in his wrath : and vex them in his sore displeasure.

6 Yet have I set my King : upon my holy hill of Sion.

7 I will preach[m] the law[n], whereof the Lord hath said unto me : Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.

n I will declare the decree. Bib. Trans.

sion, "The Lord knoweth them that are his," 2 Tim. ii. 19. Their good deeds are not unobserved, nor will they be forgotten by Him. His eye seeth them in secret, and his hand will reward them openly in the day of final retribution : when crowns of glory shall sparkle on the heads of the righteous, but shame and torment shall be the portion of the wicked; "the way of the ungodly shall perish." Bp. Horne.

[g] PSALM ii.] This Psalm is a most divine mixture of history and prophecy, certainly composed by David, and referring visibly to his person, and both typically and prophetically to Christ, and so understood expressly by the writers of the New Testament. Dr. Hammond. That this was a prophecy of the Messiah all the ancient Jews did allow : and Rabbi Solomon Jarchi says plainly, "Our doctors explained the signification of this psalm of King Messias; but that we may better answer the Minnim," that is, the heretical Christians, "it is better to interpret it of David." Dr. Nicholls.

David, seated upon the throne of Israel, notwithstanding the opposition made against him, and now about to carry his victorious arms amongst the neighbouring heathen nations, may be supposed to have penned this, as a kind of inauguration psalm. But that "a greater than David is here," appears not only from the strength of the expressions, which are more properly applicable to Messiah, than to David himself; but also from the citations made in the New Testament; the appointment of the Psalm by the Church to be read on Easter-day; and the confession of the Jewish rabbis. It treats therefore, 1—3, of the opposition raised, both by Jew and Gentile, against the kingdom of Jesus Christ; 4—6, of his victory, and the confusion of his enemies; 7—9, after his resurrection, He preaches the Gospel, and 10—12, calls the kings of the earth to accept it; denouncing vengeance against those who shall not do so, and pronouncing a blessing on those who shall. Bp. Horne.

The song consists of three parts : the first, consisting of the first six verses, spoken in the person of the Psalmist; the second, namely, the 7th, 8th, and 9th verses, in the person of Messiah; and the third again by the Psalmist. Bp. Horsley.

[h] 1. Why do the heathen &c.] The true David is introduced, like his ancestor of old, expostulating with the nations, for their vain attempts to frustrate the divine decree in his favour. These two verses are cited Acts iv. 25, and expounded of "Herod and Pontius Pilate," who "with the Gentiles and the people of Israel were gathered together against the holy Jesus, whom the Lord had anointed." After the ascension of Christ, and the effusion of the Spirit, the whole power of the Roman empire was employed in the same cause by those, who, from time to time, swayed the sceptre of the world. But still, they who intended to extirpate the faith, and destroy the church, how many and how mighty soever they might be, were found only to "imagine a vain thing." And equally vain will every imagination be, that exalteth itself against the counsels of God for the salvation of his people. Bp. Horne.

[i] 3. Let us break their bonds &c.] These words, supposed to be spoken by the powers in arms against Messiah, discover to us the true grounds of opposition, namely, the unwillingness of rebellious nature to submit to the obligations of divine laws, which cross the interests, and lay a restraint upon the desires of men. Corrupt affections are the most inveterate enemies of Christ : and their language is, "We will not have this man to rule over us." Bp. Horne.

[k] 4. He that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh them to scorn, &c.] By these, and such like expressions, which frequently occur in the Scripture, we are taught, in a language which we understand, because borrowed from ourselves, and our manner of shewing contempt, how the schemes of worldly politicians appear to Him, who, sitting upon his heavenly throne, surveys at a glance whatever men are doing, or contriving to do, upon earth. The same is to be said with regard to words which seem to attribute many other human passions and affections to the Deity : as, for instance, these which follow. Bp. Horne.

[l] 5, 6. Then shall he speak &c.] The meaning is, that, by pouring out his indignation upon the adversaries of Messiah, as formerly upon those of David, God would no less evidently convict and reprove their folly and impiety, than if He had actually thus spoken to them from his eternal throne above : "Yet, notwithstanding all your rage against him, have I raised from the dead, and exalted as the Head of the church, my appointed King Messiah; in like manner as I once set his victorious representative David upon my holy hill of Sion, in the earthly Jerusalem, out of the reach of his numerous and implacable enemies." Bp. Horne.

[m] 7. I will preach the law, &c.] Jesus, for the suffering of death, crowned with honour and immortality, upon the holy hill of Zion, in the new Jerusalem, now "declares the decree," or preaches the Gospel of the everlasting covenant. His part in the covenant was performed by keeping the law, and dying for the sins of men. Nothing therefore remained, but the accomplishment of the promise made to Him by the Father, upon those conditions. One part of this promise was fulfilled, saith St. Paul, "in that he had raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the second Psalm, Thou art

8 Desire of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance : and the utmost parts of the earth for thy possession.

9 Thou shalt bruise them[o] with a rod of iron : and break them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

be instructed. Bib. Trans.

11 Serve the Lord in fear : and rejoice unto him with reverence[q].

12 Kiss the Son[r], lest he be angry, and so ye perish from the right way : if his wrath be kindled, (yea, but a little,) blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

PSALM iii.[s] Domine, quid multiplicati?

my Son, this day have I begotten thee," Acts xiii. 33. Another part was fulfilled in the ascension of Christ, and his inauguration to an eternal kingdom, and an unchangeable priesthood, as the true Melchizedek, King of righteousness, King of peace, and Priest of the most high God. The next article in the covenant, on the Father's side, was the enlargement of Messiah's spiritual kingdom, by the accession of the nations to the church. And accordingly, this was the next thing which "Jehovah said unto him," after having proclaimed his sonship and pre-eminence; as we find by the following verse. Bp. Horne.

[n] — the law.] The original word signifies many things; a writing, and so particularly a covenant, subscribed by the parties' hands, a decree, a precept, a rite, &c. In the historical sense it was first a decree in heaven; then a covenant with David and his seed, see Ps. lxxxix. 3; and withal a command of obedience to his subjects. In the mystical sense it principally denotes the covenant made with and in Christ; which covenant also was an immutable decree under God's oath, Luke i. 73; and a law also, first in respect of Christ, requiring somewhat of Him, for He "was to suffer and so to enter into his glory;" and, secondly, in respect of us, the law of faith, exacting from us an uniform obedience to Him in the exercise of all his offices. Dr. Hammond.

[o] 9. Thou shalt bruise them &c.] The irresistible power and inflexible justice of Christ's kingdom are signified by his "ruling with a rod of iron :" the impotence of those, who presume to oppose Him, is compared to that of "a potter's vessel," which must fly in pieces at the first stroke of the iron rod. The power of Christ will be manifested in all, by the destruction either of sin or of the sinner. Bp. Horne.

[p] 10—12. Be wise now therefore, O ye kings : &c.] The decree of the Father, concerning the kingdom of the Son, being thus promulgated by the latter, an exhortation is here made to the kings of the earth, that they should learn true wisdom, and suffer themselves to be instructed unto salvation; that they would bow their sceptres to the cross of Jesus, and cast their crowns before his throne; esteeming it a far greater honour, as well as a more exalted pleasure, to serve Him, than to find themselves at the head of victorious armies, surrounded by applauding nations. Bp. Horne.

[q] — with reverence.] Literally, "with trembling :" but the thing meant is that sort of fear, which arises from a man's diffidence of his own strength and power: a notion which the word "trembling" not at all conveys in our language. "Serve the Lord," says the Psalmist, "with fear; and rejoice," take satisfaction, joy, and glory to yourselves in becoming his servants. But let it be a holy, temperate joy, fearful of offence, not heedless and presumptuous, verging on the licentious kind. Bp. Horsley.

[r] 12. Kiss the Son, &c.] To "kiss" is used for adoration. So in 1 Kings xix. 18, we find together the "bowing of the knees" to Baal, and the "mouths kissing him." And so it fitly belongs to Messiah, in respect of his divine nature, to which that is truly due, which was idolatrously paid to Baal. Dr. Hammond.

Christ beseeches kings, no less than their subjects, to be reconciled to Him, and by Him to the Father: since a day is at hand, when mighty men shall have no distinction, but that of being mightily tormented. And then will be seen the "blessedness" of those who "put their trust in" the Lord Jesus. For when the glory of man shall fade away as the short-lived flower of the field, and when all, that is called great and honourable in princes, shall be laid low in the dust, He shall give unto his faithful servants a crown without cares, and a kingdom which cannot be moved. Bp. Horne.

[s] Psalm iii.] This Psalm is said to have been composed by David, when he fled from his son Absalom. Thus circumstanced, he expressed himself in terms well adapted to the parallel case of the Son of David, persecuted by rebellious Israel; as also to that of his church suffering tribulation in the world. 1, 2, he complains, in much anguish, of the multitude of his enemies, and of the reproaches cast upon him, as one forsaken by God; but, 3, declares, notwithstanding, his sure trust in the divine promises; 4, 5, he relates the success of his prayers; 6—8, derides the impotent malice of his enemies, and ascribes salvation to Jehovah. Bp. Horne.

The forlorn condition of David, as recorded in 2 Sam. xv, and commemorated in this Psalm, is in some degree typical of our Saviour's sadness and agony and prayer in the garden, John xviii. 1, which is the same with Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32; and that on mount Olivet, Luke xxii. 39. 41, the very same mount, to which David went up, when he poured out the substance of this prayer. Dr. Hammond.

[t] 3. But thou, O Lord, art my defender : &c.] In this, as in all the Psalms of the like argument, the complaint and petitions for relief and help are intermixed with expressions of praise and thanksgiving for former mercies, professions of secure reliance on God's protection, and of joy in the expectation of a final deliverance. Bp. Horsley.

[u] 4. I did call upon the Lord, &c.] David, driven thousands of the people : that have set themselves against me round about.

7 Up, Lord, and help me, O my God : for thou smitest all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone[y]; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly.

8 Salvation belongeth unto the Lord[z] : and thy blessing is upon thy people.

PSALM iv.[a] Cum invocarem.

the Defender of my right. Dr. Nicholls.

HEAR me when I call, O God of my righteousness : thou hast set me at liberty when I was in trouble; have mercy upon me, and hearken unto my prayer.

2 O ye sons of men, how long will ye blaspheme mine honour[b] : and have such pleasure in vanity, and seek after leasing? reproach and defame it. See Vocab. Lying, falsehood. See Vocab.

3 Know this also[c], that the Lord hath chosen to himself the man that is godly : when I call upon the Lord, he will hear me.

4 Stand in awe, and sin not[d] : commune with your own heart, and in your chamber, and be still.

5 Offer the sacrifice of righteousness[e] : and put your trust in the Lord.

from Jerusalem, still looked and prayed towards the "holy hill" of Sion. Christ, when a stranger on the earth, "made supplication with strong crying," to his Father in heaven. Christ was heard for his own sake : David was heard, and we shall be heard, through Him. Bp. Horne.

[z] 5. I laid me down and slept &c.] Behold David in the midst of danger, sleeping without fear; secure, through the divine protection, of awaking to engage and vanquish his enemies. Behold the Son of David composing Himself to his rest upon the cross, that bed of sorrows; and commending his spirit into his Father's hands, in full confidence of a joyful resurrection, according to the promise, at the time appointed. Behold this, O Christian, and let faith teach thee how to sleep, and how to die; while it assures thee, that as sleep is a short death, so death is only a longer sleep; and that the same God watches over thee, in thy bed and in thy grave. Bp. Horne.

[y] 7. — thou smitest all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; &c.] Striking the cheek is an expression of the greatest reproach, see 1 Kings xxii. 24; Job xvi. 10; Lam iii. 30. And so it is a proverbial phrase to signify putting to flight, for that is the most shameful and reproachful to an army. The same is the meaning of the latter part of the verse, "thou hast broken their teeth;" the teeth being the weapons by which lions tear their prey. See Psalm lviii. 6. Dr. Hammond.

[z] 8. Salvation belongeth unto the Lord: &c.] The Psalm ends with an acknowledgment, which ought always to fill the heart, and upon every proper occasion to flow from the mouth, of a Christian : namely, that salvation is not to be had from man, from the kings of the earth, or the gods of the heathen, from saints or angels; but from Jehovah alone : to whom alone therefore the glory should be ascribed. If He will save, none can destroy : if He will destroy, none can save. Let Balak then curse Israel, or hire Balaam to curse them for him : be but "thy blessing, O Lord, upon thy people," and it sufficeth. Bp. Horne.

[a] PSALM iv.] The person speaking in this Psalm, 1, prayeth to be heard by God; 2, convinceth the world of sin; 3, declareth the righteous to be under the divine protection; 4, 5, prescribeth solitude and meditation, as the proper means to lead men to repentance and faith; 6, 7, sheweth that in God alone peace and comfort are to be found; and, 8, how superior the joys of the spirit are to those of sense; 9, reposeth himself, in full assurance of faith, on the loving-kindness of the Lord. Bp. Horne.

The Psalm is said to have been composed by David, possibly on the same or on a like occasion as the third. Dr. Hammond.

[b] 2. — how long will ye blaspheme mine honour: &c.] How long will you revile and speak evil of my regal dignity? How long will you give out such base calumnies against me, and industriously make use of lying to support your bad cause? Dr. Nicholls.

[c] 3. Know this also, &c.] Be the opinions or the practices of men what they will, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand. Is David "set apart" for the kingdom of Israel? Saul shall not be able to detain, nor Absalom to wrest it from him. Is Messiah ordained to be King of the Israel of God? death and hell shall not prevent it. Are his disciples appointed to reign with Him? infallibly they shall. Our intercessor is already on high; and for his sake the Lord will hear us when "we call upon him." What, then, can be said for us, if we neglect to call upon Him. Bp. Horne.

[d] 4. Stand in awe, and sin not: &c.] The enemies of Christ, as well as those of David, are here called to repentance, and the process of conversion is described. The above-mentioned consideration of the divine counsel, and the certainty of its being carried into execution, by the salvation of the righteous, and the confusion of their enemies, makes the wicked "tremble." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom:" it arrests the sinner in his course, and he "sins not," he goes no farther in the way of sin, but stops and reflects upon what he has been doing : he "communes with his own heart upon his bed, and is still;" his conscience suffers him not to rest in the night, but takes the advantage of solitude and silence, to set before him his transgressions, with all the terrors of death and judgment; stirring him up to confess the former, and deprecate the latter, with unfeigned compunction and sorrow of heart; to turn unto the Lord, and to do works meet for repentance; to learn to do good, as well as to cease from doing evil. Bp. Horne.

[e] 5. Offer the sacrifice of righteousness: &c.] The Jews are no longer to offer the shadowy sacrifices of their law, since He, who is the substance of them all, is come into the world. The Gentiles are no more to offer their idolatrous sacrifices, since their idols have fallen before the cross. But returning sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, are to offer the same "sacrifices of" evangelical "righteousness," not "putting their trust" in them, but "in the Lord" Jesus, through whose Spirit they are enabled to offer, and through whose blood their offerings are acceptable unto God. Bp. Horne.

6 There be many that say[f]: Who will shew us any good?

[f] 6. There be many that say: &c.] The two former verses were addressed to rebellious sinners, inviting them to repentance and reformation. This seems to relate to the righteous, who, in times of calamity and persecution, like the friends of distressed David, are tempted to despond, on seeing no end to their troubles. The Psalmist, therefore, prescribes prayer to all such, as an antidote against the temptation; he directs them, in the darkest night, to look towards heaven, nor doubt the return of day, when the rising sun shall diffuse light and salvation, and sorrow and sighing shall fly away. How many are continually asking the question in this verse! How few applying to Him, who alone can give an answer of peace and comfort! Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. Thou hast put gladness in my heart: &c.] According to this translation, the verse is an expression of the Psalmist's gratitude, that God had given him grace not to make any ill returns for the unkindness of his enemies, but had enabled him to be heartily glad for the benefits, especially the fruitful seasons, which God had bestowed upon them. Dr. Nicholls. Or, according to the Bible translation, it is a declaration, that the very thoughts of God's love had filled the Psalmist's heart with such joy, that it far exceeded all the pleasure his enemies could take, in seeing their barns full of corn, and their presses overflow with wine. Bp. Patrick.

[h] 9. I will lay me down in peace, &c.] This conclusion affords ample matter for profitable and delightful meditation, if it be considered, first, as spoken by David, or any other believer, when lying down to rest, full of the joys of a good conscience, and faith unfeigned: secondly, as pronounced by the true David, when composing Himself to his rest, in certain hope of a resurrection. And happy the Christian, who having nightly, with this verse, committed himself to his bed, as to his grave, shall at last, with the same words, resign himself to his grave, as to his bed, from which he expects in due time to arise, and sing a morning hymn, with the children of the resurrection. Bp. Horne.

[i] PSALM v.] This Psalm was composed by David: but whether when he was persecuted by Saul or by Absalom, cannot be certainly determined. Bp. Patrick.

The Psalmist in affliction, 1—3, continues and resolves to continue instant in prayer; 4—6, declares the irreconcileable hatred which God bears to sin, and, 7, his own confidence of being accepted; 8, he petitions for grace to direct and preserve him in the way; 9, 10, sets forth the wickedness of his enemies; 11, foretels their punishment; and 12, 13, the salvation of the faithful. Bp. Horne.

[k] 2. O hearken thou &c.] Although nothing can really hinder or divert the divine attention, yet God is represented as "not hearing," when either the person is unacceptable, or the petition improper, or when He would thoroughly prove the faith and patience of the petitioner. Bp. Horne.

[l] 5. Such as be foolish shall not stand &c.] Or "the mad men," as the word properly signifies, as Eccles. ii. 2. 12; vii. 7; x. 13; Isa. xliv. 25: that is, wicked men, as the next words explain it; who are indeed morally and really mad men in fighting with the Lord God Almighty, and in exposing themselves to such dreadful hazards and mischiefs for such mean and momentary advantages. Poole.

[m] 6. Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing: &c.] Falsehood, blood-thirstiness, and deceitfulness, are here marked out as characteristical of the enemies of David, of Christ, and the church; and history evinces them so to have been. Bp. Horne.

[n] 7. But as for me, &c.] Wisdom, righteousness, truth, mercy, and sincerity, form a character the reverse of that drawn in the preceding verses, and such an one as God will accept, when appearing before Him in his house, and offering with humility and reverence the sacrifices of the new law, as David did those of the old, through faith in Him who alone filled up the character, and procured acceptance for believers, and their oblations. Bp. Horne.

[o] 8. Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness, &c.] The child of God, admitted into his holy temple, there prefers this petition, praying to be led by the divine Spirit in a course of holy obedience, all impediments being removed out of the way, which otherwise might obstruct the progress, or cause the fall, of one beginning to walk in the path of life; of one who had many "enemies" ready to contrive, to take advantage of, to rejoice and triumph in, his ruin. Bp. Horne.

The words are a petition both for illuminating, and for directing and assisting grace. The Psalmist prays the Lord, to give him a clear sight of his duty; and to mies : make thy way plain before my face.

9 For there is no faithfulness in his mouth[p] : their inward parts are very wickedness.

10 Their throat is an open sepulchre : they flatter with their tongue.

projects or designs. See Vocab.

12 And let all them[r] that put their trust in thee rejoice : they shall ever be giving of thanks, because thou defendest them; they that love thy Name shall be joyful in thee;

EVENING PRAYER.

Ash-Wednesday, first Psalm Morn. Serv. correct me not with extreme severity. Dr. Nicholls.

PSALM vi.[s] Domine, ne in furore.

O Lord, rebuke me not in thine indignation : neither chasten me in thy displeasure.

2 Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak : O Lord, heal me, for my bones are vexed[t].

3 My soul also is sore troubled : but, Lord, how long wilt thou punish me?

4 Turn thee, O Lord, and deliver my soul : O save me for thy mercy's sake.

5 For in death no man remembereth thee : and who will give thee thanks in the pit?

6 I am weary of my groaning; every night wash I my bed: and water my couch with my tears.

7 My beauty is gone for very trouble : and worn away because of all mine enemies.

8 Away from me[u], all ye that work vanity : for the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping.

incline his heart to walk exactly, and so acceptably before God. Dr. Hammond.

[p] 9. For there is no faithfulness in his mouth: &c.] A part of this verse is cited, Rom. iii. 13, together with several other passages from the Psalms and Prophets, to evince the depravity of mankind, whether Jews or Gentiles, till justified by faith, and renewed by grace. It is plain, therefore, that the description was designed for others besides the enemies of the literal David, and is of more general import, reaching to the world of the ungodly, and to the enemies of all righteousness, as manifested in the person of Messiah, and in his church. The charge brought against these is, that "truth" and "fidelity" were not to be found in their dealings with God or each other; that their "inward parts" were very wickedness; their first thoughts and imaginations were defiled, and the stream was poisoned at the fountain; that their "throat was an open sepulchre," continually emitting, in obscene and impious language, the noisome and infectious exhalations of a putrid heart, entombed in a body of sin; and that, if ever they put on the appearance of goodness, they "flattered with their tongue," in order the more effectually to deceive and destroy. Bp. Horne.

[q] 11. Destroy thou them, O God, &c.] Concerning passages of this imprecatory kind in the book of Psalms, it is to be observed, that they are not spoken of private and personal enemies, but of the opposers of God and his Anointed; nor of any among these, but the irreclaimable and finally impenitent; and this by way of prediction, rather than imprecation; which would appear, if the original verbs were translated uniformly in the future tense, as they might be, and indeed, to cut off all occasion from them which desire it, should be translated. The verse before us would then run thus—"Thou wilt destroy them, O God; they shall perish by their own counsels: thou wilt cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee." The words, when rendered in this form, contain a prophecy of the infatuation, rejection, and destruction of such as should obstinately persevere in their opposition to the counsels of Heaven, whether relating to David, to Christ, or to the church. The fate of Ahithophel and Absalom, of Judas and the Jews, should warn others not to offend after the same example. Bp. Horne.

[r] 12. And let all them &c.] As the last verse foretold the perdition of the ungodly, this describes the felicity of the saints; who, trusting in God, rejoice evermore, and sing aloud in the church the praises of their Saviour and mighty Defender; the love of whose name fills their hearts with joy unspeakable, while they experience the comforts of grace, and expect the rewards of glory. Bp. Horne.

[s] Psalm vi.] This is the first of those Psalms which are styled penitential. It contains, 1, a deprecation of eternal vengeance, and 2, 3, a petition for pardon; which is enforced from the consideration of the penitent's sufferings; 4, from that of the divine mercy; 5, from that of the praise and glory which God would fail to receive, if man were destroyed; 6, 7, from that of the penitent's humiliation and contrition: 8—10, the strain changes into one of joy and triumph, upon the success and return of the prayer. Bp. Horne.

This Psalm was penned by David on some occasion of special humiliation, for the confession of his sins, and averting God's wrath. Dr. Hammond. Being one of the penitential Psalms, it is appointed to be used

PSALM vii.[y] Domine, Deus meus.

O Lord my God, in thee have I put my trust : save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me;

2 Lest he devour my soul, like a lion[z], and tear it in pieces : while there is none to help.

3 O Lord my God, if I have done[a] any such thing : or if there be any wickedness in my hands;

4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that dealt friendly with me : yea, I have delivered him that without any cause is mine enemy;

5 Then let mine enemy persecute my soul, and take me : yea, let him tread my life down upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust.

bury all my reputation with my body in the grave. Dr. Nicholls.

6 Stand up, O Lord, in thy wrath[b], and lift up thyself, because of the indignation of mine enemies : arise up for me in the judgement that thou hast commanded.

7 And so shall the congregation of the people[c] come about thee : for their sakes therefore lift up thyself again.

8 The Lord shall judge the people[d]; give sentence with me, O Lord : according to my righteousness, and according to the innoceney that is in me.

on Ash-Wednesday, and is suitable to the condition of those, who are any way afflicted or distressed in mind, body, or estate. Travell.

[t] 2. — my bones are vexed.] That is, every part of my body; it being an ordinary figure among the Hebrews to express a thing by the names of its parts. Thus Psalm xxxv. 10, "All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee?" where the "bones" signify the Psalmist himself, his tongue, and heart, and every part of him. Dr. Hammond.

[u] 8. Away from me, &c.] Repentance, having performed her task, having taught her votary to forsake sin, and to renounce all communication with sinners, now gives place to faith, which appears with the glad tidings of pardon and acceptance, causing the penitent to rejoice in God his Saviour, with joy unspeakable : and inspiring his heart with vigour and resolution to run his course in the way of righteousness. Bp. Horne.

[x] 10. All mine enemies &c.] Many of the mournful Psalms end in this manner, to instruct the believer, that he is continually to look forward, and solace himself with beholding that day, when his warfare shall be accomplished; when sin and sorrow shall be no more; when sudden and everlasting confusion shall cover the enemies of righteousness; when the sackcloth of the penitent shall be exchanged for a robe of glory; when to sighs and groans shall succeed the songs of heaven, set to angelic harps, and faith shall be resolved into the vision of the Almighty. Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm vii.] David is said to have composed this Psalm concerning the words, or the matter of Cush the Benjamite. Whether Saul, or Shimei, or any one else, be intended under this name, it is sufficiently clear, that David had been maliciously aspersed and calumniated by such a person; that the Psalm was written to vindicate himself from the imputation, whatever was the nature of it; and, consequently, may be considered as the appeal of the true David and his disciples, against the grand accuser and his associates. The person speaking, 1, 2, declares his trust to be in God; 3—5, protests his innocence; 6—8, desires that judgment may be given in the cause; 9—11, prays for the abolition of sin, and the full establishment of righteousness; 12—14, sets forth the divine judgments against sinners; 15—17, describes the beginning, progress, and end of sin, with, 18, the joy and triumph of the faithful. Bp. Horne.

[z] 2. Lest he devour my soul, like a lion, &c.] The "lion," of whom David stood in fear, was probably Saul, roused by a false accusation, to destroy him. The rage of tyrants is often in the same manner excited against the church. And we all have reason to dread the fury of one who is "the roaring lion," as well as the "accuser of the brethren." From him none can deliver us, but God only. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3. O Lord my God, if I have done &c.] David makes a solemn appeal to God, the searcher of hearts, to judge of his innocence, with regard to the particular crime laid to his charge. Any person, when slandered, may do the same. But Christ only could call upon heaven to attest his universal uprightness. Bp. Horne.

[b] 6. Stand up, O Lord, in thy wrath, &c.] To a protestation of innocence succeeds a prayer for judgment upon the case, which is formed on these two considerations: first, the unreasonable and unrelenting fury of the persecutors; secondly, the justice which God has "commanded" others to execute, and which therefore He Himself will doubtless execute upon such occasions. Let injured innocence ever comfort itself with the remembrance of another day to come, when, every earth-born cloud being removed, it shall dazzle its oppressors with lustre far superior to that of the noon-day sun. Bp. Horne.

[c] 7. And so shall the congregation of the people, &c.] The meaning is, that a visible display of God's righteous judgment would induce multitudes who should behold, or hear of it, to adore and glorify Him. For their sakes, therefore, as well as that of the sufferer, He is intreated to re-ascend the tribunal as formerly, and pronounce the wished-for sentence. Bp. Horne.

[d] 8. The Lord shall judge the people; &c.] Conscious of his "righteousness" and "integrity," as to the matter in question, David desires to be judged by Him who is to judge the world at the last day. How few, among Christians, have seriously and deliberately considered, whether the sentence of that day is likely to be in their favour! Yet, how many, with the utmost composure and self-complacency, repeat continually the words of this Psalm, as well as those in the Te Deum, "We believe that thou shalt come to be

PSALM viii.[i] Domine, Dominus noster.

Ascension-day, first Psalm Morn. Serv.

O Lord our Governour [k], how excellent is thy Name in all the world: thou that hast set thy glory above the heavens!

our Judge!" Legal, or perfect righteousness and integrity, are peculiar to the Redeemer; but evangelical righteousness and integrity all must have, who would be saved. Bp. Horne.

[c] 9—11. O let the wickedness of the ungodly &c.] It is predicted, that wickedness will, in the end, be abolished, and the just immoveably established, by Him who knoweth intimately the very thoughts and desires of both good and bad men, and will give to each their due reward. Happy the man whose hope is therefore in God, because He saveth the upright or "true of heart!" Bp. Horne.

[f] 13. If a man will not turn, &c.] The sinner, who is not converted by the vengeance inflicted on others, will himself at length be made an example of. The wrath of God may be slow, but it is always sure. In thoughtless security man wantons and whiles away the precious hours; he knows not that every transgression sets a fresh edge on the sword, which is thus continually whetting for his destruction; nor considers, that he is the mark of an archer who never errs, and who, at this very instant perhaps, has fitted to the string that arrow which is to pierce his soul with everlasting anguish. Bp. Horne.

[g] 15. Behold, he travaileth &c.] "He," namely, the wicked. This metaphor denotes his deep design, and continued course, and vigorous endeavours for the doing of misehief, and his restlessness and pain till he have accomplished it. Poole.

[h] 16. He hath graven and digged up a pit: &c.] All the world agrees to acknowledge the equity of that sentence which inflicts upon the guilty the punishment intended by them for the innocent. No one pities the fate of a man buried in that pit which he had dug to receive his neighbour; or of him who owes his death-wound to the return of an arrow shot against heaven. Saul was overthrown by those Philistines whom he would have made the instruments of cutting off David. Haman was hanged on his own gallows. The Jews, who excited the Romans to crucify Christ, were themselves, by the Romans, crucified in crowds. Striking instances these of the vengeance to be one day executed on all tempters and persecutors of others; when men and angels shall lift up their voices, and cry out together, "Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just are thy judgements.' Bp. Horne.

[i] Psalm viii.] This Psalm was composed by David for the magnifying of God's wonderful goodness, as more general in the fabrick of the world, and his bounty to mankind, in making him Lord of that great work of his; so more partieular to himself, in using him as his instrument, to discomfit Goliath of Gath, the proud boasting giant, the champion of the Philistines: and in the prophetical mystical sense, his more admirable mercy to men, in exalting our human nature above all the creatures in the world; which was eminently completed in our Saviour's assumption of our flesh, and ascending to, and reigning in heaven in it. Dr. Hammond.

This is the first of those Psalms, which the Church has appointed to be read on Ascension-day. It treats, as appears from Heb. ii. 6, &c. of the wonderful love of God, shewn by the exaltation of our nature in Messiah, or the second Adam, to the right hand of the Majesty on high, and by the subjection of all creatures to the word of his power. Bp. Horne.

[k] 1. O Lord our Governour, &c.] As if he had said, O thou Lord, Creator, and sole Governour of heaven and earth, which hast pleased to be known to us men in a peculiar relation of care and special kindness, to instruct and reveal the knowledge of thy will to us: how art thou to be admired and praised and magnified by men and angels, and by all both in heaven and earth: whose superlative greatness and supereminent majesty is infinitely exalted above all the most glorious creatures. This is most true of Thee in thy divine invisible nature: true also in thy strange vouchsafements to me at this time: but above all is most admirable matter of observation and acknowledgment to us vile sinners, if considered in the great mystery of our redemption; the descension first, and then exaltation of our Saviour! To which this Psalm is distinctly applied, Matt. xxi. 16; 1 Cor. xv. 27; Heb. ii. 6—8. Dr. Hammond.

[l] 2. Out of the mouth &c.] This verse is cited by our Lord, Matt. xxi. 16, and applied to "little children in the temple, crying, Hosanna to the Son of David!" which vexed and confounded his malignant adversaries. The import of the words, therefore, plainly is, that the praises of Messiah, celebrated in the church by his children, have in them a strength and power which nothing can withstand; they can abash infidelity, when at its greatest height, and strike hell itself dumb. Bp. Horne.

[m] 3. For I will consider thy heavens, &c.] At the time of inditing this Psalm, David is evidently supposed to moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained.

4 What is man, that thou art mindful of him: and the son of man, that thou visitest him?

5 Thou madest him lower[n] than the angels: to crown him with glory and worship.

6 Thou makest him to have dominion of the works of thy hands: and thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet.

7 All sheep and oxen[o]: yea, and the beasts of the field;

8 The fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea: and whatsoever walketh through the paths of the seas.

PSALM ix.[q] Confitebor tibi.

King Charles's Mart. first Psalm Morn. Serv.

I Will give thanks unto thee, O Lord, with my whole heart: I will speak of all thy marvellous works.

2 I will be glad and rejoice in thee: yea, my songs will I make of thy Name, O thou most Highest[r].

3 While mine enemies are driven back[s]: they shall fall and perish at thy presence.

have had before his eyes the heavens as they appear by night. He is struck with the awful magnificence of the wide extended firmament, adorned by the moon walking in brightness, and rendered brilliant by the vivid lustre of a multitude of shining orbs, differing from each other in magnitude and splendour. And when, from surveying the beauty of heaven, with its glorious shew, he turns to take a view of the creature man, he is still more affected by the mercy, than he had before been by the majesty of the Lord; since far less wonderful it is, that God should make such a world as this, than that He who made such a world as this should be "mindful of man," in his fallen estate, and should "visit" human nature with his salvation. Bp. Horne.

[n] 5, 6. Thou madest him lower &c.] On these two verses, with that preceding, St. Paul has left the following comment: "One in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than [marg. a little while inferior to] the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour," Heb. ii. 6, &c. See also 1 Cor. xv. 27. Bp. Horne.

[o] 7, 8. All sheep and oxen: &c.] Adam, upon his creation, was invested with sovereign dominion over the creatures, in words of the same import with these; Gen. i. 28; which are therefore here used, and the creatures particularized, to inform us, that what the first Adam lost by transgression, the second Adam regained by obedience. That "glory" which was "set above the heavens," could not but be over all things "on the earth." And accordingly we hear our Lord saying, after his resurrection, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," Matt. xxviii. 18. All things are put under the feet of King Messiah: who, "because he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, was therefore highly exalted, and had a name given him above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, whether of things in heaven, or things on earth, or things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father," Phil. ii. 8, &c. Bp. Horne.

[p] O Lord our Governour: &c.] Let therefore the universal chorus of men and angels join their voices together, and make their sound to be heard as one, in honour of the Redeemer, evermore praising Him, and saying, O Lord, our Lord Jesu Christ, King of righteousness, peace, and glory, King of kings, and Lord of lords, how excellent, how precious, how lovely, how great and glorious is thy name, diffused over all the earth, for the salvation of thy chosen! Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever. And let heaven and earth say, Amen. Bp. Horne.

[q] PSALM ix.] This Psalm consists of two parts, a thanksgiving, 1—12; and a prayer, 13—20. Upon what particular occasion it was composed, is not known: probably to celebrate the victories gained by David over the neighbouring nations, after God had exalted him to be king in Sion, see ver. 11. He first exhorts the righteous to join with him in praising the power, wisdom, and justice of the Lord, who delivers those that trust in Him, and confounds the malice and devices of the wicked; secondly, he beseeches God to protect always those who fear Him, against the violence of their enemies. Bp. Horne, Osterwald.

[r] 2. O thou most Highest.] The double superlative "most highest" is a phrase peculiar to the old vulgar translation of the Psalms, where it acquires a singular propriety from the subject to which it is applied, the supreme Being, who is higher than the highest. Bp. Lowth.

[s] 3. While mine enemies are driven back: &c.] As if he had said, By Thee are our enemies put to flight; and to Thee only it is to be ascribed. It is thy majesty that hath done the whole work for us: Thou foughtest against them, and thereby they were thus worsted, scattered, and destroyed. Dr. Hammond.

[t] 6. O thou enemy, &c.] This is a sudden apostrophe to the enemies of God's people, Philistines, Amorites, or other nations, who had formerly made great havock and waste among them. It may purport, that they were not only frustrated of their desires and hopes of destroying the Israelites, but were also subdued, and in a great part destroyed by them. Poole. As if were said, O thou enemy, thou hast now, I hope, done destroying: thou hast made an end of seeking and ruining our cities: there is no more work for thee further to do: and now, when thou hast done thy worst, thyself and thy memorial is utterly rooted out. Bp. Hall.

The Christian church, when repeating these words, may be supposed to take a retrospective view of the successive fall of those empires, with their capital "cities," in which the "enemy" had from time to time fixed his residence, and which had vexed and persecuted the people of God in different ages. Such were the Assyrian, or Babylonian, the Persian, and the Grecian monarchies. All these vanished away, and came to nothing: nay, the very "memorial" of the stupendous Nineveh and Babylon is so "perished with them," that the place where they once stood is now no more to be found. The Roman empire was the last of the pagan persecuting powers; and when the church saw "that" under her feet, well might she cry out, "The destructions of the enemy are completed to the utmost!" Bp. Horne.

[u] 10. And they that know thy Name &c.] They, who "know God's name," that is, who are acquainted with, and have experienced, his merciful nature and disposition, expressed in that name, will take no unlawful methods to escape affliction, nor "put their trust" in any but Him for deliverance. Bp. Horne.

[x] 11. O praise the Lord which dwelleth in Sion:] This is an invitation to all the inhabitants of Judea, to join with the Psalmist in praising God, whose particular residence upon earth was in his ark, in mount Sion. Dr. Nicholls.

[y] 12. For when he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them:] "Them," that is those who "seek him," mentioned in the tenth verse: so that the exhortation to "sing praises," ver. 11, seems parenthetick. Bp. Horne. The meaning of the verse is, the blood of humble, pious, helpless men, that is shed by oppressors, hath a cry that goes up to heaven, Gen. iv. 10; and is most precious to God: He will never suffer it to go unpunished, but will inflict severe vengeance for it; pursue and find out the guilty, and pour his plagues upon them. Dr. Hammond.

[z] 14. That I may shew all thy praises &c.] As if he had said, Then will I in sacred verse sing out thy praises in the most publick assemblies of the people of Jerusalem, which used to be held at the gates of the city: and thy deliverance shall be the theme of my Psalm. Dr. Nicholls. These gates he elegantly opposeth to the former; and declareth, that, if he be brought off them, he will go into these, Poole.

[a] — the daughter of Sion;] The word "daughter," applied to a city or nation, signifies the people or inhabitants of it; the city being as it were the parent from whence they spring. Accordingly the Chaldee here expresses it by "the assembly of Sion." Dr. Hammond.

[b] 15. The heathen are sunk down &c.] Faith beholds, as already executed, that righteous judgment, whereby wicked men and evil spirits will fall into the perdition which they had prepared for others, either openly by persecution, or more covertly by temptation. See Ps. vii. 15, 16. Bp. Horne.

Nothing is a more convincing proof of the providence of God, than the righteous judgment which he executes upon the ungodly, when they are intangled in their own devices, and thus bring upon themselves that destruction, which they had prepared for others. Travell.

[c] 17. The wicked shall be turned into hell: &c.] All wickedness came originally with the wicked one from hell; thither it will be again remitted, and they who hold on its side must accompany it on its return to that place of torment, there to be shut up for ever. The true state both of "nations," and the individuals of which they are composed, is to be estimated from one single circumstance, namely, whether in their doings they remember or "forget God." Remembrance of

3 For the ungodly hath made boast of his own heart's desire[h]: and speaketh good of the covetous, whom God abhorreth.

4 The ungodly is so proud[i], that he careth not for God: neither is God in all his thoughts.

5 His ways are alway grievous[k]: thy judgements are far above out of his sight, and therefore defieth he all his enemies.

6 For he hath said in his heart, Tush[l], I shall never be cast down: there shall no harm happen unto me.

7 His mouth is full of cursing[m],

Him is the well-spring of virtue; forgetfulness of Him, the fountain of vice. Bp. Horne.

[d] 18. For the poor shall not alway be forgotten: &c.] They, who remember God, shall infallibly be remembered by Him: and let this be their anchor in the most tempestuous seasons. Bp. Horne.

[e] 20. Put them in fear, O Lord: &c.] Strange, that man, dust in his original, sinful by his fall, and continually reminded of both by every thing in him and about him, should yet stand in need of some sharp affliction, some severe visitation from God, to bring him to the knowledge of himself, and make him feel who and what he is. But this is frequently the case; and when it is, as there are wounds which cannot be healed without a previous application of caustics, mercy is necessitated to begin her work with an infliction of judgment. Bp. Horne.

[f] PSALM X.] This Psalm is one of David's: and is a complaint made to God of the riotous oppressions of wicked men, and an humble reliance on Him for repressing them. Dr. Hammond.

The church, under persecution from the spirit of antichrist in the world, after, 1, an humble expostulation with her Lord, setteth down the marks whereby that spirit may be known; such as, 2, hatred of the faithful; 3, self-willedness and worldly-mindedness; 4, infidelity; 5, 6, profligacy and pride; 7, profaneness and perjury; 8—11, subtilty and treachery employed against the people of God; 12, security and presumption. From the persecutions of such a spirit, the church, 13—17, prayeth earnestly to be delivered; and, 18—20, through faith, rejoiceth in tribulation. Bp. Horne.

[g] 1. Why standest thou so far off, O Lord: &c.] During the conflict between the church and her adversaries, God is represented as one withdrawing to a distance, instead of affording succour; nay, as one concealing Himself, so as not to be found by those who petitioned for aid or counsel. To behold the righteous cause oppressed, and good men seemingly deserted by heaven, at a time when they most need its assistance, is apt to offend the weak, and oftentimes stagger those who are strong. It is indeed a sore trial, but intended to make us perfect in the practice of three most important duties, humility, resignation, and faith. That we may not faint under the severity of this discipline, let us ever bear in mind, that the beloved Son of the Father, the Son in whom He was well pleased, had once occasion to utter these words, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Bp. Horne.

[h] 3. For the ungodly hath made boast of his own heart's desire: &c.] The first part of this verse points out that alarming symptom of a reprobate mind, a disposition to exult and glory in those lusts, which are the shame and disgrace of human nature, whether the world or the flesh be their object. Bp. Horne. The latter part describes the wicked as not satisfied with doing evil himself, but commending and praising the unjust extortions and rapines of other violent men, whom he accounts happy, though the Lord abhors them. Bp. Patrick.

[i] 4. The ungodly is so proud, &c.] The counsels of heaven are not known by the wicked, because they are not sought after; and they are not sought after, because of a diabolical self-sufficiency, which, having taken possession of the heart, displays itself in the countenance, and reigns throughout the man. He wants no Prophet to teach him, no Priest to atone for him, no King to conduct him; he needs neither a Christ to redeem, nor a Spirit to sanctify him: he believes no Providence, adores no Creator, and fears no Judge. Thus he lives a "stranger from the covenants of promise, and without God in the world," Ephes. ii. 12. O that this character now existed only in the Psalmist's description! Bp. Horne.

[k] 5. His ways are alway grievous: &c.] As are a man's principles, such will be his practices: and if he hath not God in his thoughts, his course of life will be corrupt and abominable, his end, his means, and his motives being all wrong, and polluted with concupiscence. There would have been some chance of holding him by fear, but that is gone with his faith; for no man can tremble at judgments in which he does not believe. Bp. Horne.

[l] 6. For he hath said in his heart, Tush, &c.] Prosperity begets presumption, and he, who has been long accustomed to see his designs succeed, begins to think it impossible they should ever do otherwise. The long-suffering of God, instead of leading such an one to repentance, only hardens him in his iniquity. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, he thinks it will not be executed at all. He vaunteth himself, therefore, like the proud Chaldean monarch, in the Babylon which he hath erected, and fondly pronounceth it to be immortal. Such, it is too evident, are often the vain imaginations of triumphant wickedness. Bp. Horne.

[m] 7. His mouth is full of cursing, &c.] From the thoughts of the sinner's "heart," mentioned in the preceding verse, David goes on to describe the words of his "mouth." Bp. Horne. When he speaks, it is only to utter curses, in order to cheat and deceive those who trust him; and whatever fair speeches he may make, they are intended to hide the secret malice of his heart. Travell.

"Under his tongue:" that is, under his fair and plausible speeches the mischief here following is hid and covered. The Psalmist seems to allude to serpents, whose poison lies hidden "under their tongue," or within their teeth. Poole.

[n] 8—10. He sitteth lurking &c.] If deceitful words will not enable him to compass his ends, he scruples not to be guilty of the most atrocious deeds: lurking in secret places, he lies as close as a lion in his den to catch his prey. A fowler is not more cunning to draw the birds to his net, than he is to get the poor helpless men into his power, that he may devour them. Travell.

[o] 11. He falleth down, and humbleth himself: &c.] Our Lord, who is styled "the Lion of the tribe of Judah," became a "Lamb," for the salvation of mankind: but when his adversary at any time "humbleth" himself, when the wolf appears in sheep's clothing, let the flock beware; it is for their more effectual destruction. And if, allured by an outward shew of moderation and benevolence, the simple ones shall venture themselves within his reach, they will soon find that his nature is disguised, but not altered. Bp. Horne.

[p] 12. He hath said in his heart, &c.] For the chastisement of his people, God often suffers the enemy to prevail and prosper, who then ridicules the faith and hope of the church, and solaces himself in the conceit, that if there be a God, He either knows not, or cares not, what is done upon earth. These Epicurean notions, however absurd and unworthy of the Deity they may seem, do yet in some measure take possession of every man's mind at the instant of his committing a sin; since it is most certain, that with a due impression of the divine omniscience upon his soul at the time, he would not commit it, for all that the tempter could offer him. But faith is apt to sleep, and then sin awakes. Bp. Horne.

[q] 15. Surely thou hast seen it, &c.] Above, "the wicked saith in his heart, Thou wilt not requite it." But the faithful are taught other things by the promises of Scripture, and the experience of unnumbered histories. They know assuredly, that God beholds all that travail and vexation which some inflict, and others sustain, upon the earth; and that He will infallibly recompense to the former their deeds, to the latter their sufferings. Bp. Horne.

[r] 17. Break thou the power &c.] This may be either a prayer, or a prediction, implying that the time will come, when the power of Jehovah will dash in pieces that of the enemy, by the demolition either of sin or the sinner, until wickedness be come utterly to an end, and righteousness be established for ever in the kingdom of Messiah. Bp. Horne.

[s] 18. The Lord is King &c.] This verse is an assertion that the Lord can surely do what the Psalmist asked of Him; being the same everlasting King, by whose authority and power the seven impious nations were expelled out of the land of Canaan. Bp. Patrick.

[t] 19. Lord, thou hast heard &c.] How many important and comforting truths have we here, in a few words! As, that the "humble" and lowly, whatever they may suffer in the world, are the favourites of Jehovah: that He attends to the very "desires" of their hearts: that such hearts, "prepared" to prayer, are so many instruments strung and tuned by the hand of Heaven: and that their prayer is as musick, to which the Almighty Himself listens with pleasure. Bp. Horne.

[u] 20. To help the fatherless &c.] For the sake of the elect, and their prayers, the days of persecution and tribulation will be shortened; the insolence of the earth-born oppressor, the man of sin, will be chastised; the cause of the church will be heard at the tribunal of God; and victory, triumph, and glory will be given unto her. In the foregoing exposition, regard has been chiefly had to the case of the church, and to her sufferings from the spirit of antichrist, in whomsoever existing and acting, from time to time, in the world; this being judged the most generally useful application, which Christians, as such, can make of the Psalm. Particular accommodations of it to the various oppressions of innocent poverty, by iniquitous opulence, will meet the eye, and offer themselves at once to persons so circumstanced, for their support and comfort, under their respective afflictions. Bp. Horne.

PSALM xii.[f] Salvum me fac.

HELP me, Lord, for there is not one godly man left: for [x] PSALM xi.] The Psalmist, under persecution, 1—3, declareth himself resolved to trust in God alone, at a time when he was advised to fly to some place of refuge; 4, 5, he expresses his faith in the omniscience and overruling power of Jehovah; 6, assigns the reason why good men are afflicted; who, after that the wicked, 7, shall be destroyed, will appear to have been all along, 8, the favoured of God. Bp. Horne.

The Psalm should seem to have been composed by David under some great trouble, when he was persecuted by Saul. Dr. Nicholls.

[y] 1. In the Lord put I my trust: &c.] The Christian, like David, in perilous times, should make God his fortress, and continue doing his duty in his station; he should not, at the instigation of those about him, like a poor, silly, timorous, inconstant bird, either fly for refuge to the devices of worldly wisdom, or desert his post, and retire into solitude, while he can serve the cause in which he is engaged. Nor indeed is there any "mountain" on earth out of the reach of care and trouble. Temptations are every where; and so is the grace of God. Bp. Horne.

[z] 2. For lo, the ungodly bend their bow, &c.] These seem to be still the words of David's friends, representing to him, as a motive for his flight, the extreme danger he was in from the "arrows" of the enemy, already, as it were, fitted to the "string," and pointed at him "in secret," so that not knowing from whence they were to come, he could not guard against them. The Christian's danger from the darts of the infernal archers, lying in wait for his soul, is full as great as that of David. But "the shield of faith" sufficeth, in both cases. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3. For the foundations will be cast down: &c.] Piety, and justice, and fidelity, and mercy, which are the "pillars" or "foundations" of a state or kingdom, as they are called, Ps. lxxv. 3, or 4; and lxxxii. 5: and by which they are established, Prov. xxix. 14. Poole. This likewise seems to be spoken by the same persons, discouraging David from making any farther resistance, by the consideration, that all was over; the "foundations" of religion and law were subverted; and what could a man, engaged in the most "righteous" designs, hope to "do," when that was the case? Such arguments are often urged by the timid, in similar circumstances; but they are fallacious; since all is not over, while there is a man left to reprove error, and bear testimony to the truth. Bp. Horne.

[b] 4. The Lord is in his holy temple: &c.] In the first verse, the Psalmist had declared his trust to be in Jehovah. After reciting the reasonings of his friends, he now proceeds to evince the fitness and propriety of such trust, notwithstanding the seemingly desperate situation of affairs. "Jehovah is in his holy temple;" into which, therefore, unholy men, however triumphant in this world, can never enter: "Jehovah's throne is in heaven;" and consequently superior to all power upon earth, which may be controlled and over-ruled by Him in a moment; "his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men;" so that no secret wickedness can escape his knowledge, who scrutinizeth the hearts as well as the lives of all the sons of Adam. Why, then, should the man despair, who hath on his side holiness, omnipotence, and omniscience? Bp. Horne.

[c] 7. Upon the ungodly he shall rain snares, &c.] St. Jude, ver. 7, tells us, that the cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. for their abominable sins, "are set forth for an example or specimen, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." And here we see the images are plainly taken from the dreadful judgment inflicted on those cities, and transferred to the vengeance of the last day. Then the sons of faithful Abraham shall behold a prospect, like that which once presented itself to the eyes of their father; when rising early in the morning, and looking toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, he "beheld, and lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace!" Gen. xix. 28. Such must be the "portion of their cup," who have dashed from them the cup of salvation. Bp. Horne.

[d] —this shall be their portion to drink.] This phrase is proverbial in Scripture: God's gifts and dispensations, good and bad, are ordinarily expressed by a cup, poured out, and given men to drink. Dr. Hammond.

[e] 8. For the righteous Lord loveth &c.] He, who is in Himself essential righteousness, cannot but love his own resemblance, wrought in the faithful by his good Spirit; with a countenance full of paternal affection, He beholds, and speaks peace and comfort to them, in the midst of their sorrows; until, admitted, through mercy, to the glory, from which justice excludes the wicked, and beholding that countenance which has always beheld them, they shall enter upon a life of boundless and everlasting felicity. Bp. Horne.

[f] PSALM xii.] This Psalm, which was composed by David, is spent in meditation on the malice and wickedness of men, and the relief which is to be expected from none but God. Dr. Hammond. The church, through David, 1, 2, laments the decrease of God's faithful servants, and the universal corruption among men, but, 3—6, rests upon the divine promises, the truth and certainty of which, 7, 8, she celebrates, and comforts herself therewith, while in a world where oftentimes, 9, the wicked walk uncontrolled. Bp. Horne.

[g] 2. They talk of vanity &c.] When men cease to be faithful to their God, he who expects to find them so to each other, will be much disappointed. The primitive sincerity will accompany the primitive piety in her flight from the earth; and then interest will succeed conscience in the regulation of human conduct, till one man cannot trust another farther than he holds him by that tie. Hence, by the way, it is, that although many are infidels themselves, yet few choose to have their families and dependents such; as judging, and rightly judging, that true Christians are the only persons to be depended on, for the exact discharge of social duties. Bp. Horne.

[h] 4. Which have said, With our tongue will we prevail: &c.] Rather, "with our tongue will we be valiant." Infidels profess to set all authority of public opinion and ancient tradition at defiance, as the prejudice of education. They follow no teacher, human or divine. They form their own opinions from their own reflections, and they claim a right to speak as freely as they think; to propagate and maintain their own notions, however opposite to the general belief, and even to revile the established religion. Bp. Horsley.

[i] 5. Now for the comfortless troubles' sake of the needy: &c.] For the consolation of the afflicted and poor in spirit, Jehovah is here introduced promising, out of compassion to their sufferings, to "arise and set them in safety," or "place them in a state of salvation." Such all along has been his promise to the church, who, by looking back to the deliverances wrought of old for the servants of God, and, above all, to that wrought for the Son of God, is now encouraged to look forward, and expect her final redemption from the scorn and insolence of infidelity. Bp. Horne.

[k] 7. The words of the Lord are pure words: &c.] The church rejoices in the promises of God her Saviour, because they are such as she can confide in. His words are not like those of deceitful boasting man, but true and righteous altogether. Often have they been put to the test, in the trials of the faithful, like silver committed to the furnace, in an earthen crucible; but, like silver in its most refined and exalted purity, found to contain no dross of imperfection, no alloy of fallibility in them. The words of Jehovah are holy in his precepts, just in his laws, gracious in his promises, significant in his institutions, true in his narrations, and infallible in his predictions. What are the thousands of gold and silver, compared to the treasures of the sacred page! Bp. Horne.

[l] 8. Thou shalt keep them, O Lord: &c.] The best way of taking this verse is to understand "them" of the words of the Lord in the preceding verse: and "him" of the godly or just man, to whom those words or promises are made. Dr. Hammond. As if it had been said, Yes, blessed Lord, what thou hast promised shall surely be performed, since there is with thee no variableness, nor shadow of turning: thou wilt keep thy poor and lowly servants, as thou hast promised, from being circumvented by treachery, or crushed by power; thou wilt preserve them undefiled amidst an evil and adulterous generation; thou wilt be with thy church to the end of the world, and then admit her to be with thee for ever. Bp. Horne.

[m] 9. The ungodly walk &c.] While the faithful repose, as they ought to do, an unlimited confidence in God's promises, they have, in the mean time, but too much reason to mourn the prevalence of wickedness, stalking like its author, to and fro, and up and down in the earth, uncontrolled by those who bear the sword, but who either blunt its edge, or turn it the wrong way. Such is often the state of things here below; and a reflection, made upon the subject by our Lord, when his enemies drew near to apprehend Him, may satisfy us how it comes to be so: "It is your hour, and the power of darkness." But that hour will quickly pass with us, as it did with Him, and the power of darkness will be overthrown; the Lord will be our everlasting light, and the days of our mourning shall be ended. Bp. Horne.

[n] PSALM xiii.] This Psalm (written by David in time of some great distress, Dr. Nicholls) contains, 1, 2, a complaint of desertion; 3, 4, a prayer for the divine assistance; 5, 6, an act of faith and thanksgiving. Bp. Horne.

[o] 1. How long wilt thou forget me, &c.] While God permits his servants to continue under affliction, He is said, after the manner of men, to have "forgotten, and hid his face from them." For the use, therefore, of persons in such circumstances, is this Psalm intended; and consequently it suits the different cases of the church universal, languishing for the advent of our Lord to deliver her from this evil world; of any particular church, in time of persecution; and of each individual when harassed by temptations, or broken by sickness, pain, and sorrow. He who bore our sins, and carried our sorrows, may likewise be presumed to have made it a part of his devotions in the day of trouble. Bp. Horne.

[p] 3. — lighten mine eyes, &c.] The deliverance here requested is expressed figuratively. In time of sickness and grief, the "eyes" are dull and heavy; and they grow more and more so as death approaches, which closes them in darkness. On the other hand, health and joy render the organs of vision bright and sparkling, seeming, as it were, to impart "light" to them from within. The words, therefore, may be fitly applied to a recovery of the body natural, and thence of the body politick, from their respective maladies. Nor do they less significantly describe the restoration of the soul to a state of spiritual health and holy joy, which will manifest themselves in like manner, by "the eyes of the understanding being enlightened;" and in this case, the soul is saved from the sleep of sin, as the body is, in the other, from the sleep of death. Bp. Horne.

[q] — that I sleep not in death.] Lest I sink under my burden and die: for death is often called a sleep in Scripture: as in Job iii. 13; xiv. 12; Ps. lxxvi. 5; John xi. 11. Poole.

[r] 5, 6. But my trust is in thy mercy: &c.] The heart, which "trusteth in God's mercy," shall alone "rejoice in his salvation," and celebrate by the tongue, in songs of praise, the loving-kindness of the Lord. It is observable, that this, and many other Psalms, with a mournful beginning, have a triumphant ending; to shew us the prevailing power of devotion, and to convince us of the certain return of prayer, sooner or later, bringing with it the comforts of heaven, to revive and enrich our weary and barren spirits in the gloomy seasons of sorrow and temptation. Bp. Horne.

[s] PSALM xiv.] The design of this Psalm of David is to describe and bewail the dreadful wickedness and corruption of mankind, and especially of ungodly men, and of his own enemies. Poole. It is in a manner the same with the fifty-third. It sets forth, 1—7, the corruption of the world; 8—10, its enmity against the people of God; 11, the prophet longs and prays for salvation. Bp. Horne.

[t] 1. The fool hath said in his heart, &c.] "The fool," that is, the wicked man: for such are commonly and justly called "fools" every where in Scripture; and that purposely to meet their false, yet common, conceit of themselves, as if they were the only wise men, and all others were fools. Poole.

It does not appear upon what occasion David composed this Psalm. The revolt of Israel in Absalom's rebellion is by most writers pitched upon as the subject of it. But, be this as it may, the expressions are general, and evidently designed to extend beyond a private interpretation. And accordingly, the apostle, Rom. iii. 10, &c. produces some passages from it, to evince the apostasy of both Jews and Gentiles from their King and their God, and to prove them to be all under sin. In this light, therefore, we are to consider it, as characterizing the principles and practices of those who oppose the Gospel of Christ in all ages. "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." Infidelity is the beginning of sin, folly the foundation of infidelity, and the heart, the seat of both. "Their foolish heart," says St. Paul of the heathen, Rom. i. 21, "was darkened." The sad consequence of defection in principle, is corruption in practice. "They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good." On these words the reader may see a full comment, Rom. i. 28—32. Bp. Horne.

[u] — in his heart,] In his secret thoughts, or within himself, being afraid and ashamed to utter it with his mouth. Not that it was his fixed and constant opinion and judgment, but this he saith by construction, because he heartily wisheth there were no God, and lives as if there were none. So this text may be explained by comparing it with Ps. xxxvi. 1; and Tit. i. 16. Poole.

[x] 3. The Lord looked down from heaven &c.] Like a watchman on the top of some lofty tower, God is represented as surveying, from his heavenly throne, the sons of Adam, and their proceedings upon the earth; He scrutinizes them, and as it were searches diligently, to find, among them a man of true wisdom, one whose heart was turned toward the Lord his God, one who was inquiring the way to salvation and glory, that he might walk therein. But as the result of this extensive and accurate survey, God informs his prophet, and commissions him to inform the world, that all had declined from the paths of wisdom and righteousness; that the mass of human nature was become putrid, requiring to be cleansed, and the vessels made up of it to be formed anew. Such is the Scripture account of man not having received grace, or having fallen from it; of man without Christ, or in arms against Him. See Rom. iii. 11, 12. Bp. Horne.

[y] 4. But they are all gone out of the way, &c.] This, as it was observably true of Israel, that people of God, abominable: there is none that doeth good, no not one.

5 Their throat is an open sepulchre, with their tongues have they deceived: the poison of asps is under their lips.

6 Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood.

7 Destruction and unhappiness is in their ways, and the way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes.

8 Have they no knowledge[z], that they are all such workers of mischief: eating up my people as it were bread, and call not upon the Lord?

9 There were they brought in great fear, even where[a] no fear was: for God is in the generation of the righteous.

10 As for you[b], ye have made a mock at the counsel of the poor: because he putteth his trust in the Lord.

11 Who shall give salvation[c] unto Israel out of Sion? When the Lord turneth the captivity of his people: then shall Jacob rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

so eminently owned and favoured by Him in David's time, and in their behaviour towards Him; so had it a farther prophetick truth in it, in respect to the universality of them at the time of Christ's appearing in the world, and in their actions towards Him, and his apostles after Him, to the Jews of which age St. Paul applies it, Rom. iii. 10. Dr. Hammond.

[z] 8. Have they no knowledge, &c.] What a strange madness is this in wicked men, that they will not consider what vengeance they pull upon themselves, while they do thus cruelly devour my people, as they eat bread, so greedily, so familiarly; without fear or remorse. Bp. Hall. "My people;" that is, the poor and godly Israelites, of whom he principally speaks: whom he calleth "my people;" either God's people, as they were in many respects: or rather David's people, for David speaks both these words, and all the rest, in his own person. Poole. The "workers of iniquity" work for the wages of death; they fight against God and their own souls; they barter eternity for time, and part with happiness for misery, both in possession and reversion. Well therefore may it be asked, "Have they no knowledge?" For common sense, after all, is what they want. They who, with an appetite keen as that to their food, prey upon the poor, and devour the people of God, will themselves be preyed upon and devoured by that roaring lion, whose agents for the present they are; and such as now "call not on" the name of "the Lord" Jesus for pardon and salvation, shall hereafter call in vain upon the rocks and mountains, to shelter them from his power and vengeance. Bp. Horne.

[a] 9. There were they brought in great fear, even where &c.] David is supposed to be speaking primarily of Israel's defection from him to Absalom, and here to be assigning the motive of that defection in many, namely, fear of the rebel's growing power, and distrust of his ability to protect them; which fear, he observes, was groundless, because his cause was the cause of God, who would not fail to appear in its support and vindication. The subjects of Christ in times of persecution, are often tempted to renounce their allegiance, upon the same principle of fear; although of them it may more emphatically be said, that they "fear where no fear is, since God is in the generation of the righteous;" and they, who are engaged on the side of Messiah, will, in the end, most assuredly be triumphant. Bp. Horne.

[b] 10. As for you, &c.] This is plainly addressed to the adversaries, and charges them with reproaching and scoffing at that confidence in the Lord expressed by the afflicted righteous, in the preceding verse. Bp. Horne.

[c] 11. Who shall give salvation &c.] These words directly and immediately concern the deliverance of the people of Israel out of that sinful and deplorable estate, in which they now were: which having described in the body of the Psalm, he concludes after his manner with a prayer to God, to hear and help them "out of Sion," where the ark then was, whence God used to hear and answer his people's prayers. But ultimately and principally they design a farther, even the spiritual redemption and salvation of all God's Israel by the Messiah. Poole. The consideration of the apostasy and corruption of mankind, described in this Psalm, makes the prophet express a longing desire for the salvation of Israel, which was to go forth out of Zion, and to bring back the people of God from that most dreadful of all captivities, the captivity under sin and death; a salvation, at which Jacob would indeed rejoice, and Israel be glad. And how doth the whole church, at this time, languish for the consummation of her felicity, looking for that glorious day of final redemption, when every believing heart shall exult, and all the sons of God shout aloud for joy! Bp. Horne.

[d] PSALM XV.] This Psalm is a description of a pious man, such as shall be admitted into God's presence, to serve Him here in the place assigned for his worship, and to be rewarded with heaven hereafter. And it seems to have been composed by David in reflection on the time of his restitution or coming back to the ark and the tabernacle, from which he had been driven out for some space, as at other times, so on occasion of Absalom's rebellion. See 2 Sam. xv. 17. Dr. Hammond.

It is one of the Psalms appointed to be used on Ascension-day. The prophet, 1, inquires concerning the person, who should ascend into the hill, and dwell in the temple of Jehovah; 2—7, he receives, in answer to his question, a character of such person. Bp. Horne.

[e] 1. Lord, who shall dwell &c.] The prophet alludes to the hill of Sion in the earthly Jerusalem, to the tabernacle of God which was thereon, and the character of the priest, who should officiate in that tabernacle. But all these were figures of a celestial Jerusalem, a spiritual Sion, a true Tabernacle, and an eternal Priest. To the great originals therefore we must transfer our ideas, and consider the inquiry as made after Him, who should fix his resting-place on the heavenly mount, and exercise his unchangeable priesthood in the temple not made with hands. And since the disciples of this new and great High Priest become righteous in Him, and are by the Spirit conformed to his image, the character, which essentially and inherently belongs only to Him, will derivatively belong to them also, who must follow his steps below, if they would reign with Him above. Bp. Horne.

[f] 2. Even he, that leadeth an uncorrupt life: &c.] As if he had said, I hear thee answer, methinks, as if a voice came from thy holy oracle, saying, Not all that are descended from Abraham, not every one that offers me sacrifices, and observes my appointed rites; but he who completely endeavours to please me in all the parts of a holy life, exercising justice and mercy to his neighbour, as well as piety to me; and taking care to wrong not his neighbour in words any more than in deeds. Bp. Patrick.

[g] 6. He that hath not given his money upon usury, &c.] Who in his private affairs makes no gain of the money he lends to his poor brethren, Exod. xxii. 25; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20: and so behaving himself in any publick office, that no gift can corrupt him to condemn the innocent or absolve the guilty. Bp. Patrick.

[h] 7. Whoso doeth these things: &c.] These few things, though they be not an enumeration of all the duties of a man, are yet so comprehensive and significative, contain so many branches, especially of our duty to our neighbour, and that, uniformly performed, is so sure a sign of faith, and love, and fear of God, and all other duties of piety, that such a man's title may be concluded very good both to the privileges and dignity of God's servants here, and to the eternal reward of such hereafter. Dr. Hammond. The full intent of what is both injoined and forbidden in this Psalm may be best opened and displayed by exemplifying each particular, as receiving its utmost completion, in the character and conduct of our blessed Lord. And whoever shall survey and copy these virtues and graces, as they present themselves in his life, will, it is humbly apprehended, take the best and shortest way to the heavenly Zion, and make that use of the xvth Psalm, which the Church may be supposed to have had in view, when she appointed it as one of the proper Psalms for Ascension-day. Bp. Horne.

[i] Psalm xvi.] This is a special, precious, memorable Psalm of David's composure, full of confidence in God through Christ, whose resurrection is herein prophetically represented; and of resolved adherence to Him, and humble dependence on Him. Dr. Hammond. Upon whatever occasion, or in whatever distress, David might compose this Psalm, we are taught by St. Peter and St. Paul, Acts ii. 24, and xiii. 35, to consider him as speaking in the person of our Lord Christ, of whom alone the latter part of the Psalm is true. The contents are, 1, a prayer for support; 2, 3, a declaration of love to the saints; 4, 5, a protestation against idolaters; 6—9, acts of love, joy, and confidence in Jehovah; and, 10—12, one of hope in an approaching resurrection and glorification. Bp. Horne.

[j] 1. Preserve me, O God: &c.] These words are evidently spoken by one in great distress, who addresses himself to heaven for support under his sufferings, pleading his confidence in God, still unshaken by all the storms that had set themselves against it. This might be the case of David, and may be that of any believer. But since the Psalm is a continued speech without change of person, we may consider the whole as uttered by Him who only could utter the concluding verses, and who in this first verse makes this supplication to the Father, for the promised and expected deliverance. Bp. Horne.

[k] 2. — my goods are nothing unto thee.] All the good things which I am possessed of, and all the good actions I can do, signify nothing to thee, that inexhaustible fountain both of bounty and holiness. Dr. Nicholls. "My goodness is of no profit unto thee." Even of the perfect righteousness of the man Christ Jesus, of his righteousness as a man, it may be said with truth, it ought to be said, that it was of no profit unto God. Nothing was added to the divine nature by the virtue of the man, to whom the Word became united; nothing was added to its glory by his virtue; nothing was added to its happiness by his enjoyments in his exalted state. His righteousness and his exaltation are a display of the divine goodness and power in that wonderful instance; no acquisition of goodness and power not enjoyed before. Bp. Horsley.

[l] 4. But they that run after another god: &c.] Christ denounceth vengeance against those who should make to themselves other gods, run after other saviours, or suffer any creature to rival Him in their affections; declaring of such, that their offerings should not be presented by Him to the Father, nor should they be partakers of the benefits of his intercession. Even the bloody sacrifices of the law, instituted for a time by God Himself, became abomination to Him when that time was expired, and the one great sacrifice had been offered upon the altar of the cross. Bp. Horne.

[m] 6. The Lord himself &c.] The true David, anointed to his everlasting kingdom, yet first a man of sorrows and a stranger upon earth, prefers the promised inheritance of the church, that spiritual kingdom, city, and temple of Jehovah, before all the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them; He is sure that Jehovah will maintain his lot, that He will both give and preserve to Him this his patrimony; and therefore rejoices at the divine beauty and excellency of the heavenly Canaan. And hence the Christian learns wherein his duty and his happiness consist; namely, in making choice of God for "the portion of his inheritance and of his cup," for his support and for his delight; in preferring the spirit to the flesh, the church to the world, and eternity to time. Bp. Horne.

[n] — the portion—of my cup:] Namely, the portion which is put into my cup, as the ancient manner was in feasts, where each had his portion of meat and of wine allotted to him. See Ps. xi. 7. Poole.

[o] 8. I will thank the Lord &c.] The person speaking here blesses Jehovah for communicating that divine "counsel," that celestial wisdom, by which he was incited and enabled to make the foregoing choice and resolution. In the latter part of the verse is intimated the mode of these gracious and spiritual communications, which in the dark seasons of adversity were conveyed to the inmost thoughts and affections of the mind, thereby to instruct, to comfort, and to strengthen the sufferer, until his passion should be accomplished, and the morning of the resurrection should dawn, in which, as we shall see, all his hope and confidence were placed. Bp. Horne.

[p] 9. I have set God always before me: &c.] The method, taken by Christ as man, to support Himself in time of trouble, and persevere unto the end, was to maintain a constant actual sense of the presence of Jehovah, whom when He thus saw standing at his right hand, ready, at the appointed hour, to succour and deliver Him, He then feared not the powers of earth and hell combined for his destruction. Why are our fears great, but because our faith is little? Bp. Horne.

[q] 10. Wherefore my heart was glad, &c.] Through confidence in the almighty power engaged on his side, joy filled the heart of Christ, and rendered his tongue an instrument of giving glory to Jehovah, in the midst of his sufferings; because when they were ended, as they must soon be, his flesh was only to make its bed, and rest a while, in the grave, after the labours of the day, in sure and certain hope of a speedy resurrection and glorification. The same consideration is to the afflicted, the sick, and the dying Christian, a never-failing source of comfort, an inexhaustible fountain of joy: sin and infidelity are the enemies, who would fill it with earth. Bp. Horne.

[r] — my glory] As we ourselves, with all our members and powers, were chiefly designed and framed to glorify our Maker; so our tongue and speaking faculty were given to us to declare our admiration and reverence of Him, to exhibit our due love and gratitude towards Him, to profess our trust and confidence in Him, to celebrate his praises, to avow his benefits, to address our supplications to Him, to maintain all kinds of devotional intercourse with Him, to propagate our knowledge, fear, love, and obedience to Him, in all such ways to promote his honour and service. This is the most proper, worthy, and due use of our tongue, for which it was created, to which it is dedicated, from whence it becometh, as it is so often styled, our "glory, and the best member that we have;" that, whereby we excel all creatures here below, and whereby we are no less discriminated from them than by our reason; that, whereby we consort with the blessed angels above in the distinct utterance of praise, and communication of glory to our Creator. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

[s] 11. For why? thou shalt not leave my soul in hell: &c.] It was a part of the covenant of grace, and promised by the mouth of God's prophets, that, after the death of Messiah, his animal frame should not continue, like those of other men, in the grave, nor should corruption be permitted to seize on the body, by which all others were to be raised to incorruption and immortality. As members of Christ, this same promise and assurance is so far ours, that although our mortal part must see corruption, yet it shall not be finally left under the power of the enemy, but shall be raised again, and reunited to its old companion the soul, which exists, meanwhile, in secret and undiscerned regions, there waiting for the day when its Redeemer shall triumph over corruption, in his mystical, as He hath already done in his natural body. Bp. Horne.

Though other parts of this Psalm may suit David, and all the faithful, yet it is to be observed that these words were completely fulfilled only in Jesus Christ, who, as St. Peter takes notice, being the Holy One of God, did not remain in the grave, nor see corruption; but was raised the third day and exalted to heaven, where He reigneth over all things, and has prepared for all true believers joys that never shall expire. Ostervald.

[t] 12. Thou shalt shew me the path of life; &c.] The return of Christ from the grave is beautifully described by Jehovah "shewing," or discovering to Him a "path of life," leading through the valley of the shadow of death, and from that valley to the summit of the hill of Zion, or to the mount of God in heaven, on which He now sits enthroned. There exalted at the right hand of the Father, that human body, which expired on the cross, and slept in the sepulchre, lives and reigns, filled with delight, and encircled by glory incomprehensible and endless. Through this thy beloved Son and our dear Saviour, "thou shalt shew" us likewise, O Lord, "the path of life;" thou shalt justify our souls by thy grace now, and raise our bodies by thy power at the last day; when earthly sorrow shall terminate in heavenly joy, and momentary pain shall be rewarded with everlasting felicity. Bp. Horne.

[u] PSALM xvii.] The Psalmist, confiding in the justice of his cause, 1—4, prayeth for a hearing and decision of it; 5—9, he petitioneth for the divine guidance and protection; 10—12, he describeth the temper and behaviour of his enemies; 13—15, beseecheth God to disappoint them, and to deliver him: he endeth with an act of faith. Bp. Horne.

This is a Psalm of David, composed, as is most probable, under Saul's persecution. Dr. Nicholls.

[x] 2. Let my sentence &c.] Do thou from thy heavenly tribunal pronounce me innocent; and let thy unerring judgment look into the justice of my cause. Dr. Nicholls.

[y] 3. Thou hast proved &c.] The sufferer's heart condemns him not, and he has confidence towards God, to whom he applies as the proper judge, because the only witness, of his integrity. What is here said could absolutely and universally be true only of the holy Jesus; however, through his grace, it may be true of some of his disciples in particular instances of crimes falsely laid to their charge. Let us pray that it may be true of us, whenever God shall please to prove and try us. Bp. Horne.

[z] 4. Because of men's works, &c.] As if he had said, By reason of the unwarrantable actions of some men, who have ventured upon rebellion, notwithstanding thy laws, "the words of thy lips," have forbidden it; I have kept myself from any destructive methods, and from making away with Saul, when it was in my power to do it. Dr. Nicholls. "The destroyer," or the violent man, such as Saul and his courtiers and soldiers had shewn themselves towards David. Although their rage and violence towards him might have tempted him to repay them in the same manner, he forbore it, and spared both others, and Saul himself, when his life was at his mercy, 1 Sam. xxiv. and xxvi. Poole.

[a] 5. O hold thou up my goings in thy paths: &c.] The word of God affords us direction, but the grace of God must enable us to follow its direction, and that grace must be obtained by prayer. The "paths of God" are opposed to the "paths of the destroyer," the way of righteousness to that of sin. The image here is taken from one walking in a slippery path, for such is that of human life, by reason of temptations; so that the believer, especially if he be young, feeble, and inexperienced, has great need of a divine supporter in every step he takes. Bp. Horne.

[b] 8. Keep me as the apple of an eye: &c.] He, who has so fenced and guarded that precious and tender part, the pupil of the eye, and who has provided for the security of a young and helpless brood under the wings of their dam, is here intreated to extend the same providential care and parental love to the souls of his elect, equally exposed to danger, equally beset with enemies. Of his readiness so to do He elsewhere assureth us, under the same exquisite imagery, Zech. ii. 8; Matt. xxiii. 37. Bp. Horne.

[c] 10. They are inclosed in their own fat: &c.] They are fat and well liking; pampering themselves with all the contentments and pleasures that their heart can desire. Bp. Hall. The meaning plainly is, that pride is the child of plenty, begotten by self-indulgence, which hardens the hearts of men against the fear of God, and the love of their neighbours; rendering them insensible to the judgments of the former, and the miseries of the latter. Let every man take care, that, by pampering the flesh, he do not raise up an enemy of this stamp against himself. Bp. Horne.

[d] 11. — turning their eyes down to the ground;] Turning their eyes downwards, as hounds and wild beasts do, when they hunt after their game or prey. Dr. Nicholls.

[e] 12. Like as a lion &c.] The similitude of a lion, either roaring abroad in quest of his prey, or couching of his prey: and as it were a lion's whelp, lurking in secret places.

13 Up, Lord, disappoint him[f], and cast him down: deliver my soul from the ungodly, which is a sword of thine[g];

14 From the men of thy hand[h], O Lord, from the men, I say, and from the evil world: which have their portion in this life, whose bellies thou fillest with thy hid treasure.

15 They have children at their desire: and leave the rest of their substance for their babes.

16 But as for me[i], I will behold thy presence in righteousness: and when I awake up after thy likeness, I shall be satisfied with it.

EVENING PRAYER.

in secret, ready to spring upon it the moment it comes within his reach, is often employed by David, to describe the power and malice of his enemies. Christians cannot forget, that they likewise have an adversary of the same nature and character; one ever seeking whom, and contriving how, he may devour. Bp. Horne.

[f] 13. Up, Lord, disappoint him, &c.] The Psalmist, having characterized those who pursued after him to take away his life, now entreats God to "arise" or appear in his cause, to "disappoint" or "prevent" the enemy in his designs, and to "cast him down," to overthrow and subdue him. Bp. Horne.

[g] — which is a sword of thine;] He means, that his wicked enemies can do nothing without God's permission, and are but a sword in his hand, which He can hinder from doing execution at his pleasure. Dr. Nicholls. So the Assyrian is called God's rod, Isa. x. 5; as being ordained for correction, Hab. i. 12. Poole.

[h] 14. From the men of thy hand, &c.] That is, men whom thou canst manage as thou wilt. Dr. Nicholls. The enemies from whom David prays to be delivered, are said to be such as have "their portion in this life," such as, in our Saviour's language, "have their reward" here, and are not to expect it hereafter; "whose bellies thou fillest with thy hid treasure;" whom thou permittest to enjoy thy temporal blessings in abundance, to "receive their good things" upon earth, and to "fare sumptuously every day;" as if it were to convince us, in what estimation we ought to hold the world, when we see the largest shares of it dealt out to the most worthless of the sons of Adam: "They are full of, or abound in, children, and leave the residue of their substance to their babes;" after living in plenty, perhaps to a good old age, they leave behind them a numerous and flourishing posterity, who inherit their estates, and go on, as their fathers did before them, without piety to God, or charity to the poor. From these men and their ways, we have all reason to say with David, "Good Lord, deliver us!" Bp. Horne.

[i] 16. But as for me, &c.] Instead of setting our affection on things below, the prophet instructs us, after his example, to place all our happiness in the vision of God, and in that righteousness which leads to it: since the hour is coming when we shall awake, and arise, after the divine similitude; when we shall be like God, for we shall see Him as He is, and by seeing Him shall be changed into the same image: and then shall every desire be satisfied with the fulness of joy, with the exceeding abundance of unutterable glory. Bp. Horne.

[k] PSALM xviii.] This Psalm, as we are informed by the sacred history, 2 Sam. xxii. 1, was composed and sung by David, in the day that the Lord had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul. It contains, ver. 1, 2, an address of thanks to Jehovah; 3—6, a relation of sufferings undergone, and prayers made for assistance; 7—15, a magnificent description of the divine interposition in favour of the sufferer, and 16—19, of the deliverance wrought for him, 20—24, in consideration of his righteousness, 25—28, according to the tenour of God's equitable proceedings; 29—36, to Jehovah is ascribed the glory of the victory, which, 37—42, is represented as every way complete, by the destruction of all opponents, and, 43—46, the submission of the heathen; for these events, 47—51, God is blessed and praised. As the sublimity of the figures used in this Psalm, and the consent of ancient commentators, even Jewish as well as Christian, but above all, the citations made from it in the New Testament, do evince, that the kingdom of Messiah is here pointed at, under that of David; an application is therefore made of the whole, in the ensuing comment, to the sufferings, resurrection, righteousness, and conquest of Christ, to the destruction of the Jews, and conversion of the Gentiles. In a word, the Psalm, it is apprehended, should now be considered as a glorious epinikion, or triumphal hymn, to be sung by the church, risen and victorious in Christ her Head. Bp. Horne.

[l] 1. — the Lord is my stony rock, &c.] In other words, explanatory of the figures here made use of, Through Jehovah it is, that I have stood immoveable amidst a sea of temptations and afflictions; He has supported me under my troubles, and delivered me out of them; his protection has secured me, his power has broken and scattered mine enemies; and by his mercy and truth am I now set up on high above them all. Bp. Horne.

[m] 3, 4. The sorrows of death compassed me, &c.] St. Peter, in his sermon on the day of Pentecost, says, when speaking of Christ, "Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it," Acts ii. 24. Whence we obtain, besides other things, something more than an intimation, that, in the verses of our Psalm now before us, David speaks of Christ, that the "pains of death compassed him about," and the "floods of Belial," the powers of darkness and ungodliness, like an overwhelming torrent breaking forth from the bottomless pit, "made him afraid," in the day of his agony, when the apprehensions of the bitter cup cast his soul into inutterable amazement, and He beheld Himself environed by those "snares" which had captivated and detained all the children of Adam. David, surrounded by Saul and his blood-thirsty attendants, was a lively emblem of the suffering Jesus, and therefore the same description is applicable to both; as the words of the second Psalm, in like manner, celebrate the inauguration of the son of Jesse, and that of the Son of God. Bp. Horne.

[n] 5. In my trouble I will call &c.] David was in distress; David called upon Jehovah, the God of Israel, who dwelt between the Cherubims in the holy place; and by Him the prayer of David was heard. Much greater was the distress of Christ, who likewise, as St. Paul speaks, "in the days of his flesh offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard," Heb. v. 7; his voice ascended to the eternal temple, his powerful cry pierced the ears of the Father everlasting, and brought salvation from heaven at the time appointed. The church also is distressed upon the earth, she crieth, her cries are heard, and will be answered in the day of God. Bp. Horne.

[o] 7. The earth trembled and quaked: &c.] At this verse the prophet begins to describe the manifestation of divine power in favour of the righteous sufferer. The imagery employed is borrowed from mount Sinai, and those circumstances which attended the delivery of the law from thence. When a monarch is angry, and prepares for war, his whole kingdom is instantly in commotion. Universal nature is here represented as feeling the effects of its Sovereign's displeasure, and all the visible elements are disorded. The earth shakes from its foundations, and all its rocks and mountains tremble before the majesty of their great Creator, when He ariseth in judgment. This was really the case at the resurrection of our Lord from the dead; when, as the Evangelist informs us, "there was a great earthquake," and the grave owned its inability any longer to detain the blessed body, which had been committed, for a season, to its custody. And what happened at the resurrection of Jesus, should remind us of what shall happen, when the earth shall tremble, and the dead shall be raised, at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[p] 8. There went a smoke &c.] The farther effects of God's indignation are represented by those of fire, which is the most terrible of the created elements, burning and consuming all before it, scorching the ground, and causing the mountains to smoke. Under this appearance God descended on the top of Sinai: thus He visited the cities of the plain; and thus He is to come at the end of time. Whenever therefore He is described as shewing forth his power and vengeance for the salvation of his chosen, and the discomfiture of his enemies, a "devouring fire" is the emblem made choice of, to convey proper ideas of such his manifestations. Bp. Horne.

[q] 9. He bowed the heavens also, &c.] Storms and tempests in the element of air are instruments of the divine displeasure, and therefore selected as figures of it. When God descends from above, the clouds of heaven compose an awful and gloomy tabernacle, in the midst of which He is supposed to reside: the reins of whirlwinds are in his hand, and He directs their impetuous course through the world; the whole artillery of the aerial regions is at his command, to be by Him employed against his enemies, in the day of battle and war. Bp. Horne.

[r] 12. At the brightness of his presence &c.] The discharge of the celestial artillery upon the adverse powers is here magnificently described. Terrible it was to them, as when lightnings and thunders, hail-stones and balls of fire, making their way through the dark clouds which contain them, strike terror and dismay into the hearts of men. Such is the "voice," and such are the "arrows," of the Lord Almighty, wherewith He "discomfiteth" all who oppose the execution of his counsels, and obstruct the salvation of his chosen. Bp. Horne.

[s] 15. The springs of water were seen, &c.] As the former part of the Psalmist's description was taken from the appearance on mount Sinai, so this latter part seems evidently to allude to what passed at the Red Sea, when by the breath of God the waters were divided, the depths were discovered, and Israel was conducted chiding, O Lord : at the blasting of the breath of thy displeasure.

16 He shall send down[t] from on high to fetch me : and shall take me out of many waters.

in safety through them. By that event was prefigured the salvation of the church universal, through the death and resurrection of Christ, who descended into the lower parts of the earth, and from thence reascended to light and life. The xivth chapter of Exodus, which relates the passage of Israel through the Red Sea, is therefore appointed as one of the proper lessons on Easter-day. And thus we obtain the ideas intended to be conveyed in this sublime but difficult verse, together with their application to the grand deliverance of the true David, in the day of God's power. Indeed it is not easy to accommodate to any part of the history of the son of Jesse those awful, majestick, and stupendous images, which are made use of throughout this whole description of the divine manifestation, from verse 7. But, however this be, most certainly every part of so solemn a scene of terrors forbids us to doubt but that a "greater than David is here;" since creation scarce affords colours brighter and stronger than those here employed, wherewith to paint the appearance of Jehovah at the day of final redemption. Bp. Horne.

[t] 16. He shall send down &c.] For this purpose did God in so wonderful a manner display his power and glory, that He might deliver the sufferer out of his troubles. This deliverance is first expressed metaphorically, by "drawing him out of the great waters," and then plainly, "he delivered me from my strong enemy," &c. The "great waters," in ver. 16, are the same with "the floods of the ungodly," in ver. 4. By these was Messiah, like David, oppressed and overwhelmed for a time; but, like David, He arose at length superior to them all. The "strong enemy" was obliged to give way to a "stronger than he, who overcame him, and took from him his armour in which he trusted, and divided the spoil," Luke xi. 22. Bp. Horne.

[u] 20. The Lord shall reward me after my righteous dealing: &c.] Commentators have been much perplexed to account for these unlimited claims to righteousness made by David, and that, long after the matter of Uriah, and towards the close of life. Certain indeed it is, that the expressions considered as David's must be confined either to his stedfast adherence to the true worship in opposition to idolatry, or to his innocency with regard to some particular crimes falsely alleged against him by his adversaries. But if the Psalm be prophetical, and sung by the victorious monarch in the person of King Messiah; then do the verses now before us no less exactly than beautifully delineate that all-perfect righteousness wrought by the Redeemer, in consequence of which He obtained deliverance for Himself and his people. Bp. Horne.

[x] 25. With the holy thou shalt be holy: &c.] The reason is here assigned why God "recompensed Messiah according to the cleanness of his hands," namely, because He is just in rendering to every one according to his works. He who "is merciful" to his brethren shall obtain the divine mercy; he who is "upright" in his dealings with others, will have justice done him by the great Judge against his iniquitous oppressors; he who is "pure" from deceit and hypocrisy in the service of his God, shall experience in himself a faithful and exact performance of the promises which God hath made to such: but the man that is "froward," perverse, and rebellious, must expect to grapple with an arm which will either humble or destroy. See Lev. xxvi. 3, 4, &c. 23, 24, &c. 1 Kings viii. 32. Prov. iii. 34. Bp. Horne.

[y] 28. Thou also shalt light my candle: &c.] The change of condition from tribulation and affliction to glory and honour is here set forth by that of a lamp, from a state of extinction to one of illumination; darkness being a well-known emblem of sorrow and death, as light is the established symbol of life and joy. Bp. Horne.

[z] 29. For in thee I shall discomfit &c.] Through the power of his divinity, the Captain of our salvation vanquished the host of darkness, and escaped from the sepulchre, notwithstanding all their precautions to fender of all them that put their trust in him.

31 For who is God, but the Lord: or who hath any strength, except our God?

32 It is God that girdeth me[b] with strength of war: and maketh my way perfect.

33 He maketh my feet like harts' feet: and setteth me up on high.

34 He teacheth mine hands to fight: and mine arms shall break even a bow of steel.

35 Thou hast given me the defence of thy salvation: thy right hand also shall hold me up, and thy loving correction shall make me great.

36 Thou shalt make room enough under me for to go: that my footsteps shall not slide.

37 I will follow upon mine enemies[c], and overtake them: neither will I turn again till I have destroyed them.

38 I will smite them, that they shall not be able to stand: but fall under my feet.

39 Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle: thou shalt throw down mine enemies under me.

40 Thou hast made mine enemies also to turn their backs upon me: and I shall destroy them that hate me.

41 They shall cry, but there shall be none[d] to help them: yea, even unto the Lord shall they cry, but he shall not hear them.

42 I will beat them as small[e] as the dust before the wind: I will cast them out as the clay in the streets.

confine Him there. Vain is every effort, by whomsoever it is made, against the counsels of Omnipotence. Bp. Horne.

[a] 30. The way of God is an undefiled way: &c.] The "way" of God is the course of his proceedings with men, and its "perfection" consists in the equity of those proceedings; the promises made in the "word of Jehovah" to his servants are "tried" in times of affliction and persecution, as gold in the fire, and found pure from any dross of deceit, or fallibility: He is ever a "shield" to protect "those who trust in him," during their stay here, until He becomes their "exceeding great reward" hereafter. Bp. Horne.

[b] 32. It is God that girdeth me &c.] In this and the following verses are enumerated the gifts of God to the spiritual warrior, whereby he is armed and prepared for the battle, after the example of his victorious leader. Thus St. Paul, Eph. vi. 14—17. Bp Horne.

[c] 37. I will follow upon mine enemies, &c.] If we suppose David in his conquests to have prefigured victorious Messiah, then have we, in these and the subsequent verses, a sublime description of that vengeance which Jesus, after his resurrection and ascension, inflicted on his hardened and impenitent enemies. His wrath "pursued" and "overtook" them, in the day of visitation; nor did it return, till, like a devouring fire, it had "consumed" the prey. The Jews were cast down, "not able to rise," or lift up themselves as a people, being crushed under the feet of the once-despised and insulted Nazarene. Bp. Horne.

[d] 41. They shall cry, but there shall be none &c.] Never was there a more just and lively portrait of the lamentable and desperate state of the Jews, when their calamities came upon them. "They cried, but—none to save!" They had rejected Him who alone could save, and who was now about to destroy them. They cried to Jehovah, and thought themselves still his favourite nation; but Jehovah and Jesus were one; so that, after putting the latter from them, they could not retain the former on their side. "He answered them not!" It was too late to knock, when the door was shut; too late to cry for mercy, when it was the time of justice. Let us knock, while yet the door may be opened; and not begin to pray, when prayer shall be no longer heard. Bp. Horne.

[e] 42. I will beat them as small &c.] The nature of that judgment which was executed upon the Jews, cannot be more accurately delineated, than by the two images here made use of. They were broken in pieces and dispersed over the face of the earth, by the breath of God's displeasure, like "dust before the wind; and as dirt in the streets, they were cast out," to be trodden under foot by all nations. O that every nation would so consider, as to avoid their crime and their punishment! Bp. Horne.

[f] 43. Thou shalt deliver me &c.] If David was delivered from the strivings of the people; if the adjacent heathen nations were added to his kingdom, and a "people, whom he had not known, served him;" how much more was this the case of the Son of David, when He was "delivered," by his resurrection, from the power of all his enemies; when He was made "head of the heathen," of whom, after their conversion, his church was, and to this day is, composed; and when, instead of the rejected Jews, a people, to whom before He had not been known, became his servants! Bp. Horne.

[g] 45. As soon as they hear of me, &c.] "As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me;" hereby is intimated the readiness with which the Gentiles should flow into the church, upon the preaching of the Gospel to them, when the Jews, after having so long and so often heard it, had nailed Christ to the cross, and driven the apostles out from among them. "The strangers shall submit themselves unto me;" the nations who were "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise," either cordially submitted to the sceptre of Christ, or at least dissembled their hostility, and yielded a feigned submission (for so the original word sometimes signifies); "the strangers shall fade away;" that is, such of them as set themselves against me, shall find their strength blasted and withered as a leaf in autumn, and shall fall at the sound of my name and my victories ; "they shall be afraid out of their close places ;" or rather "they shall come trembling from their strong holds," as places not able to protect them, and therefore they will sue for peace. Such seems to be the import of these two verses, which, therefore, denote the conquest of Messiah to have been every way complete. And accordingly, in the remaining part of the Psalm, the church, through Christ her head, blesseth Jehovah for the same. Bp. Horne.

[h] 50. For this cause &c.] Remarkable is the manner in which St. Paul cites this verse, Rom. xv. 9. The context runs thus :—"Now I say, that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers ; and that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy, as it is written, For this cause will I confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name." This verse is by the apostle produced as a proof, that the Gentiles were one day to glorify God, for the mercy vouchsafed them by Jesus Christ. But, according to the letter of the passage, King David only says, that he will give "thanks unto God among the heathen," on account of his own deliverance, and exaltation to the throne of Israel : for upon that occasion we know that he composed and sung the Psalm. This citation brought by St. Paul cannot therefore be to the purpose for which it is brought, unless the Psalm have a double sense ; unless God be glorified in it for the victory and inthronization of Christ, as well as for those of David ; and this cannot be, unless the same words, which literally celebrate the one, do likewise prophetically celebrate the other ; unless David be a figure of Christ, and speak in his person, and in that of his body, the church. While this Psalm is used as a Christian hymn, in the Gentile Christian church, David still continues, as he foresaw he should do, "to give thanks unto Jehovah, to glorify God among the Gentiles," for the mercies of redemption, and to "sing praises unto his name." Bp. Horne.

[i] 51. Great prosperity giveth he unto his King : &c.] To King David, in saving him from Saul, and his other temporal enemies, and seating him on the earthly throne of Israel ; to King Messiah, in rescuing Him from death and the grave, and exalting Him to an heavenly throne, as Head of the church : "and sheweth mercy to his Anointed ;" to Him who was anointed outwardly, and in a figure, with oil ; and to Him who was anointed inwardly, and in truth, with the Holy Ghost and with power ; "to David, and to his seed for evermore ;" to the literal David, and to his royal progeny, of whom, according to the flesh, Christ came ; and to Christ Himself, the spiritual David, the beloved of God, with all those who, through faith, become his children, the sons of God, and heirs of eternal life. Bp. Horne.

[k] PSALM xix.] In the former part of this beautiful Psalm, ver. 1—6, the heavens are represented as the instructors of mankind ; the subject, the universality, and the manner of their instructions are pointed out ; the glory, beauty, and powerful effects of the solar light are described. The latter part of the Psalm, 7—15, contains an encomium on the word of God, in which its properties are enumerated ; and a prayer of the Psalmist for pardoning and restraining grace, and for the acceptance of these and all other his devotions and meditations. From a citation which St. Paul hath made of the 4th verse, it appears, that, in the exposition, we are to raise our thoughts from things natural to things spiritual ; we are to contemplate the publication of the Gospel, the manifestation of the Light of Life, the Sun of Righteousness, and the efficacy of evangelical doctrine. In this view the ancients have considered the Psalm, and the Church hath therefore appointed it to be read on Christmas-day. Bp. Horne.

[l] 1. The heavens declare &c.] As every created thing is a proof of the divine power and goodness, so is his glory especially proclaimed by the beauty and magnificence of the heavenly bodies, and of that vast expanse wherein they move. Travell.

[m] — the glory of God : &c.] His glorious being or existence ; "his eternal power and Godhead," as it is particularly expressed, Rom. i. 20 ; his infinite wisdom and goodness. All which are so visible in them, that it is ridiculous to deny or doubt of them, as it is ridiculous to think of far meaner works of art, as an house or a book, that they were made without an artist or without an hand. Poole.

[n] 2. One day telleth another : &c.] There is one glory of the sun, which shines forth by day ; and there are other glories of the moon and of the stars, which become visible by night. And because day and night interchangeably divide the world between them, they are therefore represented as transmitting in succession, each to other, the task enjoined them. Bp. Horne.

[o] 3. There is neither speech &c.] According to our translators, the sense of this passage appears to be, that there is no nation or language, whither the instruction diffused by the heavens doth not reach. But as the same thought is so fully expressed in the next verse, "Their sound is gone out," &c., it seems most advis-language : but their voices are heard among them.

4 Their sound is gone out[p] into all lands : and their words into the ends of the world.

able to adhere to the original, which runs literally thus : "No speech, no words, their voice is not heard;" that is, although the heavens are thus appointed to teach, yet it is not by articulate sounds that they do it; they are not endowed, like man, with the faculty of speech; but they address themselves to the mind of the intelligent beholder in another way, and that, when understood, a no less forcible way, the way of picture or representation. So manifold is the wisdom of God : so various are the ways by which He communicates it to men. Bp. Horne.

Indeed these glorious bodies have not the gift of articulate speech, as we men have; but they afford as excellent lessons to instruct men in the wisdom and goodness of the great Creator, as if they had an hundred tongues. Dr. Nicholls.

[p] 4. Their sound is gone out &c.] St. Paul, Rom. x. 18, has applied the natural images of this verse to the manifestation of the Light of Life, by the sermons of those who were sent forth for that purpose. He is speaking of those Jews who had not obeyed the Gospel. "But I say," argues he, "have they not heard? Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world." As if he had said, They must have heard, since the apostles were commanded not to turn unto the Gentiles, till they had published their glad tidings throughout Judea; but the knowledge of Him is now become universal, and all flesh has seen the glory of the Lord: the Light Divine, like that in the heavens, has visited the whole world, as the prophet David foretold, in the 19th Psalm. The apostle cannot be supposed to have made use of this Scripture in a sense of accommodation only, because he cites it among other texts which he produces merely as prophecies. And if such be its meaning, if the heavens thus declare the glory of God, and this is the great lesson they are incessantly teaching : what other language do they speak than that their Lord is the representative of ours, the bright ruler in the natural world of the more glorious one in the spiritual, their sun of the "Sun of Righteousness?" Bp. Horne.

[q] 5. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun : &c.] In the centre of the heavens there is a tent pitched by the Creator for the residence of that most glorious of inanimate substances, the solar light; from thence it issues with the beauty of a bridegroom, and the vigour of a champion, to run its course, and perform its operations. A tabernacle in like manner was prepared for Him, who saith of Himself, "I am the light of the world," John viii. 12. And as the light of the sun goes out in the morning with inconceivable activity, new and youthful itself, and communicating life and gaiety to all things around it like a bridegroom, in the marriage garment, from his chamber to his nuptials; so, at his incarnation, did the Light Divine, the promised Bridegroom, visit his church, being clad Himself, and clothing her, with that robe of righteousness which is styled, in holy Scripture, the marriage garment; and the joy, which his presence administered, was like the benefits of it, universal. And as the material light is always ready to run its heavenly race, daily issuing forth with renewed vigour, like an invincible champion still fresh to labour; so likewise did He rejoice to run his glorious race; He excelled in strength, and his works were great and marvellous; He triumphed over the powers of darkness; He shed abroad on all sides his bright beams upon his church; He became her deliverer, her protector, and support; and shewed Himself able, in every respect, to accomplish for her the mighty task He has undertaken. Bp. Horne.

What is here said of the sun, Justin Martyr affirms to be a Scripture spoken of Christ. Thus we know the title of "Sun of Righteousness," in the prophecy of Malachi iv. 2, is mystically understood to denote Christ, who is that "true light, which coming into the world lighteneth every man." And so that of the "bridegroom," to which the sun is here resembled, is a signal title of Christ, in respect of his spouse the church : and so also that of the "strong man" or "giant," eminently denoting Christ, among whose titles is that of "mighty God," Isa. ix. 6. Dr. Hammond.

[r] 6. It goeth forth &c.] The light, diffused on every side from its fountain, extendeth to the extremities of heaven, filling the whole circle of creation, penetrating even to the inmost substances of grosser bodies, and acting in and through all other matter, as the general cause of life and motion. Thus unbounded and efficacious was the influence of the Sun of Righteousness, when He sent out his word enlightening and enlivening all things by the glory of his grace. His celestial rays, like those of the sun, took their circuit round the earth; they went forth out of Judea into all parts of the habitable world, and there was no corner of it so remote as to be without the reach of their penetrating and healing power. "The Lord gave the word, great was the company of those that published it," Ps. lxviii. 11. It was the express declaration of our Saviour Himself, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come," Matt. xxiv. 14. And St. Paul affirms, that the Gospel was "come unto all the world, and had been preached to every creature under heaven," Col. i. 6, and 23. The prophet, therefore, having thus foretold the mission of the apostles, and the success of their ministry, proceeds, in the next place, to describe their "doctrine;" so that what follows is a fine encomium upon the Gospel, written with all the simplicity peculiar to the sacred language, and in a strain far surpassing the utmost efforts of human eloquence. Bp. Horne.

[s] 10. More to be desired are they than gold, &c.] What wonder is it, that this converting, instructing, exhilarating, enlightening, eternal, true, and righteous word, should be declared preferable to the riches of eastern kings, and sweeter to the soul of the pious believer, than the sweetest thing we know of is to the bodily taste? How ready we are to acknowledge all this! Yet the next hour, perhaps, we part with the true riches to obtain the earthly mammon, and barter away the joys of the Spirit for the gratifications of sense! Bp. Horne.

[t] 11. Moreover, by them is thy servant taught : &c.] The Psalmist here bears his own testimony to the character above given of the divine word; as if he had said, The several parts of this perfect law, hereafter to be published to the whole race of mankind, have been all along my great instructors, and the only source of all the knowledge to which thy servant hath attained; and I am fully assured, that the blessed fruit of them, when they are duly observed, and have their proper effect, is exceeding glorious, even eternal life. Bp. Horne.

[u] 12. Who can tell &c.] The perfection and spirituality of God's law render it almost impossible for a fallen son of Adam even to know all the innumerable instances of his transgressing it. Add to which, that false principles and inveterate prejudices make us regard many things as innocent, and some things as laudable, which in the eye of Heaven are far otherwise. Self-examination is a duty which few practise as they ought to do : and he who practises it best, will always have reason to conclude his particular confessions with this general petition, "Cleanse thou me from secret faults!" Bp. Horne.

[x] 13. Keep thy servant also &c.] In the preceding verse, David had implored God's pardoning grace, to cleanse him from the secret sins of ignorance and infirmity : in this he begs his restraining grace, to keep him back from presumptuous sins, or sins committed knowingly, deliberately, and with a high hand, against the convictions and the remonstrances of conscience : he prays that such sins might not "have dominion over him," or that he might not, by contracting evil habits, become the slave of an imperious lust, which might at length lead him on to "the great transgression," to rebellion, and final apostasy from God; for he who would be innocent from the "great transgression," must beware of indulging himself in any. Bp. Horne.

[y] 14. Let the words of my mouth, &c.] The prophet, having before solicited the justification of his person through grace, concludes with a petition for the acceptance of all his offerings, and more especially of these his meditations at the hands of that blessed One, whom he addresses as the author of all good, and the deliverer from all evil; as the "strength" and the "Redeemer" of his people. Bp. Horne.

[z] PSALM XX.] This is a form of prayer to be offered by the congregation for their prince, in all times of danger, that God will protect and assist him. It was indited by David himself, to be used as occasion required. Dr. Hammond. It is also a prayer of the church for the prosperity of King Messiah going forth to the battle as her champion and deliverer. Bp. Horne.

[a] 1. The Lord hear thee &c.] This may be considered as the address of a people to their king, when he goeth forth to battle against their enemies. But it is to be regarded in a more general and useful view, as the address of the church to her King, in "the day of his trouble." Bp. Horne.

[b] 2. Send thee help from the sanctuary : &c.] Either from heaven, as it is expressed ver. 6: or from the tabernacle in Sion, as it is expressed in the next words, where the ark then was: towards which the Israelites directed their prayers, and from which God heard and answered them. Poole.

[c] 5. We will rejoice in thy salvation, &c.] As if it were said, Our minds forebode, that we shall return, rejoicing in the preservation, which thou shalt have procured for us, and triumphing in the name of our great Jehovah. Dr. Nichols. The joy of the church is in the salvation of Christ: and the joy of every individual is in the application of that salvation to himself and all around him. *Bp. the prophecies going before concerning the salvation of Messiah. Our assurance is strengthened by the actual performance of so great a part of the counsel of God. We know that the Lord has "saved his Anointed:" that his Anointed saveth all, who believe and obey Him, from their sins: and therefore we doubt not, but that by "the strength of his right hand," or by the excellency of his power, He will finally save them from death, and rescue them from the grave. *Bp. And, in the spiritual war, in which we are all engaged, the first and necessary step to victory is, to renounce all confidence in the wisdom and strength of nature and the world; and to remember, that we can do nothing, but in the name, by the merits, through the power, and for the sake, of Jesus Christ, our Lord and our God. Bp. Horne.

[f] 8. They are brought down, &c.] This was eminently the case when the pride and power of Jewish infidelity and pagan idolatry fell before the victorious sermons and lives of the humble believers in Jesus: this is the case in every conflict with our spiritual enemies, when we engage them in the name, the spirit, and the power of Christ; and this will be the case at the last day, when the world, with the prince of it, shall be "brought down, and fall; but we, risen" from the dead, through the resurrection of our Lord, shall "stand upright" in the courts of heaven, and sing the praises of Him who getteth us all our victories. Bp. Horne.

[g] Psalm xxi.] Theodoret truly observes, that in this Psalm, as well as the former, David speaks in the person of the people: whom he instructs how to give God thanks for granting him those victories, which they prayed for in the Psalm foregoing. And it is generally looked upon as describing, under that figure, the exaltation, glory, and majesty of Christ, which he obtained by his bloody death and passion. Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the Messiah. So that it may be called a Psalm of triumph, after the victories, which David got over his enemies; which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things in it, which are more literally fulfilled in Christ, than in David, as verses 4—6. Bp. Patrick.

This is one of the proper Psalms, which the Church hath appointed to be used on Ascension-day, and wherein, 1—6, she celebrates the victory of her Redeemer, and the glory consequent thereupon; she prophesies, 7, the stability of his kingdom, and, 8—12, the destruction of the enemies thereof; concluding with a prayer for his final triumph and exaltation; the celebration of which, with everlasting hallelujahs, will be her employment in heaven. Bp. Horne.

[h] 1. The King shall rejoice &c.] What is here said of David being delivered out of his dangers, and of the cause which he had to rejoice and triumph exceedingly, hath a more eminent completion in the resurrection of the Messiah. Dr. Hammond.

[i] 3. For thou shalt prevent him &c.] The Son of God could not be more ready to ask for the blessings of the divine goodness, than the Father was to give them: and his disposition is the same towards all his adopted sons. Christ, as king and priest, weareth a crown of glory, represented by the purest and most resplendent of metals, gold. Bp. Horne.

[j] 4. He asked life of thee, &c.] The life, asked by Christ, was not a continuance in this valley of tears, but that new and eternal life consequent upon a resurrection from the dead. For thus his petition was granted in "length of days for ever and ever." "He died no more; death had no more dominion over him." Bp. Horne.

[k] 5. His honour is great in thy salvation: &c.] What tongue can express the "glory, honour, and majesty," with which the King of righteousness and peace was invested, upon his ascension; when He took possession of the throne prepared for Him, and received the homage of heaven and earth! The sacred imagery in St. John's Revelation sets them before our eyes in such a manner that no one can read the description, whose heart will not burn within him through impatient desire to behold them. See Rev. chap. iv. vii. xix. xxi, xxii. Bp. Horne.

[l] 6. For thou shalt give him everlasting felicity: &c.] Thou hast not only bestowed extraordinary benefits upon himself, but made him a blessing to future generations. Bp. Patrick. Christ, by his death and passion, having removed the curse, became the fountain of all blessings to his people, in time and eternity; being Himself the blessing promised to Abraham, and the object of the patriarchal benedictions. The joy communicated to the humanity of our Lord, from the divine nature, shall be shed abroad on all his saints, when admitted to view the "countenance of God," in the face of Jesus Christ. Then they shall enter into "the joy of their Lord." Bp. Horne.

PSALM xxii.[r] Deus, Deus meus.

Good Friday, first Psalm Morn. Serv.

MY God, my God[s], look upon me; why hast thou forsaken me: and art so far from my health, from helping me. Bib. Trans.

of Christ, as a man, was erected and established, by his trust and confidence in the Father, during his humiliation and passion. Faith in God, therefore, is the way that leadeth to honour and stability. "Look at the generations of old, and see: did ever any trust in the Lord, and was confounded?" Ecclus. ii. 10. Bp. Horne.

[n] 8. All thine enemies shall feel thy hand: &c.] The same right hand of Jehovah is glorious in power to save his people, and to destroy his enemies; to convert the Gentiles, and to crush the Jews; to exalt the faithful to heaven, and cast down the unbelieving to hell: neither is there any treason against the King of heaven, which shall not be dragged forth into the light, made manifest, judged, and condemned. Let thy hand, O Lord, be upon our sins to destroy them; but upon us, to save us. Bp. Horne.

[o] 10. Their fruit shalt thou root out &c.] A day is coming, when all the "fruits" of sin, brought forth by sinners, in their words, their writings, and their actions, shall be "destroyed;" yea, the tree itself, which had produced them, shall be rooted up, and cast into the fire. The "seed" and posterity of the wicked, if they continue in the way of their forefathers, will be punished like them. Let parents consider, that upon their principles and practices may depend the salvation or destruction of multitudes after them. The case of the Jews, daily before their eyes, should make them tremble. Bp. Horne.

[p] 11. For they intended mischief &c.] Vengeance came upon the Jews to the uttermost, because of their intended malice against Christ. They, like Joseph's brethren, "thought evil against him;" but "they were not able to perform it;" "for God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive," Gen. l. 20. So let all the designs of ungodly men against thy church, O Lord, through thy power of bringing good out of evil, turn to her advantage: and let all men be convinced, that no weapon formed against Thee can prosper. Bp. Horne.

[q] 13. Be thou exalted, Lord, &c.] The church concludes with a joyful acclamation to her Redeemer, wishing for his "exaltation in his own strength," as God, who was to be abased in much weakness, as man. We still continue to wish and pray for his exaltation over sin, in the hearts of his people by grace, and finally over death, in their bodies, by his glorious power at the resurrection. The triumph over sin we sing in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, upon earth; that over death, we shall praise with everlasting hallelujahs, in heaven. Bp. Horne.

[r] Psalm xxii.] This Psalm, which the Church hath appointed to be used on Good Friday, as our Lord uttered the first verse of it when hanging on the cross, consisteth of two parts. The former, 1—21, treateth of the passion; the latter, 22—32, celebrateth the resurrection of Jesus, with its effects. 1, 2, He complaineth of being forsaken; 3—5, acknowledgeth the holiness of the Father, and pleadeth the former deliverances of the church; 6—8, describeth his humiliation, with the taunts and reproaches of the Jews; 9—11, expresseth his faith, and prayeth for help; 12—18, particularizeth his sufferings; 19—21, repeateth his supplications; 22—25, declareth his resolution to praise the Father for his deliverance, and exhorteth his church to do the same; 26—32, prophesieth the conversion of the Gentile world to the faith and worship of the true God. Bp. Horne.

The question, proposed Acts viii. 34, is very proper here, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this" Psalm? "Of himself? or of some other man?" It is confessed that David was a type of Christ; and that many Psalms, or passages of the Psalms, though properly and literally understood of David, yet had a further and mystical reference to Christ, in whom they were accomplished. But there are some other Psalms or passages in the Psalms, as also some chapters or passages in other prophets, especially in Isaiah, who lived not very long after David, which either by those sacred penmen, or at least by the Holy Ghost inspiring them, which is one and the same thing, were directly, primarily, and immediately intended for, and are properly and literally to be understood of, the Messiah: though withal there may be some respect and allusion to the state of the penman himself, who being a type of Christ, it is not strange if there be many resemblances between them. And this seems to be the state of this Psalm, which is understood of the Messiah by the Hebrew doctors themselves, and by Christ Himself, and by his apostles, as we shall see. And there are many passages in it, which were most literally accomplished in Him, and cannot in a tolerable sense be understood of any other. And therefore I doubt not, that David, though he had an eye to his own condition in divers passages here used, yet was carried forth by the Spirit of prophecy beyond himself and unto Christ, to whom alone it truly and fully agrees. Poole.

[s] 1. My God, my God, &c.] Christ, the beloved Son of the Father, when hanging on the cross, complained in these words, that He was deprived, for a time, of the divine presence and comforting influence, while He suffered for our sins. If the Master thus underwent the trial of a spiritual desertion, why doth the disciple think it strange, unless the light of heaven shine continually upon his tabernacle? Let us comfort ourselves, in such circumstances, with the thought, that we are thereby conformed to the image of our dying Lord. Bp. Horne.

[t] 2. O my God, I cry &c.] Even our Lord Himself, as man, prayed, "that if it were possible, the cup might pass from him;" but God had ordained otherwise, for his own glory, and for man's salvation. "Day and night," in prosperity and adversity, living and dying, let us not be "silent," but cry for deliverance; always remembering to add, as Christ did, "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." Nor let any man be impatient for the return of his prayers, since every petition preferred even by the Son of God Himself was not granted. Bp. Horne.

[u] 3. And thou continuest holy: &c.] Whatever befalleth the members of the church, the Head thereof here teacheth them to confess the justice and holiness of God in all his proceedings; and to acknowledge, that whether He exalteth or humbleth his people, He is to be praised and glorified by them. Bp. Horne.

[x] 4. Our fathers hoped in thee: &c.] Trust in God is the way to "deliverance," and the former instances of the divine favour are so many arguments why we should hope for the same; but it may not always be vouchsafed, when we expect it. The patriarchs and Israelites of old were often saved from their enemies; the holy Jesus is left to languish and expire under the malice of his. God knows what is proper for Him to do, and for us to suffer; we know neither. This consideration is an anchor for the afflicted soul, sure and stedfast. Bp. Horne.

[y] 6. But as for me, &c.] This and the two following verses, though they have a first sense historically verified in David, at the time of his flying from his enemies, yet are they, in a much higher, and also more literal sense, fulfilled in Christ upon the cross. Dr. Hammond. He, who spareth all other men, spared not his own Son; He spared not Him, that He might spare them. The Redeemer of the world scrupleth not to compare Himself, in his state of humiliation, to the lowest reptile which his own hand had formed, a "worm," humble, silent, innocent, overlooked, oppressed, and trodden under foot. Bp. Horne.

[z] 7, 8. All they that see me &c.] This was literally fulfilled, when Messiah hung upon the cross, and the priests and elders used the very words that had been put into their mouths, by the spirit of prophecy, so long before, Matt. xxvii. 41. 43, "The chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him." Bp. Horne.

[a] 9, 10. But thou art he &c.] This was eminently the case of Christ, who was the Son of God in a sense in which no other man ever was. But in Him we are all children of God by adoption; we are all in the hands of a gracious Providence from the womb; and into those hands must we commend ourselves, when about to depart hence. To whom else, then, should we have recourse, for support and consolation, in the day of calamity and sorrow? Bp. Horne.

[b] 12. Many oxen are come about me: &c.] From the eleventh verse to the nineteenth the sufferings of the holy Jesus are described, in terms partly figurative, and partly literal. A lamb, in the midst of wild "bulls and lions," is a very lively representation of his meekness and innocence, and of the noise and fury of his implacable enemies. "Bashan" was a fertile country, Numb. xxxii. 4; and the cattle there fed were fat and "strong," Deut. xxxii. 14. Like them, the Jews, in that good land, "waxed fat and kicked," grew proud and rebelled: "forsook God that made them, and lightly esteemed the rock of their salvation," ver. 15. Let both communities and individuals, when blessed with peace, plenty, and prosperity in the world, take sometimes into consideration this flagrant instance of their being abused; with the final consequence of such abuse. Bp. Horne.

[c] 14, 15. I am poured out like water, &c.] I am grown as weak as water; my joints have not strength to support my body; and all my vitals consume away, as wax melteth before the fire. All my natural moisture is decayed, and I am become as dry as a broken piece of earthenware; my tongue, through my continual feverish drought, sticks to the roof of my mouth; and thou, O Lord, art just bringing me down to the grave. Dr. Nicholls. For our sakes Christ yielded Himself, like "water," without resistance, to the violence of his enemies; suffering his "bones," in which consisteth the strength of the frame, to be distended and dislocated upon the cross; while, by reason of the fire from above, my heart also in the midst of my body is even like melting wax.

15 My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue cleaveth to my gums: and thou shalt bring me into the dust of death.

to the burning heat of which this paschal Lamb was exposed, his heart dissolved and melted away. The intenseness of his passion, drying up all the fluids, brought on a thirst, tormenting beyond expression; and, at last, laid Him low in the grave. Bp. Horne.

[d] 16. For many dogs are come about me: &c.] Our Lord, who compared Himself above, ver. 12, to a lamb in the midst of bulls and lions, here setteth Himself forth again under the image of a hart, or hind, roused early in the morning of his mortal life, hunted and chased all the day, and in the evening pulled down to the ground, by those who "compassed" and "inclosed" Him, thirsting and clamouring for his blood, crying, "Away with him, away with him! crucify him, crucify him!" And the next step was, the "piercing of his hands and his feet," by nailing them to the cross. Bp. Horne.

This was most eminently fulfilled in Christ at his crucifixion: but there is nothing like it in the history of David, of whom it can be said only figuratively. Dr. Hommond, Bp. Patrick.

[e] 17. — I may tell all my bones: &c.] The skin and flesh were distended, by the posture of the body on the cross, that the bones, as through a thin veil, became visible, and might be counted; and the holy Jesus, forsaken and stripped, naked and bleeding, was a spectacle to heaven and earth. Look unto Him, and be ye saved, ye ends of the world! Bp. Horne.

[f] 18. They part my garments &c.] See John xix. 23, 24. This also was literally fulfilled in Christ, but not in David, in whose story we find nothing like it. Bp. Patrick.

[g] 19. But be not thou far from me, &c.] The circumstances of the passion being thus related, Christ resumes the prayer with which this Psalm begins, and which is repeated, ver. 10, 11. The adversary had emptied his quiver, and spent all the venom of his malice; Messiah therefore prayeth for a manifestation of the power and favour of heaven on his side, in a joyful and glorious resurrection. Bp. Horne.

[h] 20. Deliver my soul from the sword: &c.] The wrath of God was the "sword," which took vengeance on all men in their representative; it was the "flaming sword," which kept men out of Paradise; the sword, to which it was said, at the time of the passion—"Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts: smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered," Zech. xiii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 31. The ravening fury of the "dog," the "lion," and the "unicorn," a fierce and untameable creature of the stag kind, (rather the rhinoceros,) is made use of to describe the rage of the devil and his instruments, whether spiritual or corporeal. From all these Christ supplicates the Father for deliverance. Bp. Horne.

[i] 22. I will declare thy Name &c.] The former part of the Psalm we have seen to be prophetical of the passion. The strain now changes to an epinikion, or hymn of triumph, in the mouth of the Redeemer, celebrating his victory, and its happy consequences. This verse is cited by the apostle, Heb. ii. 11, "Both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren," &c. And accordingly, when the deliverance, so long wished, and so earnestly prayed for, was accomplished by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, He "declared the name of God," by his apostles, to all his "brethren;" and caused the church to resound with incessant praises and hallelujahs; all which are here represented as proceeding from the body, by and through Him who is the head of that body. Bp. Horne.

[k] 24. For he hath not despised, &c.] The great subjects of praise and thanksgiving, in the church, are the sufferings of the lowly and afflicted Jesus, and the acceptance of those sufferings by the Father, as a propitiation for the sins of the world; which acceptance was testified by raising Him from the dead; inasmuch as the discharge of the surety proved the payment of the debt. The poor and afflicted brethren of Christ may take comfort from this verse; for if they suffer in his spirit, they will be raised in his glory. Bp. Horne.

[l] 25. My praise is of thee &c.] The vow of Christ was, to build and consecrate to Jehovah a spiritual temple, in which the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise should be continually offered. This vow He performed, after his resurrection, by the hands of his apostles, and still continueth to perform, by those of his ministers, carrying on the work of edification in "the great congregation" of the Gentile Christian church. The vows of Christ cannot fail of being performed. Bp. Horne.

2 He shall feed me in a green pasture[u]: and lead me forth beside the waters of comfort.

[m] 26. The poor shall eat, &c.] A spiritual banquet is prepared in the church for the meek and lowly of heart; the bread of life and the wine of salvation are set forth in the word and sacraments; and they, that hunger and thirst after righteousness, shall be "satisfied" therewith: they, "who seek" the Lord Jesus in his ordinances, ever find reason to "praise him;" while, nourished by these noble and heavenly viands, they live the life, and work the works of grace, proceeding still forward to glory; when their "heart shall live for ever," in heaven. Bp. Horne.

[n] 27. All the ends of the world &c.] The great truths of man's creation and fall, with the promise of a Redeemer to come, were "forgotten" by the nations, after their apostasy from the true God, and the one true religion; but were, as we may say, recalled to their "remembrance," by the sermons of the apostles, and the writings of Moses and the prophets, translated, and spread among them. By these they were converted to the faith, and now compose the holy church universal throughout the world; being the glorious proofs and fruits of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Bp. Horne.

[o] 28. For the kingdom is the Lord's: &c.] There is good reason why the nations should worship Christ, and throw away their idols; since in his hands, not in theirs, is the government of the world. Upon his ascension He was crowned King of kings, and Lord of lords; He ruleth in the church by his Spirit; and blessed are the hearts that are his willing subjects in the day of his power. Bp. Horne.

[p] 29. All such as be fat upon earth: &c.] It was said above, ver. 26, "the meek," the poor and lowly, "shall eat and be satisfied." It is here foretold, that the "fat ones of the earth," the great, the opulent, the flourishing, the nobles and princes of the world, should be called in to partake of the feast, and to "worship" God. Rich, as well as poor, are invited; and the hour is coming, when all the race of Adam, as many as sleep in the "dust" of the earth, unable to raise themselves from thence, quickened and called forth by the voice of the Son of man, must "bow" the knee to King Messiah. Bp. Horne.

[q] 31. My seed shall serve him: &c.] The apostle informeth us, Rom. ix. 8, that "the children of the promise are counted for the seed;" that is, the converts to be made, among the nations, by the preaching of the Gospel, according to the promise to Abraham; these were to constitute the church and family of Christ, the "generation" of the faithful; these were to take the place, and enjoy the privileges, of the Jews, cut off because of their unbelief. Lord, enable us to serve Thee all our lives, with a service acceptable to Thee in Christ Jesus; that at the resurrection of the just, we may be numbered in the generation of thy children. Bp. Horne.

[r] 32. They shall come, &c.] The promised and expected race shall spring forth at the time appointed, and proclaim the "righteousness," which is of God by faith, to ages and generations yet unborn: who, hearing of that great work, which the Lord shall have wrought, for the salvation of men, will thereby be led to glorify Him in the church for the same to the end of time. Bp. Horne.

[s] Psalm xxiii.] This Psalm was composed by David, and is a most pathetic expression of God's abundant care and providence toward all those that faithfully depend on Him: and hath its most eminent completion in Christ, the great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, of whom it is a prophecy. Dr. Hammond. In it "the sheep of God's pasture" address themselves to their great and good Shepherd, declaring, 1, their acquiescence and confidence in Him; 2, his diligence in feeding them with the food of eternal life; 3, his watchful care in bringing them back from the ways of error, and conducting them in the path of truth; 4, his power in saving them from death; 5, his loving-kindness in vouchsafing his spiritual comforts, during their pilgrimage in an enemy's country; and, 6, they express their hope and trust, that a continuation of that loving-kindness will enable them to pass through the vanities and vexations of time, to the blissful glories of eternity. Bp. Horne.

[t] 1. The Lord is my Shepherd: &c.] In these words the believer is taught to express his absolute acquiescence and complacency, in the guardian care of the great Pastor of the universe, the Redeemer and Preserver of men. With joy he reflects, that he hath a "Shepherd;" and that that Shepherd is Jehovah, one possessed of all the qualities requisite to constitute the pastoral character in the highest perfection. For where shall we ever find such unexampled diligence, such inexpressible tenderness, such exquisite skill, such all-subduing might, and such unwearied patience? Why should they fear, who have such a friend? How can they "want," who have such a "Shepherd?" Bp. Horne.

in verdant meadows, and reposing, in quietness, by the rivers of water, running gently through them. It is selected, to convey an idea of the provision made for the souls, as well as bodies of men, by his goodness, who "openeth his hand, and filleth all things living with plenteousness. By me," saith the Redeemer, "if any man enter in, He shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture," John x. 9. And what saith the Spirit of peace and comfort? "Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely," Rev. xxii. 17. Bp. Horne.

[x] 3. He shall convert my soul: &c.] To "restore," or bring back, those that had "gone astray," that is, in other words, to "call sinners to repentance," was the employment of Him who, in the parable of the "lost sheep," representeth Himself as executing that part of the pastoral office. By the same kind hand, when "restored," they are thenceforth led in "the path of righteousness;" in the way of holy obedience. Bp. Horne.

[y] 4. Yea, though I walk &c.] The sheep here express their confidence in the power of their Shepherd, as sufficient to defend them against the last and most formidable enemy, death himself. In all our dangers and distresses, but chiefly in our last and greatest need, let "thy rod," the sceptre of thy kingdom, O Lord, protect us, and thy pastoral "staff" guide and support our steps; till, through the dreaded valley, we pass to the heavenly mountain, on which St. John saw "the Lamb standing, with a great multitude, redeemed from the earth." Rev. xiv. 1. 4. Bp. Horne.

[z] 5. Thou shalt prepare a table &c.] Another set of images, borrowed from a feast, is introduced to give us ideas of those cordials and comforts prepared to cheer and invigorate the fainting soul, while, surrounded by "enemies," it is accomplishing its pilgrimage through life; during which time, its sorrows and afflictions are alleviated and sweetened by the joys and consolations of the Holy One; by the feast of a good conscience; by the bread of life, the "oil" of gladness, and the "cup" of salvation, still full, and "running over." Bp. Horne.

[a] 6. But thy loving-kindness and mercy &c.] Experience of "goodness and mercy," already so often vouchsafed, begets an assurance of their being continued to the end; for nothing can separate us from the love of Christ, if we do not separate ourselves from it. Thus will the Lord, our Saviour, provide for us on earth, and conduct us to heaven; where we shall dwell to "length of days," even the days of eternity, "one fold under one Shepherd:" a fold into which no enemy enters, and from which no friend departs; where we shall rest from all our labours, and see a period to all our sorrows; where the voice of praise and thanksgiving is heard continually; where all the faithful, from Adam to his last-born son, shall meet together, to behold the face of Jesus, and to be blessed with the vision of the Almighty; where "we shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on us, nor any heat. But the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed us, and lead us to living fountains of waters." Rev. vii. 16, 17. Bp. Horne.

[b] PSALM XXIV.] This is a Psalm of David, composed by him, as is thought, when the ark was brought from the house of Obed-edom, 2 Sam. vi, and settled in the house which he had prepared for it in mount Sion. And, as that was a type of Christ's ascension into heaven, so is this Psalm a prophecy of that exaltation likewise. It seems to be a song in parts: and the latter part especially is a beautiful instance of the ancient manner of singing or chanting the Psalms alternately. Dr. Nicholls, Travell.

The plan of this Psalm, according to the letter of it, is beautifully delineated by Bishop Lowth, in his xxviith lecture. The ark of God is supposed to be moving, in a grand and solemn procession of the whole Israelitish nation, towards the place of its future residence, on mount Sion: see 1 Chron. xv. On ascending the mountain, the Psalm is sung, declaring, 1, 2, the sovereignty of Jehovah over all the earth; describing, 3—6, what the character ought to be of that people whom He had more peculiarly selected, to serve Him in the house where his glory was to dwell, and of which, 7—10, it was now about to take possession. All this is by us to be applied to the Christian church, and the ascension of our Lord into heaven; for which reason, the Psalm is one of those appointed to be used on Ascension-day. Bp. Horne.

[c] 1. The earth is the Lord's, &c.] The God of Israel was Lord of the whole earth, by right of creation. The same divine Person who created the world, hath since, in Christ, redeemed it; and it is his again, by that right also. But the church Christian is his, in a more peculiar manner, as the church of Israel formerly was. We are doubly bound to adore and to obey Him. "It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves," Ps. c. 2: and "we are not our own, being bought with a price," 1 Cor. vi. 20. The inference is, "Let us glorify God in our bodies, and in our spirits, which are," every way, "God's." Bp. Horne.

[d] 2. For he hath founded it upon the seas: &c.] He hath caused the waters to lie lower than the surface of the earth, for the convenience of man's habitation: so hath He therefore lifted the earth over the sea, as if, to our sense, it were founded thereupon. Bp. Hall.

seems to be this. If the Almighty Creator and Lord of all the earth has chosen us to be his peculiar people, to serve and worship Him in his temple, upon the holy hill of Sion, whither the sacred symbol of his presence is now ascending, what manner of persons ought we to be? The reasoning is exactly the same, as Bishop Lowth observes, with that of Moses, in Deut. x. 14—16, "Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is. Only the Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiffnecked." The argument applies, with additional force, to ourselves, as Christians. We compose a far more numerous and magnificent procession than that of the Israelites, when the church universal, with her spiritual services, attends our Lord, as it were, upon his ascension, in heart and mind ascending with Him into the holy places not made with hands. Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. This is the generation &c.] Such ought the people to be who seek the presence of God, and approach to worship Him in the sanctuary; who celebrate the ascension of their Redeemer, and hope, one day, to follow Him into those happy mansions, which He has gone before to prepare for them. Bp. Horne.

[g] 7. Lift up your heads, &c.] We must now form to ourselves an idea of the Lord of glory, after his resurrection from the dead, making his entry into the eternal temple in heaven, as of old, by the symbol of his presence, He took possession of that figurative and temporary structure which once stood upon the hill of Sion. We are to conceive Him gradually rising, from mount Olivet, into the air, taking the clouds for his chariot, and ascending up on high; while some of the angels, like the Levites in procession, attendant on the triumphant Messiah in the day of his power, demand that those everlasting gates and doors, hitherto shut and barred against the race of Adam, should be thrown open for his admission into the realms of bliss. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." On hearing this voice of jubilee and exultation from the earth, the abode of misery and sorrow, the rest of the angels, astonished at the thought of a man claiming a right of entrance into their happy regions, ask from within, like the Levites in the temple, "Who is this King of glory?" To which question the attendant angels answer, in a strain of joy and triumph—and let the church of the redeemed answer with them—"The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle:" the Lord Jesus, victorious over sin, death, and hell. Therefore we say, and with holy transport we repeat it, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." And if any ask, "Who is the King of glory?" to heaven and earth we proclaim aloud, "The Lord of Hosts;" all-conquering Messiah, Head over every creature, the Leader of the armies of Jehovah, "He is the King of glory." Even so, Glory be to thee, O Lord most high! Amen. Hallelujah. Bp. Horne.

[h] PSALM XXV.] This Psalm, composed by David in some time of distress, is a divine mixture of prayer for pardon of sin, and deliverance from evil; and also of meditation on God's gracious dealings with his servants. Dr. Hammond.

It is much the same, whether we suppose the Church, or any single member thereof, to be speaking throughout this Psalm, and praying, 1, 2, for help and protection against spiritual enemies; 3, 4, for knowledge and direction in the way of godliness; pleading for this purpose, 5, 6, God's mercies of old; 7, the perfections of his nature; 8, 9, enumerating the qualifications requisite for scholars in the divine school; 10, upon the strength of these arguments enforcing the petition for mercy; 11—13, describing the blessedness of the man who feareth the Lord; 14—20, preferring divers petitions; and, 21, closing the whole with one for the final redemption of the Israel of God. Bp. Horne.

[i] 5. Call to remembrance, &c.] The soul, when hard beset with sins and sorrows, is apt to think that God hath forsaken and forgotten her. In this case she cannot more effectually prevail upon Him or comfort herself, than by recollecting, and, as it were, reminding

BE thou my Judge, O Lord[s], for I have walked innocently : my

Him of former mercies; since, however the dispositions and affections of men may alter, God is always the same. Bp. Horne.

[k] 6. O remember not the sins &c.] When God remembers his mercy, He forgets our sins; and when He forgets our sins, He remembers his mercy; for what else is his mercy but the forgiveness, the blotting out, the non-imputation of sin? Who, that has lived long in the world, can survey the time past of his life, without breaking forth into this petition, adding, to "the sins of his youth," the many transgressions of his riper years? Bp. Horne.

[l] 11. What man is he, that feareth the Lord: &c.] The blessings consequent upon "the fear of the Lord" are such as will fully justify the earnestness and fervour of the foregoing petitions for pardon and grace. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." He who hath it will "choose" the right way, and will be "taught" to go therein. Bp. Horne.

[m] 12. His soul shall dwell at ease: &c.] It is a privilege of "the man who feareth the Lord," that, not only in this present life, all things work together for his "good," but his soul, after having persevered in righteousness, shall take up its abode in the mansions of felicity. His "seed" likewise shall be blessed in the same manner, with such a portion of the temporal promise made to Abraham as God seeth best for them, and certainly with an abundant share in the spiritual inheritance, the new earth, wherein dwell righteousness, joy, and glory. "Blessed are the meek," the seed of Christ, "for they shall inherit the earth," Matt. v. 5. Bp. Horne.

[n] 13. The secret of the Lord &c.] The meaning is, that it is part of the gracious decree and covenant of God, made in Christ with all those, that truly fear and serve him, and endeavour sincerely to do what He commands, never to conceal from them the knowledge of his will, so far as their practice is concerned in it. Dr. Hammond.

The greatest happiness of man in this world is, to know the fixed and determinate counsels of God concerning the human race, and to understand the covenant of redemption. This likewise is the reward of "the fear of the Lord," which humbles the soul, and prepares it for divine illumination, causing it to place all its comfort in meditation on the wonders of heavenly love. "All things which I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you," saith our Lord to his disciples, John xv. 15. Bp. Horne.

[o] 14. Mine eyes are ever looking unto the Lord: &c.] Encouraged to hope for the blessings above mentioned, the lowly suppliant still continues to fix the eyes of his understanding on their proper object, God his Saviour, beholding his glory, attending to his will, and expecting his mercy. An unfortunate dove, whose feet are taken in the snare of the fowler, is a fine emblem of the soul, entangled in the cares or pleasures of the world; from which she desires, through the power of grace, to fly away, and to be at rest, with her glorified Redeemer. Bp. Horne.

[p] 20. Let perfectness and righteous dealing &c.] How many wishes do our hearts send forth after riches, honours, and pleasures! how few after "integrity and uprightness!" yet these can "preserve" us, and those cannot. Absolute integrity and uprightness are the prerogatives of the King of righteousness: and it is his grace which makes us such as his mercy will accept. On Him therefore let us "wait." Bp. Horne.

[q] 21. Deliver Israel, &c.] In the common salvation all have an interest: and for that reason, all should pray for it. The earthly David petitioned for Israel; the heavenly David ever continueth to intercede for the church; and every Christian ought to become a suppliant for his brethren, still looking and longing for that glorious day, when, by a joyful resurrection unto life eternal, God shall indeed "redeem Israel out of all his troubles." Bp. Horne.

PSALM xxvii.[a] Dominus illuminatio.

THE Lord is my light[b], and my salvation; whom then shall I fear : the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom then shall I be afraid?

whether we suppose it to be the typical, or the true David, the church, or any member thereof, lying under the false accusations of calumny, 1—3, appealeth to God in behalf of injured innocence; 4, 5, disclaimeth all connexion with wicked men; 6—8, declareth a fixed resolution to adhere to the worship of God in the church; 9, 10, prayeth to be delivered from the ungodly; 11, again protesteth integrity, and, 12, determineth to praise the Lord. Bp. Horne

This Psalm was composed by David as an appeal to God, to vindicate his integrity, and deliver him from his enemies. Dr. Hammond.

[s] 1. Be thou my judge, O Lord, &c.] We have here an appeal to God, in behalf of injured and calumniated innocence. This was the case of David, with regard to the accusations of Saul; of Christ, with regard to those of the Jews; and it is often the case of the church, and of good men in the world; for whose use this Psalm seems peculiarly calculated. Bp. Horne.

[t] 2. Examine me, O Lord, &c.] A trial of this sort might be desired by David, and may be desired by men like him, conscious of their integrity, as to the particular crimes charged upon them by the malice of their enemies. Christ alone could ask such a trial at large, as being equally free from every kind and degree of sin; and certain of receiving additional lustre from the increasing heat of the furnace. Bp. Horne.

[u] 4. I have not dwelt &c.] David, driven by Saul into a land of aliens, yet preserved himself from the contagion of idolatry. And happy the Christian who can say, that, during the time of his banishment and pilgrimage, he hath escaped the pollutions that are in the world, namely, vanity and hypocrisy, evil practices and wicked principles. Christ alone, like his emblem the light, passed through all things undefiled. Bp. Horne.

[x] 6. I will wash my hands in innocency, &c.] Instead of consorting with the heathen, David comforts himself with the future prospect of restoration to Jerusalem: of attending the service of God in the tabernacle; of performing the legal ablutions, in token of innocency thereby signified; and of singing, before the holy altar, psalms of praise for his deliverance. Bp. Horne.

To wash the hands was common among the Jews, Deut. xxi. 6, in any solemn business of protesting innocency, as a token of it: so did Pilate, Matt. xxvii. 24. But it particularly belonged as a ceremony preparatory to praying: for unless we come pure to that work, there is no hope to be heard. It was therefore a common usage among the Jews, always to wash before prayers. Dr. Hammond.

[y] 8. Lord, I have loved the habitation &c.] With what ardent affection the banished prophet sighs for the beauty of holiness in the church! the most amiable object on earth, because the nearest resemblance of heaven, where is the true "habitation of God's house, and the place of the tabernacle of his glory;" since of the heavenly Jerusalem St. John tells us, that the "Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple," Rev. xxi. 22. Bp. Horne.

[z] 12. — I will praise the Lord &c.] David, upon his return to his country, "blessed the Lord in the congregation" of Israel, by singing psalms of praise and thanksgiving; and by the constant use of those very psalms, the Lord is daily "blessed" in all Christian "congregations" throughout the world; yea, and He shall be so blessed to the end of time. Bp. Horne.

[a] PSALM xxvii.] This Psalm containeth, 1—3, a declaration of trust and confidence in Jehovah, amidst the dangers and tumults of war; 4, a longing desire of restoration to the city and house of God; 5, 6, a triumphant assurance of final victory and exultation; 7—14, earnest prayer for support and protection; 15, a profession of faith, and its mighty power and comfort in affliction; 16, an exhortation to patience. Bp. Horne.

This Psalm was composed by David in time of his distress: wherein, placing all his trust and confidence in God, he especially expresseth his desire of returning to the participation of God's publick service. Dr. Hammond.

[b] 1. The Lord is my light, &c.] God is our "light," as He sheweth us the state we are in, and the enemies we have to encounter; He is our "strength," as He enableth us, by his grace, to cope with, and overcome them; and He is our "salvation," as the author and finisher of our deliverance from sin, death, and Satan. All this He was to the blessed Person whom David represented; and all this He will be to his faithful ser-

4 One thing have I desired[d] of the Lord, which I will require : even that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the fair beauty of the Lord, and to visit his temple.

5 For in the time of trouble[e] he shall hide me in his tabernacle : yea, in the secret place of his dwelling shall he hide me, and set me up upon a rock of stone.

6 And now shall he lift up mine head : above mine enemies round about me.

7 Therefore will I offer in his dwelling an oblation with great gladness : I will sing, and speak praises unto the Lord.

8 Hearken unto my voice, O Lord[f], when I cry unto thee : have mercy upon me, and hear me.

9 My heart hath talked of thee[g], Seek ye my face : Thy face, O Lord, will I seek.

10 O hide not thou thy face from me : nor cast thy servant away in displeasure.

11 Thou hast been my succour : leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation.

12 When my father[h] and my mother forsake me : the Lord taketh me up.

13 Teach me thy way, O Lord : and lead me in the right way, because of mine enemies.

14 Deliver me not over[i] into the will of mine adversaries : for there are false witnesses risen up against me, and such as speak wrong.

15 I should utterly have fainted[k] : but that I believed verily to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

[c] 2. — they stumbled and fell.] The past time is often used, in the prophetical language, to intimate the certainty of the future. Faith sees the foe already vanquished, and the prey snatched from the jaws of the devouring lion. Bp. Horne.

[d] 4. One thing have I desired &c.] The victories of David ended in his restoration to Jerusalem, and the service of God: the victories of Christ terminated in his triumphant return to a better Jerusalem; and this ought to be the "one thing desired" by the Christian, that, after his conquest over the body of sin, he may pass the unnumbered days of eternity in the courts of heaven, contemplating the beauty and glory of his Redeemer. Bp. Horne.

[e] 5. For in the time of trouble &c.] He alludes to the ancient custom of offenders, who used to flee to the tabernacle or altar, where they esteemed themselves safe, 1 Kings ii. 28. Poole.

[f] 8. Hearken unto my voice, O Lord, &c.] From the assurances of faith it is always good to descend to the humiliation of prayer to God, who alone can grant unto us that one thing which we desire, and long after, while in the land of our captivity, and house of our pilgrimage. Bp. Horne.

[g] 9. My heart hath talked of thee, &c.] When my heart in meditation was talking to thee, thou didst command me to "seek thy face" in devout prayer; and, in obedience to thy commands, I "do seek it" in that manner. Dr. Nicholls.

[h] 12. When my father &c.] A time will come, when the dearest earthly friends and relations can no longer be of any assistance to us. The case of the church and of the soul is oftentimes compared to that of a poor, helpless, exposed orphan. Where worldly comforts end, heavenly ones begin. See Isa. xlix. 15; Matt. xxiii. 37. Bp. Horne.

[i] 14. Deliver me not over &c.] David had his enemies, and false accusers; Christ also had his: and every child of God hath need to petition for deliverance from the great enemy of his salvation, the grand accuser of the brethren, who is ever breathing out malice and cruelty against the body and members of Christ. Bp. Horne.

[k] 15. I should utterly have fainted: &c.] Faith in the comfortable promises of God is the only sovereign cordial for a "fainting" spirit. Earth is the land of the dying; we must extend our prospect into heaven, which is the land of the "living," where the faithful shall "see," and experience evermore "the goodness of the Lord." Bp. Horne.

[l] 16. O tarry thou the Lord's leisure: &c.] The person speaking concludes with an apostrophe to his own soul, resulting from the confidence in God, expressed ver. 1; from the desire and the hope of heaven, 4—13; and from the manifold pledges of the divine love already received in this life, 15: the proper inference from all which considerations is this; that we should patiently "wait on the Lord," till the few and evil days of our pilgrimage pass away, and we arrive at the mansions prepared for us, in the house of our heavenly Father; till our warfare be accomplished, and terminate in the peace of God; till the storms and tempests of wintry

[n] 2.—the mercy-seat of thy holy temple.] The "mercy-seat" and the "oracle," strictly taken, are the same. It was from the mercy-seat that God gave his answers, Exod. xxv. 21, 22; Numb. vii. 89. But sometimes the "oracle" signifies the whole place, where the ark with the mercy-seat stood, 1 Kings vi. 19. This place is here called "the temple" by our Translators, as Ps. v. 7, &c. Anon.

[o] 4. Reward them according to their deeds: &c.] In these verses, as indeed in most of the imprecatory passages, the imperative and the future are used promiscuously; "Give them—render them—he shall destroy them." If, therefore, the verbs, in all such passages, were uniformly rendered in the future, every objection against the Scripture imprecations would vanish at once, and they would appear clearly to be what they are, namely, prophecies of the divine judgments, which have been since executed against the Jews, and which will be executed against all the enemies of Jehovah and his Christ, whom neither the "works" of creation, nor those of redemption, can lead to repentance. Bp. Horne.

[p] 9. The Lord is my strength: &c.] He who saved and exalted the Head, will also save and exalt the members; or, as St. Paul expresseth it, "if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit, that dwelleth in you," Rom. viii. 11. *Bp. [r] PSALM xxix.] This Psalm seems to have been composed by David after some extraordinary storm of thunder, lightning, and rain, whereby it is probable God had discomfited his enemies, and enabled him to gain an easy victory over them. Whereupon he exhorts them in this Psalm to submit to that glorious Majesty, from whom the thunder came; and who can so easily strike a sudden terror into the hearts of his stoutest and most resolved opposers. Bp. Patrick.

[u] 6. He maketh them also to skip &c.] Thunder not only demolisheth the cedars, but shaketh the mountains on which they grow. Bp. Horne. Lebanon was famous for its strong and lofty cedars: see 2 Chron. ii. 8; Cant. iii. 9; v. 15. Sirion also was an high mountain beyond Jordan, joining to Lebanon: of which, see Deut. iii. 9; iv. 48. Poole.

and sent abroad from the clouds upon the earth, in the terrible form of lightning, that sharp and glittering sword of the Almighty, which no substance can withstand. "The wilderness of Kadesh" was part of that wilderness, through which the Israelites passed in their way to Canaan. See Numb. xiii. 26. Thunder shaketh those wide extended deserts, as well as Lebanon and Sirion, mountains of Judea. Bp. Horne.

[y] 8. The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds &c.] It is observed of this beast, that they bring forth with much difficulty in general: but with ease when affrighted by the noise of thunder. Dr. Hammond. The meaning of the verse is, The cattle suddenly bring forth their young in their terror at the violence of the storm, which strips the trees of their leaves, and opens the recesses of the forest: while God's temple remains unshaken by the tempest, and his pious worshippers securely sing his praises in it. Travell.

[z] 9. The Lord sitteth above the water-flood: &c.] The Lord is the great King, who governs even the clouds, and orders the thunder-storms to do what execution He pleases. When all other monarchs fail, the Lord still remains the same throughout all generations. Bp. Patrick.

[a] 10. The Lord shall give strength unto his people: &c.] From Jehovah, whose power and majesty have been with so much sublimity displayed in this whole Psalm, we are to expect, through faith and prayer, "strength" to overcome our enemies, whether ghostly or bodily; and also the blessing of "peace," which must be the fruit of victory. Thou, O Christ, art the "Mighty God;" and therefore, thou art the "Prince of peace," Isa. ix. 6. Bp. Horne.

[b] PSALM XXX.] In this Psalm, or devout hymn, composed probably by David, on his revisiting the sanctuary, after a joyful recovery from some dangerous sickness, he, 1—3, returneth thanks for that event; and, 4, calleth the church to do so likewise, 5, drawing a comparison between temporary sufferings and eternal rewards. 6, 7, He describeth his former prosperity succeeded by affliction, with 8—11, the supplication poured forth to the Almighty, in the day of his distress; and then returneth again, 12, to celebrate his deliverance, and, 13, to glorify God for the same. The Psalm is finely adapted to the case of the true David, and of Christians, his disciples and followers. Bp. Horne.

[c] 1. I will magnify thee, O Lord, &c.] These words, if originally composed and uttered by king David, on occasion of some temporal mercy, apply, in a far more emphatical and beautiful manner, to the case of Messiah, suffering and rising again, as well as to that of his church and people, following Him, both in his sufferings and resurrection; when we shall all lift up our voices, and sing together, "I will magnify thee, O Lord, for thou hast lifted me up! and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me!" Bp. Horne.

[d] 3. Thou, Lord, hast brought my soul &c.] The resurrection of David was a figurative one; that of Christ was a real one, as that of his saints will be; so that the Psalm is more strictly applicable to the true, than it ever could have been to the typical, David. The latter clause may be rendered, "Thou hast quickened me from among them that go down to the pit." Bp. Horne.

[e] 5. For his wrath endureth &c.] This is a most beautiful and affecting image of the sufferings and exaltation of Christ; of the sorrows and joys of a penitent; of the miseries of time, and the glories of eternity; of the night of death, and the morning of the resurrection. Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. And in my prosperity I said, &c.] David, after his success against Goliath, and Christ, upon his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, were hailed by the acclamations and hosannas of the people, as the Christian may sometimes meet with in the applauses of the world, and be led to think himself established in prosperity. But other troubles awaited David; and the blessed Jesus was nailed to the cross. Let not the disciple expect to be above his master; nor, in the season of light and joy, neglect to prepare for the approaching days of sorrow and darkness. Bp. Horne.

mountain; partly because kingdoms are usually called mountains in prophetical language, as Ps. xlvi. 3; Isa. ii. 2; Jer. li. 25; Dan. ii. 34, 35; 44, 45: and partly with respect to mount Sion, where David built his royal palace. Poole.

[h] 8. Then cried I unto thee, O Lord: &c.] These are some of "the strong cryings and supplications," which the true David poured forth, while under the cloud of his passion; and which are to be poured forth by us, when conformed to his image, in suffering affliction. The argument here used is a very powerful one, namely, the necessity of a resurrection from the grave, that man may be saved, and God glorified. The dead cannot praise, or serve God. They must live again for this purpose; and for this purpose it is, that we should desire to live, whether it be in the present world, or that which is to come. Bp. Horne.

[i] 12. Thou hast turned my heaviness &c.] This might be true of David, delivered from his calamity; it was true of Christ, arising from the tomb, to die no more; it is true of the penitent, exchanging his sackcloth for the garments of salvation; and it will be verified in us all, at the last day, when we shall put off the dishonours of the grave, to shine in glory everlasting. Bp. Horne.

[k] 13. Therefore shall every good man &c.] The end of Christ's resurrection, of the salvation of the souls of the faithful, and the resurrection of their bodies, is one and the same, namely, the glory of God, who is the author of every kind of deliverance; whose praise should, therefore, be resounded by the grateful tongues of the redeemed, from generation to generation; as the tongue then becometh the "glory" of man, when it is employed in setting forth the glory of God. Bp. Horne.

[l] Psalm xxxi.] In this Psalm, ver. 6th of which was pronounced by our Lord, when expiring on the cross, we hear the true David, like his representative of old, 1—7, supplicating for deliverance; 8, 9, rejoicing in the divine favour and assistance; 10—15, describing his afflicted and forlorn state; 16—20, returning again to his prayers; 21—25, celebrating the mercies of God to the children of Adam; and, 26, 27, exhorting his saints to courage and perseverance, under their troubles in the world. Bp. Horne.

[m] 1. In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust: &c.] God is faithful and just, to save those, who, in time of trouble renouncing all dependence on themselves and the creature, "put their trust" only in his mercy. His honour is engaged by his promise, not to let such be "ashamed" of their confidence. Bp. Horne.

[n] 5. Draw me out of the net, &c.] As David prayed for an escape from the secret conspiracies that were entered into against him, so did Christ pray for deliverance from the snares of death; and so doth the Christian pray to be extricated from the toils both of sin and death. Bp. Horne.

[o] 6. Into thy hands &c.] David, in his distresses, might, by these words, express his resignation of himself and his affairs into the hands of God; but it is certain, that Christ actually did expire upon the cross, with the former part of this verse in his mouth, Luke xxiii. 46. Nor is there any impropriety in the application of the latter part to Him; since, as man, the surety and representative of our nature, He was "redeemed" from the power of the enemy, by "the God of truth" accomplishing his promises. Bp. Horne.

Our Saviour used these words, "Into thy hands I commend my spirit," in a more proper and literal sense than they can be applied to David. Bp. Patrick.

[p] 8, 9. I will be glad, &c.] The considerations that make the soul "cheerful" in the hour of affliction, are, that God is merciful; that, as He is not ignorant, so neither is He unmindful of our troubles; that He is a friend, who "knows us in our adversity, no less than in prosperity; that He hath not subjected us to the necessity of being overcome by our spiritual enemies;

2 Blessed is the man unto whom but hath, "with the temptation, made a way for us to escape." Bp. Horne.

[q] 12. My strength faileth me, &c.] Do we not, in these words, hear the voice of the "man of sorrows," suffering not indeed for his own "iniquity," but for ours, of which He frequently, in the Psalms, speaks as if it were his own? If sin was punished in the innocent Lamb of God, let us not expect that it should be unpunished in us, unless we repent: and let our punishment never fail to remind us of our guilt. Bp. Horne.

[r] 13. I became a reproof &c.] These particulars were never more applicable to David, than they were to the Son of David, when his acquaintance, at beholding Him reviled by his enemies, were terrified from attending Him, and when "all the disciples forsook him, and fled." Bp. Horne.

[s] 14. I am clean forgotten, &c.] This was literally the case of Christ, when laid in the sepulchre, and esteemed no longer the object of hope by his friends, or of fear by his enemies. That He should be so "forgotten" while dead is less wonderful, than that this should have happened since his glorious resurrection and ascension into heaven. Bp. Horne.

[t] 15. For I have heard the blasphemy &c.] The slander of Shimei, and the counsel of Ahithophel against king David, direct us to the slanders of the Jews, and the counsels of Judas and the Sanhedrim against the beloved Son of God, who, in his church, will be persecuted in like manner by the ungodly to the world's end. Bp. Horne.

[u] 16. But my hope &c.] In all our afflictions, after the example of the typical and of the true David, we are to have recourse to the prayer of faith; we are to consider that Jehovah is our God and Saviour; that the times and the seasons of prosperity and adversity, of life and death, are in his hand; and therefore on Him we are to wait, till the day of mercy shall dawn, and the shadows fly away. Bp. Horne.

[x] 19. — let the ungodly be put to confusion, &c.] Ahithophel, for his treason against David, and Judas, for his treachery against Christ, felt the force of this prophetical imprecation, or prediction, which will also, one day, take its full effect, in the confusion of all impenitent calumniators and traitors. Bp. Horne.

[y] 22. Thou shalt hide them privily &c.] The sense is, Thy gracious providence secretly preserves them from their furious persecutors: thou dost keep them as safe, as if they were in thy dwelling-place, from the false accusations of the wicked. Travell.

[z] 23. Thanks be to the Lord: &c.] The man Christ, and the church with Him, like David of old, here rejoice in the protection and saving power of God, in the same manner as in Isa. xxvi. 1, "We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks." Bp. Horne.

[a] 26. O love the Lord, &c.] The exhortation is raised from the consideration of the deliverance of Christ, with the destruction of his enemies; which ought to strengthen and comfort the hearts of believers, under all their afflictions here below; that so, after having suffered courageously with their Master, they may triumphantly enter into his joy and glory. Bp. Horne.

[b] Psalm xxxii.] In this Psalm, which is the second of those styled penitential, David, as a model of true repentance, 1, 2, extolleth the blessedness of those whose sins are forgiven them; 3, 4, describeth the torment endured by him, before he confessed his sin; and, 5, 6, the goodness of God in pardoning it when confessed; 7, he foretelleth that others, after his example, should obtain the like mercy; 8, declareth his hope and confidence in his God; who, 9, is introduced, promising wisdom and grace to the penitent; 10, 11, sinners are warned against obstinacy; and, 12, the righteous exhorted to rejoice in God their Saviour. Bp. Horne.

This is a penitential Psalm, and therefore appointed for Ash-Wednesday. Travell.

[c] 1, 2. Blessed is he &c.] As if he had said, All the felicity, that can be attained to, in this life or in another, depends wholly not on the merit of any man's performances, but only on God's free and favourable acceptance, his gracious pardon to our many frailties and fouler sins, purchased for us by the merit of the sufferings of the Messiah, given to the world in God's free promise to Adam, immediately after the fall. Happy therefore, O thrice happy is he, who is thus accepted by God; whose state is such as that God approveth him in Christ; who, though he have sinned, yet upon his sincerity of humiliation, confessing and forsaking all known sin, and his impartial obedience to the whole will of God, the condition, without which God's reconciliation cannot be regained, is by God received again into favour and justified. See Rom. iv. 7, 8. Dr. Hammond.

[d] 3. For while I held my tongue: &c.] That is, with respect to confession. Before I made confession I was in constant agony of mind; now, by confessing my sins, I have obtained ease. Bp. Horsley. In opposition to the blessedness above-mentioned, the penitent now proceeds to declare his own wretched state, occasioned by his "keeping silence," or not confessing his sin, which therefore rankled and festered inwardly, occasioning torment inexpressible. The disorders of the mind, as well as those of the body, should be communicated to persons skilful in assuaging and removing them. Many might thereby be saved from the horrible crime of self-murder, which is generally committed in agonies of solitary remorse and despair. Bp. Horne.

[e] 4. For thy hand is heavy upon me &c.] Outward calamities, and inward pangs of conscience, are the strokes of God's hand, designed to humble the sinner, and lead him to confession; and in the infliction of these, such severity is sometimes necessary, that the patient is brought to death's door, before a turn can be given to the disease; but the pain of a blow upon an ulcerated part, however exquisite, is well compensated for, if, by promoting a discharge, it effect a cure. Bp. Horne.

[f] — my moisture is like the drought in summer.] My vital moisture was in a manner dried up, like a pasture burnt up by the summer sun. Dr. Nicholls.

[g] 5, 6. I will acknowledge my sin &c.] What is this, but the Gospel itself? "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins," 1 John i. 9. And thus it happened, in one case, to David, who had no sooner confessed his sin to the prophet Nathan, but an answer of peace was instantly vouchsafed: "The Lord hath put away thy sin," 2 Sam. xii. 13. Were angels to descend from heaven, to comfort the dejected spirit of a sinner, they could say nothing more effectual for the purpose, than what is said in this verse of our Psalm. But practice will be the best comment upon it. Bp. Horne.

[h] 7. For this shall every one that is godly &c.] Encouraged, by this example and declaration of David, to hope for mercy, on confession of sin, it is here foretold, that humble penitents shall be led to make their prayer unto God in the acceptable time, and in the day of salvation, while He "may be found:" that so they may be forgiven, and preserved from great and overwhelming calamities; from the fears of death, and the terrors of judgment. Bp. Horne.

Or the sense may be, that every man, who has a just sense of God and religion, ought to fly to God by repentance, whilst his guilt is fresh, and God's grace is free and open to relieve him: but he must take care not to stay till he be deluged by a flood of iniquity, which will keep him at a great distance from God, and make his acceptance very difficult, or perhaps impossible. Dr. Nicholls.

[i] 9. I will inform thee, &c.] The Redeemer is here introduced, returning an answer to the penitent's declarations of his humility and faith; promising "instruction" in that wisdom which every man wants who continues in sin, together with the direction of the Spirit in the way of righteousness, and the superintendence of his watchful care. Man cannot prevent evils, because he cannot foresee them. "Next therefore to the protecting power of God's wing is the securing prospect of his eye," saith Dr. South. Bp. Horne.

[j] 10. Be ye not like to horse &c.] The person speaking in the former verse, or the prophet himself, exhorts mule, which have no understanding: whose mouths must be held with bit and bridle, lest they fall upon thee.

sinners to repent, at the invitation and encouragement afforded them; and not to continue, like brutes, fierce, obstinate, and senseless, until, like them, they must be tamed and managed by force, and the severity of discipline. Bp. Horne.

[k] 11. Great plagues remain for the ungodly: &c.] Those, who are not to be reformed by gentler methods, must learn righteousness under the rod of affliction, in the school of the cross: and happy are they, if their "sorrows" may so turn to their advantage. But happier are those who, led by the goodness of God to repentance and faith, enjoy the light and protection of "mercy." Bp. Horne.

[l] 12. Be glad, O ye righteous, &c.] In the beginning of the Psalm, the penitent, smitten with a sense of his wretchedness on account of his sins, extolleth the blessedness of the righteous! he now again doth the same, through a joyful sense of his pardon, and restoration to that happy state. Let us "rejoice," O Lord Jesu; but let us rejoice "in thee," and in thy salvation; so shall we rejoice indeed! Bp. Horne.

[m] PSALM xxxiii.] In this Psalm the prophet, 1—3, exhorteth the faithful to a spiritual and holy joy in their God, whom they are to praise, 4, 5, for his truth, righteousness, and mercy; 6—9, for his power displayed in the works of creation; 10—18, for the wisdom of his providence, and the care He hath of his people. 19, 20, The righteous, in answer to the exhortation, declare their joy and confidence in God their Saviour; and, 21, prefer a petition for his manifestation. Bp. Horne.

It is not recorded by whom this Psalm was composed, nor upon what occasion. But there is little question it was a pious meditation of David; and probably upon occasion of some special benefit received from God. Bp. Patrick.

[n] 1. Rejoice in the Lord, &c.] God, and not the world, is the fountain of "joy;" which sinners talk of, but the righteous only possess. "Rejoice in the Lord alway, and again I say, Rejoice," Philip. iv. 4. Bp. Horne.

[o] 2. Praise the Lord with harp: &c.] He mentions these instruments, because they were used in the publick worship and praises of God, in the tabernacle. Poole. Musick, both vocal and instrumental, is of eminent use in setting forth the praises of God. Bp. Horne.

[p] 4. For the word of the Lord is true: &c.] God is to be praised for his word and his works; for his rectitude in the one, and his truth in the other; for his faithfulness in accomplishing by the latter, what his goodness had promised in the former. Bp. Horne.

[q] 6. By the word of the Lord &c.] It is true, that the world was created by the "word," or fiat of God, which may be here described, after the manner of men, as formed by "the breath of his mouth." It is also true, that by the instrumentality of the eternal Word, and the eternal Spirit, the old heavens and earth were made: as also the new heavens and earth which shall succeed them. Glory is due from man to God, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit. Bp. Horne.

[r] 7. He gathereth the waters &c.] The next instance of divine power and goodness, for which we are here excited to be thankful, is that of laying up the waters, which originally covered the face of the earth, in the great depth beneath. Bp. Horne.

Or in hollow places; where, though they swell much higher than the shore, yet they do not overrun it, but are gathered into a round gibbous form, and so remain constant within their channel. Dr. Hammond.

[s] — and layeth up the deep, as in a treasure-house.] Either in clouds or in the bowels of the earth; whence He can draw them forth, when He sees fit. Poole.

[t] 10. The Lord bringeth the counsel &c.] The wisdom of God's providence is not less worthy of adoration than the power of his might. By this wisdom the "counsels" of states and empires are either directed to the accomplishment of the great counsel of heaven; or, if they attempt to thwart it, are blasted and "brought to nothing." History will force all, who read it with this view, to acknowledge thus much. And with this view, indeed, it should always be read. Bp. Horne.

[u] 12. Blessed are the people, &c.] The foregoing considerations of the righteousness, truth, mercy, power, and wisdom, of Jehovah, naturally suggest a reflection on the "blessedness" of the church, in whose cause all those attributes are, by the covenant of grace, engaged and exercised. But who now esteems this blessedness as it deserves? Bp. Horne.

[x] 13, 14. The Lord looked down from heaven, &c.] All the men that are in the earth, the inhabitants of the whole world, are within the compass of his most particular providence: though He reside in heaven in a peculiar manner, yet He from thence exactly surveys and beholds all and every their actions, and even most secret thoughts. As He is severally and equally the Creator of them all, and Former of their souls as well as of their bodies, so He is certainly able to discern particularly all the operations of their very hearts; and is no idle spectator, but weigheth and judgeth all, and accordingly rewards every man. Dr. Hammond.

[y] 15. There is no king that can be saved &c.] All the power in the world is less than nothing, if brought into the field against that of God; so that the fate of every battle will depend upon the side which He shall please to take, who is equally able to confound the many and the mighty, and to give victory to the weak and the few. The same is true of that spiritual warfare in which we are all engaged. Bp. Horne.

[z] 17. Behold, the eye of the Lord &c.] The ever-waking eye of Providence, which looketh on all, looketh with favour and loving-kindness on such as "fear" God without despondency, and "hope" in Him without presumption; their bodies are often wonderfully preserved in times of danger and want; but, what is of far greater consequence, their souls are saved from spiritual and everlasting death, and nourished, in the wilderness, with the bread of heaven. Bp. Horne.

[a] 19. Our soul hath patiently tarried &c.] In answer to the foregoing exhortation, the "righteous" are here introduced, declaring their fixed resolution to persevere in faith and patience, "waiting" for the coming of their Lord and Saviour, in whom they "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," by reason of that humble and holy confidence which they have in Him. Bp. Horne.

[b] 21. Let thy merciful kindness, &c.] The hope of the church was always in Messiah. Of old she prayed for the "mercy" of his first advent; now she expecteth his second. Grant us, O Lord, hope, of which we may never be disappointed. Bp. Horne.

[c] PSALM XXXIV.] This is a Psalm of thanksgiving, in which David magnifies the goodness of God for some signal deliverance. Travell. The prophet, escaped out of the hands of his enemies, uttereth a song of praise, in words which the Christian now employeth to celebrate the far greater deliverance of his Saviour, and himself by Him, from the power of more formidable adversaries. 1—7, He calleth his brethren to rejoice with him, and to magnify God for the favour and protection vouchsafed to his servant, in a time of danger; 8—10, he exhorted others to taste and experience the goodness of Jehovah to such as fear Him; and for that purpose, 11—14, instructeth them in the nature and effects of divine fear; after which, 15—22, he sweetly descanteth on the certainty of redemption from all the tribulations endured by the faithful in this mortal life. Bp. Horne.

[d] 5. They had an eye unto him, &c.] As if he had said, Such good men, who trust in God, and look up to Him for deliverance, enjoy their wished-for success, God by his goodness enlightening them, and making them of a cheerful countenance, and not suffering them to be ashamed through the disappointment of their hopes. Dr. Nicholls.

[e] 7. The angel of the Lord &c.] The divine protection and salvation, vouchsafed to the faithful, is here signified, whether we suppose that by the "angel of Jehovah," is meant the presence of Christ in the church militant, as of old in the camp of Israel; or the ministration of created spirits to the heirs of salvation, as in the case of Elisha, 2 Kings vi. 17. Let the consideration of these invisible guardians, who are also spectators of our actions, at once restrain us from evil, and incite us to good. Bp. Horne.

[f] 8. O taste, and see, &c.] David saw and tasted the goodness of Jehovah, when delivered from his adversaries: the Son of David when raised from the dead. Both invite us, by "trusting" in God, to behold and experience, in our own persons, the mercies and consolations of heaven. Bp. Horne.

[g] 9. O fear the Lord, &c.] He who seeketh the Lord shall find Him; and he who hath found Him can want nothing. Faith, hope, charity, temperance, purity, patience, and contentment, are the true riches; and the lack of them, the poverty to be most dreaded; since to a Christian, persecution, loss, sickness, nay, death itself, is gain. In the mean time, God is never wanting to provide for his servants what He seeth needful and best in matters temporal; while tyrants and oppressors, who are, in the world, what "lions" are in a forest, are often, by the just judgment of heaven, reduced to want that which they have ravished from others. Bp. Horne.

[h] 11. Come, ye children, &c.] They who by contemplating the advantages described above, which attend the fear of the Lord, are become desirous of obtaining that fear, must hearken to their heavenly Father, who by his prophet "speaketh unto them as unto children," offering to teach them the good and right way. Bp. Horne.

[i] 15. The eyes of the Lord &c.] The righteous may be afflicted, like David, and like a greater than David; and their oppressors may, for a time, be triumphant; but, in the end, the former will be delivered and exalted; the latter will either cease to be remembered, or they will be remembered with infamy. Bp. Horne.

[k] 19. Great are the troubles &c.] Afflictions all must suffer; but those of the righteous end in victory and glory. What soldier would not cheerfully undergo the hardships of a campaign upon this condition? "In the world," saith the Captain of our salvation, "ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," John xvi. 33. Bp. Horne.

[l] 20. He keepeth all his bones: &c.] He taketh charge of all that belongs to his children; so as no violence shall be prejudicial to them: not only their bones, but the very hairs of their head are numbered: in vain shall their enemies hope to fasten any evil upon them, which the wise providence of God hath not foreappointed for their good. Bp. Hall. This had a more eminent and literal completion in our blessed Saviour, whose legs were not broken, when were those of both the thieves that were crucified with Him. John xix. 36. Dr. Hammond. Though these words are here spoken of righteous men in general, of whom they are true in a metaphorical sense: yet they had a further meaning in them, being designed by the Spirit of God, which had dictated to David not only the matter, but the very words and expressions, to signify a great mystery, that none of Christ's bones should be broken: to which purpose they are alleged by St. John. Poole.

[m] 21. But misfortune shall slay the ungodly: &c.] Or, as in the Bible translation, "evil shall slay, &c." The evil of punishment springs from the evil of sin; and no sin works such "desolation," as a malicious "hatred" and persecution of the true sons and servants of God. Whoso doubts the truth of this, let him only survey and consider attentively the desolation of the once highly-favoured nation, for their enmity against the King of righteousness, and his faithful subjects. Bp. Horne.

[n] 22. The Lord delivereth &c.] The frequent prosperity of the wicked, and the troubles of the righteous in this world, strike powerfully upon the sense, and are, for that reason, too apt to efface from our minds the notices given us by faith, of that future inversion of circumstances which is to take place after death. To renew, therefore, the impression of such an interesting truth, the redemption of the afflicted righteous is so often insisted on in the course of this Psalm. Enable us, O Lord, to "walk by faith, and not by sight," until we come to thy heavenly kingdom; where, with all thy saints made perfect through sufferings, we shall "bless and magnify thee at all times," and thy "praise will continually be in our mouth," for evermore. Bp. Horne.

[o] PSALM xxxv.] This Psalm is a complaint of David against his enemies, joined with an appeal to God, and a prayer for his deliverance. Dr. Hammond. The prophet in this Psalm, as in the 22nd, which it resembles, personating Messiah, in his state of humiliation and suffering, 1—3, beseecheth Jehovah to interpose in his behalf; 4—8, predicteth the confusion of his enemies, and, 9, 10, his own triumph; 11—16, describeth the malice of his persecutors against him, and his love towards them; 17—25, repeateth his supplications for deliverance, and enlargeth upon the cruel insults he met with: 26, he again foretelleth the destruction of the adversary, and, 27, 28, the exultation of the faithful. Bp. Horne.

[p] 1. Plead thou my cause, &c.] David, in his afflictions; Christ, in his passion; the Church, under persecution; and the Christian, in the hour of temptation, supplicate the Almighty to appear in their behalf, and to vindicate their cause. Bp. Horne.

[q] 2. Lay hand upon the shield &c.] Jehovah is here described as a "man of war," going forth to the battle against the enemies of Messiah, and his church: the protection, afforded by his mercy, is figured by the shield of the warrior, covering his body from the darts of the enemy; and the vengeance of his uplifted arm is represented by the offensive weapons used among men, such as the spear and the sword. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" If He speaketh salvation, who shall threaten destruction? See Deut. xxxii. 41. Wisdom v. 30. Bp. Horne.

[r] 4. Let them be confounded, &c.] Or, "they shall be confounded, &c." The consequence of the Omnipotent appearing in arms against his adversaries is here foretold. And the prediction has long since been verified in the "confusion" of Saul, and of the Jews, as it will be finally fulfilled in that of Satan, and all his adherents, at the last day; for the manifestation of which day the church now waiteth in faith and patience. Bp. Horne.

[s] 7. For they have privily laid their net &c.] The causeless persecution raised against David by Saul, and against our Lord by the Jews, reverted, through the righteous judgment of God, on the heads of the persecutors. The innocent birds escaped; and they who set the toils, were themselves taken therein. Saul lost the kingdom which he thought to have secured, and his life also; and the Jews who crucified Christ, lest "the Romans should take away their place and nation," had their place and nation taken away by those Romans, for that very reason. In these histories, all impenitent persecutors of the faith, the church, and the servants of God, may read their doom. Bp. Horne.

[t] 11. False witnesses did rise up: &c.] This was never more literally true of David, than it was of the holy Jesus, when, standing before Pontius Pilate, He received no other return from the Jews, for all the gracious words which He had spoken, and all the merciful works which He had done among them, than that of being slandered, and put to death. Bp. Horne.

[u] 13. Nevertheless, when they were sick, &c.] If David prayed, fasting in sackcloth, for Saul, and his associates, the Son of David, to heal the souls of men, put on the veil of mortal flesh, and appeared in the form and habit of a penitent, fasting forty days and forty nights, making continual intercession for transgressors, and grieving to think that any men, by their obstinacy, should deprive themselves of the benefits thereof. Bp. Horne.

PSALM xxxvi.[f] Dixit injustus.

MY heart sheweth me[g] the wickedness of the ungodly : that

---

[x] 15. But in mine adversity they rejoiced, &c.] When the blessed Jesus was suffering for the sins of men, He was insulted by those men for whose sins He suffered. He gave, not only his reputation to the revilers, but also his back to the "smiters," though not conscious of the crimes for which they pretended to punish Him. Bp. Horne.

[y] 16. With the flatterers were busy mockers, &c.] However this might be true in the case of David, it certainly had a literal accomplishment in the scoffs and taunts of the chief priests, and others, when Christ was hanging on the cross, "Ah, thou that destroyest the temple," &c. "He trusted in God," &c. "Let him come down from the cross," &c. &c. &c. Nay, one of the thieves, crucified with Him, "cast the same in his teeth." Whosoever considers these things, will not be surprised at the expostulation in the following verse. Bp. Horne.

[z] 18. So will I give thee thanks &c.] This verse is exactly parallel to Psalm xxii. 25; wherein, after an enumeration of his sufferings, our Lord predicteth the praise and glory that should accrue to God in the church, after his resurrection, from the preaching of the apostles; which passage see, and compare; as also, Isa. xxv. 3; and Rev. vii. 9. Bp. Horne.

[a] 19. O let not them &c.] This verse in particular, in its application to the Messiah, is referred to in John xv. 25. Travell.

[b] 20. And why? their communing &c.] David would have lived "quietly" under the government of Saul; our Lord did not aim at temporal sovereignty over the Jews; nor did the primitive Christians desire to intermeddle with the politicks of the world : yet all were betrayed, mocked, and persecuted, as rebels and usurpers, and the pests of society. Bp. Horne.

[c] 22. This thou hast seen, O Lord : &c.] God seeth and knoweth all things; yet He permitteth those, who love Him best, to be often and long afflicted and oppressed, seeming as one at a "distance," or "silent," or "asleep," that is, regardless of what passes. At such times we are not to remit, but to double our diligence in prayer, reiterating our cries, "Lord, save us! we perish!" Then will He "awake and arise, and rebuke the winds and the seas, and there shall be a calm." Bp. Horne.

[d] 26. Let them be put to confusion &c.] The accomplishment of this prediction, by the resurrection of Jesus, and the destruction of Jerusalem, is well known. There are two events to come parallel to those two which are past, namely, the resurrection of the faithful, and the destruction of the world; when all, who, like the Jews, have "rejoiced in the hurt" of Messiah, and have "magnified themselves against him," will, like the Jews, be covered with everlasting "confusion." Bp. Horne.

[e] 27. Let them be glad &c.] As the preceding verse foretold the sorrow of the enemies, so these two describe the joy of the friends to Messiah upon his victory and exaltation, which have been, and shall continue to be, celebrated by the Church in these divine hymns, indited by the Holy Spirit for that purpose, until the songs of time shall end in the hallelujahs of eternity. Bp. Horne.

EVENING PRAYER.

PSALM xxxvii.[n] Noli æmulari.

FRET not thyself[o] because of the ungodly: neither be thou envious against the evil doers.

David, in reflection on himself, and his own sincerity and dependence upon God, during the time of his distress. Dr. Hammond. In the four first verses of this Psalm, the prophet describeth the principles, the actions, the conversation, and the imaginations of his wicked persecutors; and from thence raising his thoughts to heaven, 5—9, celebrateth the mercy and loving-kindness of Jehovah; for a continuation of which to himself and the church, he fervently prayeth, 10, 11; and 12, foreseeth the downfal of the ungodly. Bp. Horne.

[g] 1. My heart sheweth me &c.] The great truth, which the prophet here declareth himself to be convinced of, is, that all wickedness proceedeth from the absence of "the fear of God," in the person who committeth it; that fear being a principle, which, while it is predominant in the man, will restrain him from transgression. Our laws suppose as much, when, in the form of indicting a criminal, they attribute the commission of the offence to his "not having the fear of God before his eyes." Bp. Horne.

[h] 5. Thy mercy, O Lord, &c.] From the wickedness of the world, in which we live, we must lift up our eyes for help and comfort, to the mercy and truth of God, boundless, pure, and beneficial, as the heavens over our heads; to his righteousness, fixed and permanent as the everlasting hills; and to his judgments, stupendous and unfathomable as the waters of the great deep. Truth will engage mercy to accomplish the promised salvation of the elect; and righteousness will employ judgment in executing upon the reprobate the vengeance that is due. Bp. Horne.

[i] 7. Thou, Lord, shalt save &c.] The good providence of God extendeth over all creatures, nourishing and preserving them, as well as man, for whose use they were made. We can never enough value and extol the "loving-kindness" of Him, whose overshadowing "wings" protect and cherish us on earth, in order to bear us from thence to heaven. See Matt. xxiii. 37; Deut. xxxii. 11. Bp. Horne.

[k] 8. They shall be satisfied &c.] In heaven alone the thirst of an immortal soul after happiness can be satisfied. The river of God's pleasure flows from a "fountain" which feteheth not supplies from without, but whose spring is within itself, and therefore can never be exhausted. The "water of life" proceeds from "the throne of God and the Lamb," Rev. xxii. 1. "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent," John xvii. 3. God, like the sun, cannot be seen, but by the light which He Himself emits. Bp. Horne.

[l] 10. O continue forth thy loving-kindness &c.] The prophet, groaning under the oppression of the wicked, who are described in the first part of the Psalm, prayeth for a continuation of the mercies of God, which he has celebrated in the second part. Give us, O God, the knowledge of thee, and make us upright in heart, that thy loving-kindness and thy righteousness may be our portion for ever. Bp. Horne.

[m] 12. There are they fallen, &c.] Faith calleth things that be not, as though they were; it carries us forward to the end of time; it shews us the Lord, sitting on his throne of judgment: the righteous caught up to meet Him in the air, the world in flames under his feet, and the empire of sin fallen to rise no more. Bp. Horne.

[n] Psalm xxxvii.] From the beginning to the end of this Psalm, the Holy Spirit, by the prophet, administereth advice and consolation to the church and people of the Lord, oppressed and afflicted in the world by prosperous and triumphant wickedness. Faith and patience are, therefore, recommended, upon the double consideration of that sure reward which awaiteth the righteous, and that certain punishment which shall be inflicted on the wicked. These two events are set before us in a variety of expressions, and under many lively and affecting images. As the Psalm is rather a collection of divine aphorisms on the same subject, than a continued and connected discourse, it admitteth of nothing farther in the way of argument. Bp. Horne.

It is not easy to determine when this Psalm of David was composed. The design of it is to persuade men

2 For they shall soon be cut down like the grass : and be withered even as the green herb.

3 Put thou thy trust in the Lord, and be doing good : dwell in the land[p], and verily thou shalt be fed.

5 Commit thy way unto the Lord[r], and put thy trust in him : and he shall bring it to pass.

6 He shall make thy righteousness as clear as the light : and thy just dealing as the noon-day.

to a submission to God's dispensations of what kind soever; and not to think hard of his providence for letting good men lie under pressures or hardships, whilst bad ones enjoy prosperity. Dr. Nicholls.

[o] 1. Fret not thyself &c.] The Holy Spirit here prescribeth a remedy to a very common, and no less dangerous disorder of the mind, namely, a distrust of God's providence, occasioned by frequently beholding the prosperity of the wicked, in this present world. He who alloweth himself time to consider, how soon the fairest spring must give place to a burning summer, a blighting autumn, and a killing winter, will no longer envy, but pity, the fading verdure of the grass, and the still more transient glories of the flowers of the field. Bp. Horne.

[p] 3. — dwell in the land, &c.] This is the correct rendering of the Hebrew, as if it were a command to abide in Canaan when troubles come, and not to flee away for succour. But it is rather a promise by comparing this with ver. 27. 30 : such promises being often expressed by imperative verbs put for future. Poole.

[q] 4. Delight thou in the Lord: &c.] He who delighteth in the creature, hath not always "the desires of his heart" granted, nor is it fit that he should have them ; but he who delighteth in God will desire what he delighteth in, and obtain what he desireth. Bp. Horne.

[r] 5. Commit thy way unto the Lord, &c.] Malice and calumny may, for a time, overshadow the splendour of an holy character; but the sun will come forth, and the clouds will fly away. This was most eminently true of the blessed Jesus, at his resurrection, and will be verified in his saints, at the last day. The history of Susannah affordeth a remarkable instance of it in this life. "Her heart trusted in the Lord, and he brought forth her righteousness as the light ; insomuch that all the assembly cried out with a loud voice, and praised God, who saveth them that trust in him," ver. 35. 60. Bp. Horne.

[s] 7, 8. Hold thee still in the Lord, &c.] Do not murmur nor repine at his dealings, but silently and quietly submit to his will, and adore his judgments, and, as it follows, "wait patiently for him," namely, for his help. This advice and command is pressed again and again, to teach us how hard it is to learn and practise this lesson. Poole.

[t] 10. Yet a little while, &c.] The whole duration of the world itself is but "a little while" in the sight of Him, whose hope is full of immortality. But the calamities and deaths of princes ; the tragical fate of empires, swept with the besom of destruction ; the overthrow of cities, whose dimensions, towers, and palaces, once astonished the earth, but whose "place" is now no where to be found by the most curious and diligent inquirer; and the desolations of the chosen city, Jerusalem ; all these are even now sufficient to draw forth the tear of commiseration, and to extinguish the kindling spark of envy in every considerate mind. Bp. Horne.

[u] 11. But the meek-spirited &c.] "The meek" are they who bear their own adversities, and the prosperity of their enemies, without envy, anger, or complaint. For these there is a possession in the kingdom and city of "the Prince of peace," which "the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give them at that day." "Blessed are the meek," saith the Lord and Judge Himself, "for they shall inherit the earth," Matt. v. 5. "In the mean time, they, and they only, possess the present earth, as they go towards the kingdom of heaven, by being humble, and cheerful, and content, with what their good God has allotted them. They have no turbulent, repining, vexatious thoughts that they deserve better; nor are vexed when they see others possessed of more honour, or more riches, than their wise God has allotted for their share. But they possess what they have with a meek and contented quietness; such a quietness as makes their very dreams pleasing, both to God and themselves." Walton's Complete Angler, p. 295. Bp. Horne.

[x] 12. The ungodly seeketh counsel &c.] The original enmity between the wicked one and the just one will always subsist between the wicked and the just. The rage of the former against the latter is compared to that of mad dogs, or wild beasts; but a day is coming when all that rage must be turned and employed against themselves. God, who knoweth this, contemneth their own heart: and their bow shall be broken.

20 As for the ungodly, they shall perish[a]; and the enemies of the Lord shall consume as the fat of lambs: yea, even as the smoke, shall they consume away.

21 The ungodly borroweth, and payeth not again[b]: but the righteous is merciful and liberal.

29 The unrighteous shall be punished: as for the seed of the ungodly, it shall be rooted out.

their vain efforts; and Christians who know it, and are under the protection of God, should do the same. Bp. Horne.

[y] 16. A small thing that the righteous hath: &c.] Because he hath it with many great and glorious advantages; with God's favour and blessings; with great serenity and satisfaction of his own mind, which is infinitely more desirable and comfortable than all earthly possessions; with the consolations of God's Spirit; and the assurance of everlasting felicity: whilst the riches of wicked men are loaded with many incumbrances, with the wrath and curse of God, the torment of their own consciences and passions, and the dreadful expectation of an after reckoning and of endless miseries. Poole.

[z] 19. They shall not be confounded &c.] The favour of God is, to them that obtain it, a better and an enduring substance, which, like the widow's barrel and cruse, wasted not in the evil days of famine, nor will fail in that evil day of eternal want, when the foolish virgins shall be calling in vain for oil, and the rich glutton as vainly imploring a drop of water to cool his tongue. Bp. Horne.

[a] 20. As for the ungodly, they shall perish; &c.] The destruction of the wicked is here again set before us, but under a different image, namely, that of a sacrifice. Senseless, as cattle, they are fatted for the altar, they wanton in their prosperity, and nourish their hearts against the day of slaughter. In the mean time, the Almighty is whetting that sword, which nothing can withstand; and those fires are kindling, which shall never be extinguished. See Isa. xxxiv. 6—10. Bp. Horne.

[b] 21. The ungodly borroweth, and payeth not again: &c.] Either through covetousness and injustice; or rather, because of that great penury into which God shall bring him, whilst the righteous is not only provided sufficiently for himself, but hath abundance and to spare for others. For he is here comparing the wicked and the righteous, not so much in their virtues or moral qualities, as in their outward conditions. Poole.

[c] 22. Such as are blessed &c.] They, who are like their merciful and gracious Lord, and who, by their devotion and charity, bless Him, are blessed of Him; they who are like their cruel and iniquitous master, and who, by their ungodliness, injustice, and hardheartedness, dishonour their Maker and Redeemer, are cursed of Him. To the former, therefore, it will be said, at the last day, "Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom;" to the latter, "Go, ye cursed, into the fire." Bp. Horne.

[d] 23. The Lord ordereth a good man's going: &c.] As long as men's actions are conformable to the will of God, and the directions which He gives for the guiding of them; as the actions of the just and charitable are in an high degree; so long are they most acceptable and well-pleasing to Him, and so sure to be accepted by Him. Dr. Hammond. This was emphatically true of the man Christ, whose steps Jehovah established, and in whose way He delighted; who, "though he fell" by death, yet was raised again by his mighty hand and outstretched arm. It is true likewise of Christians, whom it should support and comfort, in all dangers and temptations. See, for a parallel, Ps. xci. Bp. Horne.

[e] 25. I have been young, &c.] The Psalmist says that he never could see or hear of any example of a just and pious and virtuous man, that was eminently charitable and merciful minded, who ever brought himself or his posterity to want by those means. Dr. Hammond. So far is charity from impoverishing, that what is given away, like vapours emitted by the earth, returns in showers of blessings into the bosom of the person who gave it; and his offspring is not the worse, but infinitely the better for it. "The liberal soul shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered also himself," Prov. xi. 25. The bread which endureth, as well as that which perisheth, is his; and the blessings of time are crowned with those of eternity. Bp. Horne.

30 The righteous shall inherit the land : and dwell therein for ever.

31 The mouth of the righteous is exercised in wisdom : and his tongue will be talking of judgement.

speaketh wisdom. Bib. Trans. of the word and ways of God. Poole.

33 The ungodly seeth the righteous : and seeketh occasion to slay him.

34 The Lord will not leave him in his hand : nor condemn him when he is judged.

35 Hope thou in the Lord[f], and keep his way, and he shall promote thee, that thou shalt possess the land : when the ungodly shall perish, thou shalt see it.

36 I myself have seen[g] the ungodly in great power : and flourishing like a green bay-tree.

no tracks of him remained. Dr. Nicholls.

37 I went by, and lo, he was gone : I sought him, but his place could no where be found.

38 Keep innocency, and take heed unto the thing that is right : for that shall bring a man peace at the last.

39 As for the transgressors, they shall perish together : and the end of the ungodly is, they shall be rooted out at the last.

40 But the salvation of the righteous[h] cometh of the Lord : who is also their strength in the time of trouble.

41 And the Lord shall stand by them, and save them : he shall deliver them from the ungodly, and shall save them, because they put their trust in him.

MORNING PRAYER.

PSALM xxxviii.[i] Domine, ne in furore.

Ash-Wednesday, third Psalm Morn. Serv.

PUT me not to rebuke[k], O Lord, in thine anger : neither chasten me in thy heavy displeasure.

2 For thine arrows[l] stick fast in me : and thy hand presseth me sore.

3 There is no health in my flesh[m], because of thy displeasure : neither is there any rest in my bones, by reason of my sin.

4 For my wickednesses are gone over[n] my head : and are like a sore burden, too heavy for me to bear.

[f] 35. Hope thou in the Lord, &c.] The apostle, writing to the Hebrew converts under affliction and persecution, thus expresseth the sentiment contained in this verse, "Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry," Heb. x. 35. Bp. Horne.

[g] 36. I myself have seen &c.] The great Babylonian monarch had his own exaltation, and subsequent degradation, portrayed to him, in a vision, under this very image, which conveyeth to the mind a most striking and affecting idea of the rise and fall of men and empires, which have now no existence but in history. See Dan. iv. 10, 11, &c. 20, 21, &c. Bp. Horne.

[h] 40. But the salvation of the righteous &c.] Of thee, O Lord Jesu, is our salvation : be thou our strength in this mortal life, which is a time of trouble ; help us against our spiritual enemies, and deliver us from them ; deliver us from the wicked one, and from all evil ; and save us from the guilt and punishment thereof, because we put our trust in thee, and in thee alone. Bp. Horne.

[i] Psalm xxxviii.] In this Psalm, which is the third of those styled penitential, the sinner, ver. 1, prayeth to be chastened only, and not destroyed ; 2—10, describeth the state of his soul under various images, chiefly borrowed from bodily diseases and pains ; 11, 12, complaineth of his friends forsaking, and his enemies persecuting him ; but, 13—15, continueth patient and resigned, committing his cause to God, whom, 16—22, he beseecheth to help him, on his confession and repentance. There are some passages in the latter part of the Psalm, literally predictive of our Lord's passion, and so understood by the best ancient expositors. Bp. Horne.

This, being another of those Psalms, which are called penitential, is therefore applicable to Ash-Wednesday. It was composed by David under some great affliction and anguish of mind. It is not certain whether he here describes the state of his mind under various images, chiefly borrowed from bodily diseases and pains ; or whether he was actually afflicted with sickness : very probably he was suffering from both. Travell.

[k] 1. Put me not to rebuke, &c.] The petition here preferred, as in the sixth Psalm, is, that Jehovah would not condemn as a judge, but chasten as a father, for the amendment and preservation of the offender. Bp. Horne.

[l] 2. For thine arrows &c.] The "arrows" and the "hand" of God, are his judgments on sin ; those internal pangs and terrors which pierce the soul, and those external afflictions and calamities which sink and weigh down the spirits. Bp. Horne.

[m] 3. There is no health in my flesh, &c.] The expressions in this verse are applicable to the disorders and diseases which sin hath introduced both into the soul and into the body, as the terms, "health," and "sickness," are in Scripture no less frequently employed to describe the state of the former, than that of the latter. Bp. Horne.

[n] 4. For my wickednesses are gone over &c.] Or, "the punishment of my wickednesses," as this word is frequently used : which best agrees both with the foregoing and following verses, and with the metaphor here used, which in other places of Scripture is generally applied to afflictions, and not to sins. Poole. Sins and sorrows are here, as in many other places, represented under the image of mighty waters rolling incessantly over the head of the person sunk into them, and by their accumulated weight depressing him, so that he can no more rise above them. Bp. Horne.

5 My wounds stink[o], and are corrupt : through my foolishness.

6 I am brought into so great trouble and misery : that I go mourning all the day long.

7 For my loins are filled[p] with a sore disease : and there is no whole part in my body.

no soundness. Bib. Trans.

8 I am feeble, and sore smitten : I have roared for the very disquietness of my heart.

9 Lord, thou knowest[q] all my desire : and my groaning is not hid from thee.

10 My heart panteth, my strength hath failed me : and the sight of mine eyes is gone from me.

11 My lovers and my neighbours[r] did stand looking upon my trouble : and my kinsmen stood afar off.

12 They also that sought[s] after my life laid snares for me : and they that went about to do me evil talked of wickedness, and imagined deceit all the day long.

contrived. See Vocab.

13 As for me, I was like a deaf man, and heard not : and as one that is dumb, who doth not open his mouth.

14 I became even as a man that heareth not : and in whose mouth are no reproofs.

15 For in thee, O Lord[t], have I put my trust : thou shalt answer for me, O Lord my God.

16 I have required that they, even mine enemies, should not triumph over me : for when my foot slipped, they rejoiced greatly against me.

17 And I, truly, am set in the plague : and my heaviness is ever in my sight.

There is no end of my sufferings. Travell. See Vocab.

18 For I will confess my wickedness[u] : and be sorry for my sin.

19 But mine enemies live[x], and are mighty : and they that hate me wrongfully are many in number.

20 They also that reward evil for good are against me : because I follow the thing that good is.

[o] 5. My wounds stink, &c.] Sin is the wound of the soul, which must be washed with the tears of repentance, cleansed by the blood of Christ, and healed by the Spirit of the Holy One. It requires great care and attention, until the cure be completed. Otherwise, mortification and death ensue, as in the case of outward wounds, if neglected, or ill-managed. See Isa. i. 6; Luke x. 34. Bp. Horne.

[p] 7. For my loins are filled &c.] The "disease," or "inflammation," complained of in these metaphorical terms, seems to be the distemperature of our fallen nature, whereby it cometh to pass, that "the flesh lusteth against the spirit:" it is that "other law in our members, warring against the law in our minds, bringing us into captivity to the law of sin," and forcing every son of Adam to cry out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death?" Happy is it for us, that we are enabled to go on with the apostle, and to "thank God," that we are delivered "through Jesus Christ our Lord," on whom were laid the iniquities of us all. Bp. Horne.

[q] 9. Lord, thou knowest &c.] The "desires" and "groans" of the penitent are known to God, and marked down in his book; and there is no small comfort in thinking and acknowledging that they are so; but much more comfort is there in the remembrance of those inconceivable "desires," and those unutterable "groanings," which the holy Jesus poured forth for us in the days of his flesh, and which prevail for the acceptance of our own. Bp. Horne.

[r] 11. My lovers and my neighbours &c.] A body afflicted with a noisome distemper, and a soul troubled on account of sin, find but few friends, who have charity enough to stay with, and to minister to them. Let us not be surprised, or offended, at this, when we see the righteous Jesus, at his passion, destitute and forsaken by all; as it is written, "Then all the disciples forsook him and fled," Matt. xxvi. 56; "and all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things," Luke xxiii. 49. Bp. Horne.

[s] 12—14. They also that sought &c.] These verses describe and recommend to our imitation the behaviour of David, and of a greater than David, when under persecution; the former from Absalom, Ahithophel, Shimei, &c.; the latter from the chief priests and elders, Judas, and the Jews. Bp. Horne.

Of David's patient submission and silence, under the reproaches and calumnies of his enemies, we have an instance in 2 Sam. xvi. 10—12. Wherein also he was an eminent type of Christ, who, "when he was reviled, reviled not again," 1 Pet. ii. 23. Poole.

[t] 15. For in thee, O Lord, &c.] This verse assigns the reason why the ill usage which we receive at the hands of men, should be borne with patience and resignation; namely, because, as it is not without the permission, so neither will it be without the notice, of the Almighty, who will one day take the matter into his own hands. Christ, saith St. Peter, "who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth, yet when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously," 1 Pet. ii. 23. Bp. Horne.

[u] 18. For I will confess my wickedness: &c.] The surest way to have our weakness strengthened, and our sin forgiven, is to acknowledge and confess both; and this we need not be ashamed to do, when we consider, that He who is the Lord strong and mighty, took our infirmities; and the King of righteousness bare our sins, in his own body, on the tree. Bp. Horne.

[x] 19. But mine enemies live, &c.] These words, joined with the preceding, are applicable to the distress of David, and the prosperity of his adversaries; to the sufferings of Christ, and the triumph of the Jews; to the afflictions of the Church, and the gaiety of the world; to the weakness of faith, and the strength of nature. The result of all is this, that salvation cometh of God only, and is to be implored in the following 21 Forsake me not, O Lord my God : be not thou far from me.

22 Haste thee to help me : O Lord God of my salvation.

Burial of the dead.

PSALM xxxix.[y] Dixi, custodiam.

I Said, I will take heed[z] to my ways : that I offend not in my tongue.

2 I will keep my mouth as it were with a bridle : while the ungodly is in my sight.

3 I held my tongue, and spake nothing : I kept silence, yea, even from good words; but it was pain and grief to me.

4 My heart was hot within me[a], and while I was thus musing the fire kindled : and at the last I spake with my tongue;

5 Lord, let me know mine end[b], and the number of my days : that I may be certified how long I have to live.

6 Behold, thou hast made my days[c] as it were a span long : and mine age is even as nothing in respect of thee; and verily every man living is altogether vanity. as an handbreadth. Bib. Trans.

7 For man walketh in a vain shadow[d], and disquieteth himself in vain : he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them.

8 And now, Lord, what is my hope[e] : truly my hope is even in thee.

9 Deliver me from all mine offences[f] : and make me not a rebuke unto the foolish. the reproach of the foolish. Bib. Trans.

words, which conclude the Psalm: "Forsake me not, O Lord; O my God, be not far from me. Make haste to help me, O Lord God of my salvation." Bp. Horne.

[y] PSALM xxxix.] The prophet, in a state of distress and persecution, determineth, 1—4, to be watchful and silent, as our blessed Lord also was, before his enemies. 5, He prayeth for a due sense of the shortness of human life; and after meditating, 6, 7, on that subject, fixeth all his faith and hope in God, 8, whom he entreateth, but with submission to his will, 9—11, for the remission of sin, and alleviation of misery. 12, From a view of the human body wearing away by sickness, he breaketh out, 13—15, into a most fervent and affectionate prayer, which ought to be continually in the mouth of the Christian upon earth. This Psalm is, with the utmost propriety, appointed by the Church to be used at the burial of the dead, as a funeral is indeed the best comment upon it. Bp. Horne.

This Psalm was composed, when David was under a severe fit of sickness, as some think; or a great degree of trouble, as others. Dr. Nicholls.

[z] 1. I said, I will take heed &c.] The Psalm begins abruptly with the result of a meditation on the narrow, slippery, and dangerous paths of life; and more especially on the extreme difficulty of restraining the tongue, amidst the continual temptations and provocations of the adversary. In these circumstances, "watchfulness" and "silence" are resolved on, as the only means of security. Let us behold the Lamb of God, as our great pattern and example herein. Bp. Horne.

[a] 4. My heart was hot within me, &c.] The fire of divine charity, thus prevented from diffusing itself, for the illumination and warmth of those around it, and, like other fire, rendered more intense by its confinement, presently ascended, in the flame of devotion, towards heaven; while it continued to be fed, and preserved in brightness and vigour, by meditation on the goodness of God, and the ingratitude of man; the transient miseries of time, and the durable glories of eternity. Bp. Horne.

[b] 5. Lord, let me know mine end, &c.] Wearied with the contradiction of sinners, and sickening at the prospect of so much wretchedness in the valley of weeping, the soul looks forward to her departure from hence, praying for such a sense of the shortness of human life, as may enable her to bear the sorrows of this world, and excite her to prepare for the joys of a better. "O faithless and perverse generation," saith even the meek and patient Jesus Himself, "how long shall I be with you, how long shall I suffer you?" Matt. xvii. 17. Bp. Horne.

[c] 6. Behold, thou hast made my days &c.] The age of man, or that of the world, is but a "span" in dimension, a moment in duration; nay, it is less than both; it is "nothing," if compared with the unmeasurable extent, and the unnumbered days, of eternity: every hour, from that of our birth, brings us so much nearer to our death: nor can we continue, for a second of time, in one stay. "Behold," then, O Lord, the "vanity" of man; and be so merciful unto him, as to open his eyes, that he may behold it himself! Bp. Horne.

[d] 7. For man walketh in a vain shadow, &c.] This world is, to the other, as a "shadow" to the substance; nay, temporal life, health, riches, honours, and pleasures, can hardly be called shadows of those which are eternal, in point of resemblance; though, for their illusive and fleeting nature, they are shadows indeed. The mortal state of man is compounded of light and darkness; seeming to be something, when really it is nothing; always altering, and ending on a sudden; nearest to disappearing, when at full length; sure to continue no longer than while the sun is above the horizon; but liable to vanish at the interposition of a cloud; and when it is gone, leaving no track behind it. The fate of riches heaped up by misers, with unutterable care and anxiety, may convince us, how "vainly" men are "disquieted!" Bp. Horne.

[e] 8. And now, Lord, what is my hope: &c.] The soul, that hath a true sense of the vanity of the creature, will at once fix her thoughts and affections on the Creator. Bp. Horne.

[f] 9. Deliver me from all mine offences: &c.] Affliction hath then had its proper effect, when the sufferer is thereby convinced of sin, and therefore prayeth for a removal of the latter, as the only way to be delivered from the former. The "reproaches" of the foolish make no inconsiderable article in the account of a Christian's sufferings; and our Lord frequently complaineth of them, in the Psalms, as one of the bitter ingredients in his own cup. Bp. Horne.

2 He brought me also out[o] of the horrible pit, out of the mire and clay : and set my feet upon the rock, and ordered my goings.

3 And he hath put a new song in my mouth : even a thanksgiving unto our God.

4 Many shall see it, and fear : and shall put their trust in the Lord.

[g] 10. I became dumb, &c.] Whatever materials compose the rod of affliction, and from whatsoever quarter the stroke cometh, let us remember, that the rod is grasped, and the stroke is inflicted, by the hand of our heavenly Father. To revenge ourselves on the instrument is folly; to murmur against the agent, is something worse. Bp. Horne.

[h] 11. Take thy plague away from me: &c.] The Christian, who knows from whence his troubles proceed, knows where to apply for relief; and having first "petitioned" for remission of sin, ver. 8, he then humbly supplicates for a mitigation of his sorrow. "Father," saith the beloved Son of God, "if thou be willing, remove this cup from me," Luke xxii. 42. Bp. Horne.

[i] 12. When thou with rebukes &c.] The body of a man is as a "garment" to the soul : in this garment sin hath lodged a "moth," which, by degrees, fretteth and weareth away, first, the beauty, then the strength, and finally, the contexture of its parts. Whoever has watched the progress of a consumption, or any other lingering distemper, nay, the slow and silent devastations of time alone, in the human frame, will need no farther illustration of this just and affecting similitude; but will discern at once the propriety of the reflection, which follows upon it : "Surely every man is vanity!" Bp. Horne.

[k] 13. Hear my prayer, O Lord, &c.] Meditation should terminate in devotion; and meditation on human vanity and misery, if indulged as it deserves to be, certainly will do so; it will bring us to our "prayers," our "cries," and our "tears;" and teach us to address the throne of grace, as poor pilgrims in a strange land, who have here no abiding city, but are soon to strike our tents, and be gone for ever. Such was David, though king of Israel; and such was the Son of David, in the body of his flesh, though Lord of all things: both were "strangers and sojourners, as all their fathers," Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were before them, and as all their children have been and shall be after them, upon the earth. Bp. Horne.

[l] 15. O spare me a little, &c.] Most fervently and affectionately, therefore, ought the Christian pilgrim to pray, that God would spare his life, and respite the awful sentence, until all that hath been decayed, through the frailty of nature, be renewed by the power of grace; that his perfect reconciliation with the Almighty may be accomplished, and his plenary pardon sealed in heaven, before he taketh his last farewell of the world, and ceaseth to have an existence in these regions of vanity and sorrow. Bp. Horne.

[m] PSALM xl.] It is plain, from ver. 8—10, of this Psalm, compared with Heb. x. 5, that the prophet is speaking in the character of Christ, who, 1—7, celebrateth the deliverance wrought for his mystical body, the church, by his resurrection from the grave, effecting that of his members from the guilt and dominion of sin; for the abolition of which He declareth, 8—10, the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and mentioneth his own inclination to do the will of his Father, and, 11—13, to preach righteousness to the world. 14—16, He representeth Himself as praying, while under his sufferings, for his own and his people's salvation; He foretelleth, 17, 18, the confusion and desolation of his enemies, and, 19, the joy and thankfulness of his disciples and servants; for the speedy accomplishment of which, 20, 21, He preferreth a petition. Bp. Horne.

The 8th, 9th, and 10th verses of this Psalm, being quoted in the 10th chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, prove that they are a direct prophecy of Jesus Christ, who only could fulfil the will of God completely, and who came into the world for that very end, as well as to declare his righteousness to the great congregation of the whole world. This application of the Psalm makes it highly suitable to Good Friday. Travell.

[n] 1. I waited patiently &c.] In this verse we hear the voice of the meek Lamb of God, who, though never sorrow was like unto his sorrow, "waited patiently," till the time appointed by the Father came, when that sorrow should be turned into joy. Let not his disciples expect to "inherit the promises," otherwise than "through faith and patience." Four thousand years, the church, under the patriarchs, the law, and the prophets, waited for the first advent of Messiah; and, seventeen hundred years, the church, under the Gospel, hath waited for the second. Jehovah, who inclined Himself to the prayers of the former, will also hear the cries of the latter. Bp. Horne.

[o] 2. He brought me also out &c.] The sufferings, from which our Redeemer was delivered, are here described under the image of a dark subterraneous cavern, from which there was no emerging, and where roaring cataracts of water broke in upon Him, overwhelming Him on every side; till, as it is expressed in the 18th Psalm, "God sent from above, and took him, and drew him out of many waters." Bp. Horne.

[p] 5. Blessed is the man &c.] He who is sensible how much God hath done, and how little the world can do for him, will earnestly and heartily pronounce the blessedness of the man, who relies upon the real power and goodness of the former, instead of suffering himself to be deceived by the empty parade, and fallacious promises, of the latter. Bp. Horne.

[q] 6. O Lord my God, great are the wondrous works &c.] The counsels and works of the ever-blessed Trinity, planned and executed for the benefit of man, in his creation and preservation, his redemption and sanctification, in order to his resurrection and glorification, through Christ, already risen and glorified, are subjects which can never be exhausted, by the intellectual powers of men or angels; but will, to both, afford matter of incessant meditation, and endless praise. Yet, how little do we meditate on them : how seldom, and how coldly, do we praise God for them! Bp. Horne.

[r] 8. Sacrifice, and meat-offering, &c.] These words, as the apostle informeth us, Heb. x. 5, are spoken by Christ, in his own person. In them He proclaims the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices to take away sin, and the divine disapprobation of such sacrifices, when relied on for that purpose. He sets forth his own readiness to do, and to suffer, the will of the Father, implied in the Psalm by the words, "mine ears hast thou opened;" but more plainly expressed in the apostle's citation, by the paraphrase, "a body hast thou prepared me." He refers to the predictions concerning Messiah, in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which is here styled, "the volume, or roll, of the book." He declares the pleasure He had in doing the Father's will, or in accomplishing the law; which had taken possession of all his powers and faculties; having been admitted by the understanding, retained in the memory, and rendered operative in the will. "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart." Bp. Horne.

That this whole passage is an eminent prophecy of Christ, appears by the apostle, Heb. x. 5; who makes Christ, not David, to be the speaker here : "Wherefore when he," that is, Christ, "cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice, &c.:" so that we may account of it, as the great signal wonder of mercy, done by God to men, which in the recounting of "God's wonderful works and thoughts to us-ward" He seasonably brings in by the spirit of prophecy, namely, the birth of the Messiah, and the sacrifice of Himself; wherein so many, even innumerable and inexpressible mercies were comprised and folded up. Dr. Hammond.

[s] 11—13. I have declared thy righteousness in the great congregation : &c.] "The great congregation :" that is, the congregation of the universal church, collected from the general mass of the whole human race, in opposition to the particular congregation of the Jewish people. Bp. Horsley. As the preceding verses described the priestly office of our Lord, in the execution of which He offered Himself, and his all-perfect obedience, for us : so, in the passage now before us, He declares Himself to have acted up to the prophetical part of his character, by "preaching" the doctrines of truth, righteousness, and salvation, to the people, without concealing aught through negligence, fear, or favour. Bp. Horne.

[t] 15. For innumerable troubles &c.] If these words, as well as the foregoing, are supposed to be spoken by our Lord, (and indeed there doth not appear to be any change of person,) they must be uttered by Him, considering Himself (for so the primitive writers suppose Him in the Psalms, frequently to consider Himself) as still suffering in his body mystical, the church; and lamenting, as head, both the transgressions and the afflictions of the members, accomplishing their warfare in the world. Thus much at least we know, that, after his ascension, when the members were persecuted on earth, the head complained from heaven, as sensible of the pain, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Bp. Horne.

Since "God laid upon him the iniquities of us all," therefore the Messiah, when He is persecuted in the Psalms, calls those iniquities his own, of which He bore the punishment. Bp. Horsley.

resurrection, exaltation, and power of Him whose blood they thirsted after, and whom they mocked and insulted when in his last agonies on the cross, are here foretold; and the prophecy hath been punctually fulfilled. But a more horrible confusion and desolation awaiteth them, and all other impenitent sinners, at the future revelation of the righteous judgment of God; when vengeance must destroy those, whom mercy cannot reclaim. And, to this ultimate issue of things, the church directeth her views. Bp. Horne.

[x] 20. As for me, I am poor &c.] We may apply to this verse the remark of Bp. Horne on the 15th; and consider our Lord "as still suffering in his body mystical, the church." Under the sense of these sufferings He comforts Himself with the reflection, that Jehovah is not unmindful of Him, and prays that He would not delay to complete the deliverance and triumph of the church. Bp. Horsley. The church, like her Redeemer, is often poor and afflicted in this world, but Jehovah thinketh upon her, and is solicitous for her support; she is weak and defenceless, but Jehovah is her help and her deliverer. With such a Father and such a Friend, poverty becometh rich, and weakness itself is strong. In the mean time, let us remember, that He who once came in great humility, shall come again in glorious majesty. "Make no tarrying, O our God; but come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," Rev. xxii. 20. Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm xli.] This Psalm, which was composed by David, sets forth the present reward of merciful-minded men in this life; and from thence ascendeth to the assured mercies of God to his faithful servants that stand in need of them. Dr. Hammond.

The application made of the 9th verse of this Psalm, John xiii. 18, sheweth, that the prophet is speaking in the person of Messiah. 1—3, He declareth the blessedness of the man that considereth the poor; 4, he prayeth for mercy and favour; 5—9, describeth the behaviour of his adversaries, and of one person in particular; 10, petitioneth for deliverance; 11, 12, rejoiceth in hope; and, 13, breaketh out into thanksgiving. Bp. Horne.

[z] 1. Blessed is he that considereth &c.] As Christ considered us, in our state of poverty, so ought we most attentively to consider Him, in his; to consider what He suffered in his own person; to discern Him suffering in his poor afflicted members; and to extend to them the mercy which He extended to us. He, who was "blessed" of Jehovah, and "delivered in the evil day," by a glorious resurrection, will "bless" and "deliver" in like manner, such as, for his sake, love and relieve their brethren. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3. The Lord comfort him, &c.] An exemption from sorrow and sickness is not promised to the children of God; but strength and comfort are given unto them, from above, to support and carry them through their trials; and they who, in the days of their health, have by their alms given rest to the bodies, or, by their counsels, restored peace to the consciences, of others, shall have the bed of pain made easy under them, by the hand of their heavenly Father. Bp. Horne.

[b] 4. I said, Lord, be merciful &c.] Every son of Adam may, and ought, in these words, to acknowledge his sin, and to entreat for mercy and grace, to heal the disorders of his nature. If we suppose Messiah ever to have uttered this verse in his devotions, as we know He applied the 9th verse to his own case, it is obvious that He must be understood to confess the sins, not of his own righteous person, but of the nature He had assumed, in order to cleanse and purify it by his sufferings. See above, Ps. xl. 15. Bp. Horne.

[c] 5. Mine enemies speak evil &c.] Here we may undoubtedly consider the poor and lowly Jesus, in the day of his humiliation, when He was daily and hourly calumniated by his adversaries; when, restless and impatient at beholding Him still alive, they said, "What do we? for this man doeth many miracles. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him. Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? Behold, the world is gone after him," John xi. 47; xii. 19; and when, grown more furious and clamorous, they cried, "Away with him, away with him, crucify him, crucify him." How many, with the same bitterness of spirit, "speak evil" continually of his doctrines, his church, his ordinances, and his ministers; in effect, saying, "When shall he die, and his name perish?" Bp. Horne.

[d] 6. And if he come to see me, &c.] Many of the Jews, who visited our Lord, came to Him with insidious designs. Bp. Horsley. Thus the enemies of Christ "sent out spies, who should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor," Luke xx. 20. Thus Judas sat down at the last supper, all the while meditating the destruction of his Master; till at length rising from table, and going abroad, he put his design in execution. Bp. Horne.

[e] 7. All mine enemies whisper &c.] The whisperers of the Pharisees, the counsels of the Sanhedrim, and their taunts and scoffs at the blessed Jesus, when on the cross "numbered with the transgressors," nor ever expected to "arise" again from the dead, are here most significantly and plainly pointed out. Bp. Horne.

[f] 9. Yea, even mine own familiar friend, &c.] "I speak not of you all," saith our Lord to his disciples; "I know whom I have chosen : but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me, hath lift up his heel against me," John xiii. 18. Bp. Horne.

The Psalmist here appears to speak of one person in particular, who professed the greatest kindness for him; a servant in whom he reposed trust, and who lived by his service; Ahithophel probably, one of David's counsellors, 2 Sam. xvi. 23 : but who most insidiously and perfidiously set himself against him. And herein was David a type of Christ, betrayed by his own disciple, who was in a special manner intrusted by him, John xiii. 18. Dr. Hammond. Our Saviour Himself has taught us to apply this verse to the traitor Judas. Travell.

[g] 10. But be thou merciful unto me, O Lord: &c.] The holy Jesus here maketh his prayer unto the Father, for the accomplishment of the promised resurrection, and foretelleth the righteous judgment that would be executed on his enemies, after their rejection of the gracious offers made them, by the apostles in his name, notwithstanding all that they had said and done against Him. Then the kingdom of God was taken from them, and their house was left unto them desolate. Bp. Horne.

[h] 11. By this I know thou favourest me: &c.] The Christian, like his Master, must expect sorrow and tribulation, but he is not thereby deprived of the "favour" of heaven; his spiritual enemies, whatever trouble they may give him, yet do not "triumph" over him; he is preserved in his "integrity," and his reward will be the "vision" of God. For the exaltation, therefore, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of all believers, in, by, and through Him, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen." Bp. Horne.

[i] Psalm xlii.] David, by Absalom's rebellion, driven from Jerusalem to the country beyond Jordan, is there supposed to have indited this Psalm; which as it is applicable to the case of our Lord, in his state of sojourning and suffering on earth, for our sins; as also, that of the church under persecution, or that of any member thereof, when deprived of the opportunities of publick worship; so doth it, in the most beautiful and pathetick strains, describe the vicissitudes of joy and sorrow, of hope and despondency, which succeed each other in the mind of the Christian pilgrim, while, exiled from the Jerusalem above, he suffereth affliction and tribulation in this valley of tears. The last is the application chiefly made in the comment, as it is the most general and useful one; the others naturally offer themselves, being coincident with, or subordinate to, it. Bp. Horne.

[k] 1. Like as the hart &c.] The thirst, which the "hart" experienced, when chased in sultry weather, over the dusty plains, is here set before us, as a representation of that ardent desire after the waters of eternal comfort, which the temptations, the cares, and the troubles of the world, produce in the believing soul. Happy they who feel this desire, and fly to the well of life, that it may be satisfied. "Blessed are they that thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled," Matt. v. 6. Bp. Horne.

[l] 3. My tears have been my meat &c.] So long as the soul finds herself absent from him whom she loveth, sorrow is still her portion, as well in the day of worldly prosperity, as in the night of adversity. And this sorrow is greatly aggravated by the taunts of the enemy; who, because the promise is delayed, and she suffereth affliction in the mean season, ridiculeth and insulteth her faith and hope, as vain and groundless; intimating, that God hath forsaken her, and tempting her to renounce her principles. Bp. Horne.

[m] 4, 5. Now when I think thereupon, &c.] As the royal prophet, when driven from Jerusalem by Absalom, was melted into tears at the comparison of his destitute and forlorn situation with his former glory and happiness, when, upon some joyous festival, with all his subjects about him, he had attended the service of the tabernacle, in the city of God; so the Christian pilgrim cannot but bewail his exile from the heavenly Jerusalem, out of which sin hath driven him, and doomed him to wander, for a while, in the vale of misery. Led, by repentance and faith, to look back to the place from whence he is fallen, he sighs after the unspeakable joys of the celestial Zion; longing to keep a festival, and brought them forth into the house of God;

celebrate a jubilee in heaven; to join in the songs of angels, and bear a part in the musick of hallelujahs. Bp. Horne.

[n] 6, 7. Why art thou so full of heaviness, &c.] The holy mourner now expostulates with his soul for suffering herself to sink into a kind of despondency, on account of her afflictions, and the insolent triumph of the adversary; and, as a sovereign cordial for melancholy, prescribes "faith" in God, which will shew the morning of salvation dawning, after the night of calamity shall have run its course, a night which cannot be long, and may be very short. When the sun arises, we cannot be without light; when God turns his countenance towards us, we cannot be without "salvation." Bp. Horne.

[o] 7.—I will yet give him thanks] Rather, "I shall yet give him thanks:" that is, notwithstanding my present afflicted state, I shall yet again have cause to give Him thanks for my complete deliverance, and for being still my God. Bp. Horsley.

[p] 8. My God, my soul is vexed &c.] The soul, although exhorted, in the last verse, to "put her trust in God," yet, considering her own infirmity, still continueth to be dejected: the prophet, therefore, confesseth as much: and maketh his complaint to God, from whom alone he expecteth comfort: and whom he did not forget, while, far from the sanctuary, he wandered up and down in the country beyond Jordan, whither he had fled from the face of Absalom. This world is, to us, that "country beyond Jordan;" Lord, make us to "remember" thee, under all the affliction and tribulations we meet with therein, until, restored to thy Jerusalem, we shall praise thee in heaven, for the mercies experienced upon earth. Bp. Horne.

[q] —the little hill of Hermon.] Which, notwithstanding its height, seems a poor despicable hill, in comparison of Zion, where I use to worship God, and enjoy his special presence. Anon.

[r] 9. One deep calleth another, &c.] The prophet describeth the troubles which successively came upon him, by the vengeance of heaven, from above, "raising up evil against him, out of his own house" and kingdom, from beneath, according to the prediction of Nathan, 2 Sam. xii. 11. The ideas seem to be borrowed from the general deluge, or from a storm at sea, when, at the "sound" of descending "water-spouts," or torrents of rain, the depths are stirred up, and put into horrible commotion; the clouds above calling, as it were, to the waters below, and one wave encouraging and exciting another to join their forces, and overwhelm the despairing sufferer. Bp. Horne.

Water-spouts are observed to be frequent upon the Syrian and Jewish coasts; and were therefore likely to be alluded to by a Jewish poet. Travell.

[s] 10. The Lord hath granted &c.] The gloomy prospect begins again to brighten, by a ray of hope shooting through it: and the prophet returneth to his rest and confidence in the mercy of God, determining, not only to give Him thanks in the day of prosperity, but, as Paul and Silas afterwards did, to sing his praises at midnight, in adversity and affliction. Bp. Horne.

[t] 11. I will say unto the God of my strength, &c.] He ventureth notwithstanding, meekly and humbly, upon the strength of the promises, to expostulate with Him, who was the "rock" of his salvation, as to his seeming destitution, while continually oppressed and insulted by the cutting reproaches of the adversary. See above, ver. 3. These might be thought to render it in some sort necessary for God to arise, and vindicate his own honour, by the protection and deliverance of his servant. The Psalmist concludes with that exhortation to his soul, to trust in God, and to wait for his salvation, which makes the mournful chorus of this beautiful Psalm: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God." See above, ver. 6. Bp. Horne.

[u] PSALM xliii.] This Psalm seemeth to be a continuation of the former, written by David in the same circumstances, on the same subject, and closing with the same chorus. Bp. Horne.

strength, why hast thou put me from thee : and why go I so heavily, while the enemy oppresseth me?

a people who had driven their sovereign from his capital, to wander like a fugitive and vagabond in the remotest parts of his dominions; against the hypocrisy of Absalom, and the villany of Ahithophel. The Son of David may be supposed to make the same appeal against the same nation, for their far more cruel, treacherous, and iniquitous usage of Him, their King and their God. And the words suit the circumstance of an oppressed church, or an injured prince, of all who suffer for truth and righteousness' sake, or who groan under the tyranny of their spiritual enemies, the world, the flesh, and the devil. Bp. Horne.

[y] 4. And that I may go unto the altar &c.] The royal prophet, upon his restoration to his throne, was to sacrifice on the altar of his God, with the voice of thanksgiving, and to celebrate his mighty Deliverer, in a new song, upon the melodious harp. The Christian, in like manner, foresees a day coming, when sorrow and sighing shall be no more; when he and his brethren are to be "made kings and priests;" when they are to reign with their Redeemer for ever; and upon their golden harps, tuned to an unison with those of angels, to sing his everlasting praises in the courts of the heavenly temple. Therefore, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God." See above, Ps. xlii. 6. Bp. Horne.

[z] Psalm xliv.] There is no certainty either concerning the author, or the particular occasion of this Psalm. It was evidently composed with respect to the calamitous condition of the church and people of Israel, whom it supposeth to be in a state of captivity and persecution. But whether it was made by David, who foresaw and foretold by the Spirit of God their future captivity, and formed this for their use in that estate; or by some other holy man of God, when they were actually in this condition; is not determined, nor necessary to know for the understanding of it. Poole.

In this Psalm we hear the voice of the church, under persecution; 1—4, recounting the mercies of God vouchsafed to his servants of old time: 5—9, declaring her confidence, that she shall experience the same in her present distress, and shall at length overcome through the power of her Redeemer; for that, notwithstanding her seeming desertion and manifold sufferings, 10—17, there is still a faithful remnant, 18—22, of those who have not bowed the knee to Baal, and who cease not, 23—26, to cry unto God for mercy and deliverance. Bp. Horne.

[a] 1. We have heard with our ears, O God, &c.] The works wrought of old, by the arm of Jehovah, for the salvation of his people, are recorded by the Spirit in the Scriptures of truth, that "through patience and comfort of those Scriptures," as the apostle expresses it, the church and people of God, whensoever oppressed and afflicted in any age or country, "may have hope," that the same God will exert the same power in their behalf. And great is the light, great is the consolation, which the sacred history, when thus applied, will always afford to the troubled mind. Bp. Horne.

[b] 2. How thou hast driven out the heathen &c.] If the dispossession of the Canaanites, and the establishment of the house of Jacob in their land, furnished the distressed church of Israel with sufficient ground for confidence; how much more hath the argument since received, by the accomplishment of what was then typified; by the victories of the true Joshua, or Jesus, by the fall of Paganism, and the plantation of the Christian faith in its stead! Bp. Horne.

[c] 3. For they gat not the land &c.] As it sufficiently appears, that the settlement of Israel in the promised land was the work of God, from the miraculous fall of Jericho; from the prolongation of the day, at the word of Joshua; from the slaughter of the enemy by hailstones from heaven, &c. &c.; so was it the first thing which an Israelite was in duty bound to acknowledge, if he hoped for more mercies at the hand of God. The Christian, in like manner, begins and ends all his prayers with an humble and thankful acknowledgment

9 We make our boast of God all day long : and will praise thy Name for ever.

10 But now thou art far off[e], and puttest us to confusion : and goest not forth with our armies.

11 Thou makest us to turn our backs upon our enemies : so that they which hate us spoil our goods.

12 Thou lettest us be eaten up like sheep : and hast scattered us among the heathen.

14 Thou makest us to be rebuked of our neighbours : to be laughed to scorn, and had in derision of them that are round about us.

15 Thou makest us to be a by-word among the heathen : and that the people shake their heads at us.

16 My confusion is daily before me[g] : and the shame of my face hath covered me;

17 For the voice of the slanderer and blasphemer : for the enemy and avenger.

18 And though all this be come upon us[h], yet do we not forget thee : nor behave ourselves frowardly in thy covenant.

19 Our heart is not turned back : neither our steps gone out of thy way;

20 No, not when thou hast smitten us into the place of dragons : and covered us with the shadow of death.

21 If we have forgotten the Name of our God[i], and holden up our hands to any strange god : shall not God search it out? for he knoweth the very secrets of the heart.

22 For thy sake also are we killed[k] all the day long : and are counted as sheep appointed to be slain.

Our constancy to thee exposes us to continual slaughters. Bp. Patrick.

of the free mercy of God in Jesus Christ; confessing that he "gat not" his title to salvation, nor should enter into the possession of it, by "his own" power or merit, but by "the right hand and the arm of his Redeemer, and the light of his countenance, because he had a favour unto him." Bp. Horne.

[d] 7. For I will not trust in my bow: &c.] In spiritual, as well as temporal warfare, the appointed means are to be used, but not "trusted in;" man is to fight, but God giveth the victory; and to Him must be ascribed the praise, and the power, and the glory; that, as it is written, "He who glorieth, may glory in the Lord." And thus the Christian church daily singeth, after the example of her blessed and holy representative, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour." Bp. Horne.

[e] 10. But now thou art far off, &c.] The church, having declared her confidence, founded on the former mercies of God vouchsafed unto her, proceedeth now to describe her pitiable state under persecution, when the protection of the Almighty seemed, for a season, to be withdrawn, so that she was no longer able to stand before her enemies. Bp. Horne.

[f] 13. Thou sellest thy people for nought: &c.] The plain meaning of this sentence is, that as things, useless and burdensome, are not sold for any valuable price, but allowed to be taken away by any that will have them; so are they dealt with by God at this time, not regarded by Him, and so permitted to be conquered and carried away captive by every one that will assault them. Dr. Hammond.

[g] 16. My confusion is daily before me:] A church, as a collective body, may speak in the singular or plural number, "I," or "we," indifferently. Bp. Horsley.

[h] 18. And though all this be come upon us, &c.] It is certain that God is provoked by the sins of a church, to let loose the fury of the oppressor upon her. This is acknowledged by Daniel in his prayer, chap. ix; by the three children in the furnace, Song, ver. 5, 6; by the Maccabean martyrs, suffering under Antiochus, 2 Mac. vii. 18; and by Cyprian, and others, in the primitive times. It is not less certain, that no mere man can say, he is free from transgression. The verses, now under consideration, are not, therefore, spoken by the whole church, but by the faithful remnant; nor do they imply an exemption from all sin, but a stedfast perseverance in the profession of God's true religion, from which it is the aim of persecution to seduce, or to force them. The malice of the tormentors is here compared to the venom of "serpents:" and the state of a suffering church, to the gloom of "death" itself. Happy the soul, that, in the extremity of affliction, can, with humble confidence, thus make her appeal to God, as having held fast her integrity against all the efforts made to wrest it from her, and not having suffered the blasts of adverse fortune, by wearing out patience, to part her from the anchor of faith. Bp. Horne.

[i] 21. If we have forgotten the Name of our God, &c.] The consideration, that "God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things," 1 John iii. 20, ought to be strongly impressed upon our minds at all times; but more particularly, when we are tempted by the world (as, one way or other, we all frequently are) to deny our Master, either by word or deed; and when we have occasion to call heaven to witness our uprightness, under such temptation. Bp. Horne.

[k] 22. For thy sake also are we killed &c.] The sufferings of the martyrs were a sufficient proof that they had not yielded to the temptations of the enemy. St. Paul, Rom. viii. 36, cites this verse as predictive of the persecutions then beginning to be raised against the Christians. All may apply it to themselves, who are in circumstances of the same nature; and persecution is generally consistent with itself, contriving, by some means or other, to be rid of those who stand in its way. It is a storm, before which all must either bend, or be broken. Bp. Horne.

[l] 23. Up, Lord, why sleepest thou: &c.] There is a time, when the triumphs of the adversary, and the afflicface: and forgettest our misery and trouble?

25 For our soul is brought low[m], even unto the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the ground.

26 Arise, and help us: and deliver us for thy mercy's sake.

tions of the church, tempt men to think, that the eye of Providence is closed, or turned away, and that the Almighty hath ceased to remember their sad estate. But the truth is, that God only giveth his people an opportunity of feeling their own insufficiency; and waiteth till, by fervent and importunate prayer, they solicit his help. Bp. Horne.

[m] 25. For our soul is brought low, &c.] They who are not brought into this state of humiliation by outward sufferings, should bring themselves into it by inward mortification and self-denial, by contrition and abasement, if they would put up such prayers, as the Majesty of heaven will deign to accept, and answer; if they would repeat with our Church, in the spirit of the Litany, the concluding verse of this Psalm, "Arise for our help, and redeem us, for thy mercies' sake." Bp. Horne.

[n] PSALM xlv.] The subject matter of this Psalm is, by the consent of both Jewish and Christian, ancient and modern, interpreters, agreed to be the Messiah and his marriage with the church of God: of which it treats, either remotely, under the type of Solomon and his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, of which it is to be primarily and literally understood, and then mediately and ultimately of Christ: or rather immediately and directly, although the words be so ordered, that they carry a manifest allusion either to that or some other royal marriage. Poole. The truth is, many of the expressions in it are so magnificent, that they can be, but in a very poor and low sense, applied to Solomon and his bride: and some of them scarce at all. And it is so apparent, that no Christian can deny it, that the mind of the prophet, while he was writing some part of this Psalm, was carried quite beyond King Solomon, to the great King, the Lord Christ; or at least he was guided to use words so high, that they proved too big for Solomon: and we must say, as our Saviour doth in another case, "Behold, a greater than Solomon is here." Bp. Patrick.

In this Psalm, which is one of those appointed to be used on Christmas-day, the prophet, after, 1, 2, proposing his subject, proceeds to celebrate King Messiah, 3, for his spiritual beauty and eloquence; 4—6, his power and victories; 7, his throne and sceptre; 8, his righteousness and inauguration; 9, his royal robes, and glorious palace. 10, The church is introduced as his spouse; her appearance and dress are described; 11—13, it is foretold, that the nations shall bring their offerings to her; 14—16, her attire, her presentation to Christ, with her attendant train, and the universal joy and gladness occasioned by the solemnization of the nuptials, are set forth. 17, The prophet predicteth the fruits of this divine union; and, 18, the use that should be made of his sacred epithalamium by the faithful, from generation to generation. Bp. Horne.

[o] 1. My heart is inditing &c.] "The Spirit of the Lord," saith David elsewhere, 2 Sam. xxiii. 2, "spake by me, and his word was in my tongue." In like manner, we are to conceive the prophet here to be full of the divine Spirit, which inspired him with "the good word," or the glad tidings of salvation. The sacred fire, inclosed in his heart, expanded itself within, till at length it brake forth with impetuosity, to enlighten and to revive mankind with this glorious prediction "touching the King," Messiah; and this was uttered by his tongue, under the guidance of the Spirit, as, in writing, the pen is directed by the hand that holds it. Bp. Horne.

[p] 2. My tongue is the pen: of a ready writer.] That is, "well-instructed:" the word "ready," here used, rightly understood, renders the original properly: but then it must be understood, not for nimbleness of hand in writing, but readiness of mind in the subject treated. Bp. Horsley.

[q] 3. Thou art fairer &c.] After a short introduction, the prophet stays not to enter regularly upon the subject, in the formal way of narration; but, as if he saw the divine Person, whom he was about to celebrate, standing before Him, he breaks out in ecstatick admiration of the second Adam, so different from all the descendants of the first; compounded of a soul far above all created spirits, and a body pure and perfect, and now brighter than the meridian sun; being invested with the unutterable effulgence of the Divine Nature. Next to the spiritual beauty of Messiah, the prophet is astonished (as those who heard Him speak, in the days of his flesh, afterwards were) at "the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth," Luke iv. 22; through the "grace poured into his lips." Such honey and milk were under his tongue, so delightful and salutary was his doctrine, that even his enemies found themselves obliged to confess, "never man spake like this man," John vii. 46. His word instructed the ignorant, resolved the doubtful, comforted the mourners, reclaimed the wicked, silenced his adversaries, healed diseases, controlled the elements, and raised the dead. Therefore hath the Father loved, and exalted, and blessed Him for evermore. Bp. Horne.

[r] 4. Gird thee with thy sword &c.] The prophet, having described the beauty and the eloquence of the King, proceedeth now to set forth his power, and to arm Him, as a warrior for the battle. The "sword" of Messiah is his word, which, in the language of St. Paul, is said to be "quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword;" and is represented by St. John, as "a sharp two-edged sword," coming out of the mouth of Christ, Heb. iv. 12; Rev. i. 16. With this weapon He prevailed, and thereby made his "glory and majesty" to be known throughout the world. Bp. Horne.

[s] 5. Good luck have thou &c.] Messiah is in these words magnificently described, as making his progress among the nations, seated in his triumphal chariot, the word of truth, of meekness, and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things[t].

6 Thy arrows are very sharp[v], and the people shall be subdued unto thee: even in the midst among the King's enemies.

adorned with all the regal virtues, achieving the most astonishing victories, and, by the irresistible might of his power, subduing idolatry and iniquity, to the faith and temper of the Gospel. Bp. Horne.

[t] —thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.] That is, thou shalt do great and glorious exploits, which shall be grievous and terrible to thine enemies, as the next verse explains it; and that, not by great forces and the assistance of others, but by thine own single power. Compare Isa. lxiii. 3. This doth by no means agree with Solomon, who was not engaged in any martial exploits against his enemies; but it doth excellently agree with the Messiah, and with Him only. Poole.

[v] 6. Thy arrows are very sharp, &c.] The prophet goes on to represent Messiah as a warrior, completely armed, and skilful in the use of every weapon. Thus a prince is pourtrayed, Rev. vi. 2; "I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering, and to conquer." The conquests of Messiah are either those of his word over sin, or those of his arm over the persecuting powers. Bp. Horne.

[u] 7. Thy seat, O God, &c.] As if it were said, The thrones of earthly princes are, like themselves, brittle and variable, and their government many times drawn aside to protect evil and repress good: but thy throne, O Saviour, is everlasting; even when heaven shall pass, it shall continue; and thy government can be no other than holy and righteous. Bp. Hall. The battle being fought, and the victory gained, we are called to the consideration of the "throne" and "sceptre" of King Messiah, whom the prophet addresseth as God. His throne is distinguished from the thrones of this world, by its endless duration; his sceptre, from the sceptres of earthly potentates, by the unerring rectitude of its administration. Bp. Horne.

It is very evident, that this verse is applicable to no throne and to no sceptre, but the throne and sceptre of Messiah; nor can any other king be addressed by the title of God. Therefore the whole Psalm belongs to Him. Bp. Horsley. See Heb. i. 8.

[x] 8. Thou hast loved righteousness, &c.] Therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee from everlasting, as the King, Priest, and Prophet of thy church, with that heavenly oil, whereby He hath gladded the hearts of all thy faithful people: and hath endowed thine assumed humanity with all divine graces, above all mere mankind. Bp. Hall. The sermons, the example, and, above all, the death of Christ, for the expiation of sin, demonstrated his love of righteousness, and hatred of wickedness; and, "because he humbled himself, and became obedient even to the death of the cross, therefore God highly exalted him," Phil. ii. 8, 9; and He was "anointed" to the kingdom "with the Holy Ghost and with power" immeasurable; to the intent that He might bestow, in due proportion, the gifts of heaven on those whom He is not ashamed to call "friends" and "brethren." And these gifts He did bestow on them, by the emission of the Spirit, soon after his ascension and inauguration. See the application of these last two verses to Christ, Heb. i. 8, 9. Bp. Horne.

[y] 9. All thy garments smell of myrrh, &c.] From the throne, the sceptre, and the inauguration, the prophet passes on to the robes and palaces of the King of glory, declaring that as the perfumed garments of an earthly prince scatter through all the royal apartments a grateful fragrance, so from the glorious vestments of our High Priest and King is diffused the sweet savour of his heavenly graces, filling those happy regions of joy and gladness, where He keeps his residence above, and, by the communication of the Spirit, refreshing the faithful on earth with their odours. Bp. Horne.

[z] 10. Kings' daughters &c.] Such being the divine beauty, and heavenly glory, of the blessed Person, whose nuptials the prophet is now proceeding to describe, it is no wonder that, upon hearing of his fame, innumerable converts, forsaking the vanities even of courts and kingdoms, should follow Him, ambitious to have the honour of composing his train; which in reality was the case, upon the publication of the Gospel. And, lo, at "the right hand" of the King, followed by this magnificent procession, appears the church, the spouse of the Lamb, arrayed in the garments of righteousness and salvation, fitly compared for their inestimable value, and radiant brightness, to the "gold of Ophir." Bp. Horne.

[a] 11. Hearken, O daughter, &c.] This seemeth to be the voice of God, addressing the church to the following effect: O thou whom I have begotten unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, and whom I have called out of the world, to become "the Lamb's wife," hearken diligently to my voice, consider attentively what I say, and be obedient to my direction: thou art now entering into a new state; let old things pass away; regard no more thy connexions with earth; but let the love, and, if possible, the very memory, of thy former condition be obliterated from thy mind; let all things belonging to the flesh die in thee: then shalt thou be truly acceptable and dear in his sight, who, having purchased and betrothed thee to Himself, shall be there with a gift: like as the rich also among the people shall make their supplication before thee.

14 The King's daughter[c] is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold.

15 She shall be brought unto the King[d] in raiment of needle-work: the virgins that be her fellows shall bear her company, and shall be brought unto thee.

16 With joy and gladness[e] shall they be brought: and shall enter into the King's palace.

17 Instead of thy fathers[f] thou shalt have children: whom thou mayest make princes in all lands.

18 I will remember thy Name[g] from one generation to another: therefore shall the people give thanks unto thee, world without end.

I will make thy name to be remembered. Bib. Trans. praise thee for ever and ever. Bib. Trans. See Vocab.

justly claims thy whole heart, thy undivided love, and thy unlimited service and adoration. Bp. Horne.

[b] 13. And the daughter of Tyre &c.] The accession of the Gentiles, with their offerings and donations, to the church, is here predicted under the name of "Tyre," a city in the neighbourhood of Palestine, formerly the glory of the nations, and mart of the world. See Isa. lv. and Rev. xxi. Bp. Horne.

[c] 14. The King's daughter &c.] The church, in different respects, is sometimes called the spouse, sometimes the sister, and often, as here, the "daughter," of the heavenly King; the connexion formed between them, uniting in itself every relation, and every affection. Her beauty, so greatly desired and delighted in by Messiah, is spiritual; it is the beauty of holiness: and her clothing is "the righteousness of saints:" 1 Pet. iii. 3; Rev. xix. 8. Bp. Horne.

[d] 15. She shall be brought unto the King &c.] The different graces of the faithful, all wrought in them by the same Spirit, compose that divine "embroidery" which adorns the wedding-garment of the church, who is therein presented to the King, attended by her bride-maids, after the nuptial manner. These are either the single churches, or holy souls, that accede to and accompany the spouse; unless we suppose, as some do, that the bride is the Israelitish church, and then the attendants will represent the Gentiles. Bp. Horne.

[e] 16. With joy and gladness &c.] The solemnization of this marriage between Christ and the church produceth a jubilee upon earth, and causeth the streets of the heavenly Jerusalem to resound with hallelujahs. For this the angels tune their golden harps, while prophets, apostles, martyrs, and saints, fill up the universal chorus of "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever." Bp. Horne.

[f] 17. Instead of thy fathers &c.] In this verse the prophet foretelleth the fruit that should spring from the glorious nuptials which he hath been celebrating. He assureth the spouse, that instead of her earthly kindred, whether Jewish or Pagan, which she was to leave for Christ, should arise an illustrious and royal progeny of believers, out of whom were to be chosen Christian kings to govern the world, and Christian bishops to preside in the church. The expression, "whom thou mayest make princes," may answer to that in the Revelation, i. 6, "And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father." Bp. Horne.

[g] 18. I will remember thy Name &c.] O my God and Saviour, I, who by thy gracious inspiration have made this bridal song unto thee, will celebrate and praise thy blessed name to all generations, and will stir up thy people to bless and praise thee for ever and ever. Bp. Hall.

By inditing this divine marriage-song, appointed to be sung in the congregation of the faithful, from age to age, the Psalmist hath been, as he foresaw he should be, the blessed means of celebrating his Redeemer's name, and inciting the nations of the world to do likewise; nor will he cease to be so, while the forty-fifth Psalm continues to be sung in the church upon earth; that is, while there remaineth a church upon earth to sing in. And we, who now do sing it, are witnesses of these things. Bp. Horne.

[h] PSALM xlvi.] The church, in time of trouble, declares, 1, her trust and confidence to be in God, and doubts not, 2, 3, of being preserved safe, by means of this anchor, in the most stormy seasons; even then, 4, 5, enjoying the comforts of the Spirit, and the presence of Christ in the midst of her. She describes, 6, and, 7, exults in, the power and might of her victorious Lord; 8, 9, calling the world to view and consider his wonderful works. 10, He Himself is introduced, as speaking the nations into peace and obedience. She concludes with a repetition of ver. 7, in the way of chorus. Bp. Horne.

It is not known to what time this Psalm belongs, nor who was the author of it. Bp. Patrick.

[i] 2. Therefore will we not fear, &c.] The church declares her full and firm confidence in God, as her refuge and strength, amidst all the tumults and confusions of the world, the raging of nations, and the fall of empires. Nay, at that last great and terrible day, when sea and land are to be confounded, and every mountain and hill removed for ever; when there is to be "distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring;" even then the righteous shall have no cause to "fear," but rather to "lift up their heads" with joy and triumph, because then it is, that their "redemption draweth nigh." Let us set that day before us, and try ourselves by that test. Bp. Horne.

[k] 4, 5. The rivers of the flood thereof &c.] As if it were said, Let the sea of this world roar and be ever so unquiet, the holy city Jerusalem, the type of God's church, hath a little river, even Gihon or Kidron, whose calm and gentle streams shall abundantly refresh it: and the mystical Jerusalem hath both the waters of life, the word of the everlasting God, to comfort and satisfy it here ; and those living waters of life eternal in the paradise of God, to make it everlastingly happy. Bp. Holl.

Such is the ground on which the church erects her confidence. Instead of those waters which overwhelm the world, she has within herself the fountain of consolation, sending forth rivers of spiritual joy and pleasure ; and in the place of secular instability, she is possessed of a city and a hill which stand fast for ever, being the residence of the Eternal, who at the dawn of the last morning, will finally appear as the protector and avenger of Israel. Bp. Horne.

[l] 8. O come hither, and behold &c.] The church here proposes to us the noblest subjects for contemplation ; namely, the glorious victories of our Lord, partly gained already, and partly to be gained hereafter, in order to the final establishment of universal peace, righteousness, and bliss, in his heavenly kingdom. Then the mighty shall be fallen, and the weapons of war perished, for ever. Hasten, O Lord, that blessed day : but first prepare us for it. Bp. Horne.

[m] 10. Be still then, and know &c.] In this verse there is a change of person, and Jehovah Himself is introduced, as commanding the world to cease its opposition, to own his power, and to acknowledge his sovereignty over all the kingdoms of the nations. Let our rebellious passions hear this divine edict, tremble, and obey. Bp Horne.

[n] 11. The Lord of hosts is with us : &c.] To "the Lord of hosts" all creatures in heaven and earth are subject : in "the God of Jacob" the church acknowledges the Saviour of his chosen. If this person be IMMANUEL, God WITH us, of whom can we be afraid ? Bp. Horne.

[o] PSALM xlvii.] In this Psalm, appointed by the church to be used on Ascension-day, the prophet, 1, calls the nations to celebrate so glorious a festival ; and that, on account, 2, of Christ's power, and the mightiness of his kingdom ; 3, of his victories and triumphs, through the Gospel ; 4, of the inheritance prepared for his chosen, in the heavenly Canaan, by his own ascension thither ; which, 5, is described under images borrowed from the ascent of the ark into the holy city and temple ; an occasion on which the Psalm was probably composed. 6, 7, He again and again exhorts all people to sing the praises of their God and King, and to sing with the understanding, as well as with the voice. 8, 9, The Psalm concludes with predicting the establishment of Christ's kingdom, and the conversion of the Gentile kings and nations to the faith. Bp. Horne.

There is no doubt but that this Psalm was composed on some occasion of the ark being removed to its proper resting place, either by David, 2 Sam. vi. 5, and 14, 15 ; or by Solomon, 2 Chron. v. 2. 12, 13. And the ark being a figure of Christ, as its dwelling place was of the heavens, the removal of it may be looked upon as a figure of Christ's ascension to the high and holy place, where He is now at God's right hand in the heavens. And with relation to this alone the ancient fathers expound the Psalm. Bp. Patrick.

[p] 1. O clap your hands &c.] The prophet invites all nations to celebrate the festival of Messiah's exaltation, because all nations had a share in the benefits and blessings of that glorious day. God is to be worshipped with bodily, as well as spiritual worship : every "hand" should be lifted up to Him who formed it, and every "mouth" should praise Him who giveth breath for that purpose. Bp. Horne.

[q] 2. For the Lord is high, &c.] The church celebrates the ascension of Christ, because then He was "highly exalted ;" then He became "terrible" to his enemies, all power in heaven and in earth being committed to Him ; and then He began to display the excellent majesty of his universal kingdom, to which He was then inaugurated, being crowned "King of kings, and Lord of lords." Bp. Horne.

[r] 3. He shall subdue &c.] The consequence of our Lord's ascension was the going forth of the all-subduing word, under the influence and direction of which, the convinced and converted nations renounced their idols and their lusts, and bowed their willing necks to the yoke of Jesus. This is that great conquest, foreshewed by the victories of Joshua, David, and all the faithful heroes of old time, and foretold in language borrowed from their histories. Bp. Horne.

[s] 4. He shall choose out an heritage &c.] The land of Canaan, emphatically styled, "that good land, and the glory of all lands," was the "excellent inheritance" chosen for the sons of Jacob, and consigned to them, with a shout. Bib. Trans.

5 God is gone up[t] with a merry noise: and the Lord with the sound of the trump.

6 O sing praises[u], sing praises unto our God: O sing praises, sing praises unto our King.

7 For God is the King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding.

8 God reigneth over the heathen[x]: God sitteth upon his holy seat.

9 The princes of the people[y] are joined unto the people of the God of Abraham: for God, which is very high exalted, doth defend the earth, as it were with a shield.

PSALM xlviii.[z] Magnus Dominus.

Whit-Sunday, first Psalm Morn. Serv.

GREAT is the Lord[a], and highly to be praised: in the city of our God, even upon his holy hill.

2 The hill of Sion is a fair place[b], and the joy of the whole earth: upon upon the expulsion of the idolatrous nations. But from that inheritance Israel also hath long since been expelled; and Christians by these words are taught to look to "an inheritance eternal, and incorruptible, and that fadeth not away;" to those happy and enduring mansions which the Son of God is gone to prepare for them that love Him, and are beloved of Him. Bp. Horne.

[t] 5. God is gone up &c.] Literally, if applied to the ark, as Bishop Patrick paraphrases the verse, "God is gone up by the special token of his presence, into that holy place, with shouts of joy and praise; the Lord is gone up in a triumphant pomp, with the sound of the trumpet, and all other instruments of musick." See 2 Sam. vi. 5. 15; 2 Chron. v. 2. 12, &c. Ps. cxxxii. 8, 9. But spiritually, as applied now by the Christian church, to the ascension of Christ into heaven, prefigured by that of the ark into the temple; God incarnate is gone up into that holy place, not made with hands; the everlasting doors of heaven are opened, for the King of glory to enter, and re-possess his ancient throne; there He is received by the united acclamations of the celestial armies, by that "shout," that voice of the archangel, and that "trump of God," which are to sound again, in the day when He shall "so come, in like manner, as he went into heaven." Bp. Horne.

[u] 6. O sing praises, &c.] It was customary to go out to meet kings and conquerors with songs and dances. So Miriam met Moses; the Jewish women, Saul and David. Bp. Horsley. Who can contemplate the glorious triumph of human nature over its enemies, in the person of our King, risen and ascended, without finding himself constrained to break forth into joy, and to sing, with a thankful heart, and an elevated voice, the praises due unto his holy name! These divine hymns were designed for that purpose. Let us therefore sing them, and let us sing them "with understanding;" considering by whom they were indited, and of whom they treat; reflecting, that the eternal Spirit is their author, and their subject the blessed Jesus. Bp. Horne.

[x] 8. God reigneth over the heathen: &c.] We are never suffered to forget, that the end of Messiah's exaltation to the right hand of the majesty in the heavens was the conversion and salvation of the world; so continually do the prophets and apostles delight to dwell upon that most interesting topick, the conversion of the "nations" to the Gospel of Christ. Why do we vainly fancy, that we belong to Him, unless his Spirit "reign" in our hearts by faith? Bp. Horne.

[y] 9. The princes of the people &c.] That is, the chiefs of the heathen nations shall be joined with the Jews, so as to partake of the privileges and blessings, granted by God to Abraham. Dr. Nicholls. This verse plainly describeth the kings of the Gentiles as acceding to the church; as becoming, with their subjects, through faith, "the people of the God of Abraham," and a part of the sacred peculium; as submitting to God in Christ that power with which they were invested, as "shields of the earth," or protectors of their several kingdoms; and as bowing their sceptres to the cross of Jesus. The sense of the verse, expressed in New Testament language, would be, "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." So let every nation be converted unto thee, O Lord! and every king become thy son and servant; until all the world shall worshĩp thee, sing of thee, and praise thy name! Bp. Horne.

[z] PSALM xlviii.] This is a hymn in honour of Jerusalem, as particularly chosen for the place of God's worship, and so defended by his more immediate care from all hostilities of invading enemies: a cheerful form of singing lauds to God, particularly for that mercy of permitting men to meet in his solemn service, and so, in the mystical sense, an acknowledgment of his glorious mercies afforded to the church of Christians under the Gospel. It seems to have been composed after some signal defeat of an invading army. Dr. Hammond.

This Psalm is one of those which by our Church are appointed to be used on Whit-Sunday, because under images taken from the earthly city Jerusalem, newly rescued from her enemies by Him who resided in the material temple on mount Zion, are celebrated, 1, 2, the glory, the beauty, and the strength of the church Christian, that city and temple of Messiah; who, 3—6, is described as breaking in pieces, and bringing to nothing, the opposition formed against her by the heathen kings and emperors; on which account, 7—10, she expresseth her gratitude and joy; 11—13, exhorting her people to contemplate, and transmit to posterity, an account of those wonderful works of God, the establishment and preservation of his church in the world; for which she wishes all generations, after her example, to adore and praise his holy name, for ever and ever. Bp. Horne.

[a] 1. Great is the Lord, &c.] The prophet preparing to celebrate the beauty and magnificence of the church, begins with setting forth the praises of her great Founder; whose wisdom, mercy, and power, as they are conspicuous in all his works, so, more especially, in this, the chief and crown of all: for which, his name can never be sufficiently extolled by the inhabitants of the new Jerusalem; and by them it ought to be extolled for ever and ever. Bp. Horne.

[b] 2. The hill of Sion is a fair place, &c.] How fair and beautiful is the holy and heavenly Sion, or the Christian church! how truly is she "the joy of the whole earth," by the glad tidings which her ministers continually publish! how properly is this Jerusalem styled "the city of the great King!" Bp. Horne.

the north-side lieth the city of the great King; God is well known in her palaces as a sure refuge.

3 For lo, the kings of the earth[c]: are gathered, and gone by together.

were assembled, they passed by together. Bib. Trans.

4 They marvelled[d] to see such things: they were astonished, and suddenly cast down.

they were troubled, and hasted away. Bib. Trans.

5 Fear came there upon them, and sorrow: as upon a woman in her travail.

6 Thou shalt break the ships[e] of the sea: through the east-wind.

7 Like as we have heard[f], so have we seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God: God upholdeth the same for ever.

We have thought of. Bib. Trans.

8 We wait for thy loving-kindness[g], O God: in the midst of thy temple.

9 O God, according to thy Name[h], so is thy praise unto the world's end: thy right hand is full of righteousness.

10 Let the mount Sion rejoice[i], and the daughter of Judah be glad: because of thy judgements.

11 Walk about Sion[k], and go round about her: and tell the towers thereof.

12 Mark well her bulwarks, set up her houses: that ye may tell them that come after.

consider her palaces. Bib. Trans.

13 For this God is our God[l] for ever and ever: he shall be our guide unto death.

PSALM xlix.[m] Audite hæc, omnes.

O Hear ye this, all ye people[n]: ponder it with your ears, all ye that dwell in the world;

---

[c] 3. For lo, the kings of the earth: &c.] Never were the power and malice of earthly princes more violently bent to hinder the building of Jerusalem, or to pull down what was already built, than they were to prevent the edification of the church, and to root up its foundations. But the event, with regard to the latter, was the same which had often happened in the case of the former. Bp. Horne.

[d] 4. They marvelled &c.] The potentates of the world saw the miracles of the apostles, the courage and constancy of the martyrs, and the daily increase of the church, notwithstanding all their persecutions; they beheld with astonishment the rapid progress of the faith through the Roman empire; they called upon their gods, but their gods could not help themselves; idolatry expired at the foot of the victorious cross, and the power which supported it became Christian. Bp. Horne.

[e] 6. Thou shalt break the ships &c.] As a navy by sea is dispersed by a furious east wind, so didst thou, O Lord, scatter and discomfit those mighty enemies, that came up against Jerusalem. Bp. Hall. In the foregoing verse the consternation amongst the enemies of the church was compared to the horrors of a travailing woman: here it is likened to the apprehensions of despairing mariners. Nor indeed can any thing in nature more fitly represent the overthrow of heathenism by the spirit of the Gospel, than the wreck of a fleet of ships in a storm at sea. Both are effected by the mighty power of God. Illustrations of this kind are sometimes introduced by the sacred writers with the mark of comparison: and frequently, as here, without it. Bp. Horne.

[f] 7. Like as we have heard, &c.] The church heard, by the prophets, of the future birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Messiah: of the effusion of the Spirit, and her own enlargement, establishment, and preservation, in the Gentile world. These predictions, which she had so often "heard," she hath "seen" accomplished even unto this day; and therefore doubts not of God's continuing his favour and protection to the end of time. Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. We wait for thy loving-kindness, &c.] Contemplation of all the wondrous works, which the Lord our God hath wrought for us, produces faith in his promises, and resignation to his will: and he, that, with these dispositions, waits for God's mercies, in God's house, shall not wait in vain. Bp. Horne.

[h] 9. O God, according to thy Name, &c.] For this and such like glorious actions thou art praised and acknowledged, and evidently proved to be such an one, as thou hast affirmed thyself to be in thy word, "God Almighty" or "All-sufficient," "the Lord of Hosts," "the King of thy church and people," "a strong tower to all that trust in thee," and all other things which thou art called in Scripture. "Thy name" is not an empty title; but is filled up with honourable and praiseworthy works answerable to it. Poole.

[i] 10. Let the mount Sion rejoice, &c.] The church and all her children are exhorted to rejoice, with joy unspeakable and full of glory, on account of the manifestation of divine power, on her behalf, against her enemies. Thus at the fall of the mystic Babylon, it is said, "Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her," Rev. xviii. 20. Bp. Horne.

[k] 11. Walk about Sion, &c.] Look well, O ye beholders, upon the many and goodly towers of Jerusalem, upon her strong foundations, upon her fair palaces: and, as thereby you shall be excited to praise God for the deliverance of so noble and beautiful a pile, so take occasion thereby to think of the splendour and glory of that heavenly Jerusalem which is above. Bp. Hall. Christians are here enjoined to contemplate, again and again, continually, the fabrick of the spiritual Jerusalem, wonderfully raised, and as wonderfully preserved: to consider attentively the parts designed for use, for strength, for ornament; that they may be able to instruct posterity in the nature and history of this holy building, and in their duty of forwarding and defending the same, from generation to generation. Bp. Horne.

[l] 13. For this God is our God &c.] Let the world worship whom or what it will, we worship none other but Him, who by his Spirit founded, and by his power preserveth, the church; who by that Spirit "guideth" us through life, and by that power will enable us to overcome "death;" that so we may rejoice and triumph for evermore, as citizens of the city of God, and subjects of the King of glory. Bp. Horne.

known, nor the particular occasion of it. It seems to have been penned, like the 39th and 73rd, on the contemplation of the afflictions of some pious but poor people, and of the prosperity and glory of ungodly men. The design is to justify God's providence in this dark dispensation; and to shew, that, all things being considered, good men have no cause for immoderate dejection of spirit, nor wicked men for glorying in their present prosperity. Bp. Patrick, Poole.

The prophet, after a solemn introduction, 1—4, in which the whole world is called upon, to hear a lesson of divine wisdom, 5, proposes the subject in a question, implying the great folly of yielding to the temptation of fear, in the time of affliction and persecution, when the rich and the powerful are in arms against the innocent and righteous sufferer; inasmuch as, 6—9, no man, by his riches or power, can redeem his brother, or himself, in the evil day; but, 10, wise and foolish die, and leave their estates to others; and, 11—14, notwithstanding all their care and pains, are soon forgotten, while they are detained, by death, in the grave till they rise to judgment and condemnation. On the other hand, the prophet, in the person of Messiah, 15, declares his faith in a joyful resurrection to life and glory, through the power of Jehovah; and, 16—20, exhorts believers, neither to fear nor envy the man of the world, considering what his latter end is to be. Bp. Horne.

[n] 1. O hear ye this, all ye people: &c.] This Psalm opens with great dignity, and the prophet speaks "as one having authority." He demands an audience, like that which is to be assembled at the last day; having something to deliver, which is universally important and interesting; something which concerns every age, and condition, and nation, under heaven. And we may observe, that although the sound of this Psalm, when first uttered, could be heard only within the confines of Judea, yet the knowledge of it hath since actually been diffused in the Christian church, throughout the world, from the rising to the setting sun. But how few, alas! have duly attended to the salutary lesson, which it so divinely teacheth! Bp. Horne.

[o] 4. I will incline mine ear &c.] In the promulgation of wisdom and understanding to the world, the prophet, as the faithful scribe of the Spirit, was to speak only what he should hear, by "inclining his ear" to his divine teacher; he was to speak in the way of "parable," or proverb, or problem, that is, in such a way, as should require study and diligence, to unfold and explain: in such a way, as the world is not inclined to understand, or listen to: as our Lord delivered his doctrines when on earth. And, that melody might serve as a vehicle for instruction, this important lesson was to be set to musick, and played upon the harp. Bp. Horne.

[p] 5. Wherefore should I fear &c.] I intend not to neglect the counsel I give to others; and therefore shall ask myself the question I mean to answer. What cause is there that I should be troubled with fears and cares and anxiety of mind in calamitous times, when the iniquity of those, who endeavour to supplant me, hath surrounded me on all sides? Bp. Patrick.

[q] 7. But no man may deliver his brother:] Namely, from death, as appears from ver. 10, &c.; neither from the first death, nor from the second, which he points at verses 14. 19. Poole.

[r] 8. For it cost more to redeem their souls:] It is a business too difficult and costly for him to redeem the life of a man; or to respite for a time the departure of him, whose soul is leaving his body. Bp. Patrick.

[s] 9. Yea, though he live long: &c.] For though God Almighty permit him to live ever so long, yet he must die at last. Dr. Nicholls.

[t] 10. For he seeth that wise men &c.] The inability of man to save his brother or himself from death is evinced by daily experience, which sheweth us, that the penalty due to sin is continually levied upon all: wisdom and folly go down into the dust together; "and then, whose shall those things be, which have been provided?" Luke xii. 20. Their possessions come into the hands of others, perhaps of those for whom they never intended them, and who have neither inclination nor ability to do the dead man any service. Bp. Horne.

[u] 12. Nevertheless, man will not abide in honour: &c.] The continuance of man in the world is as that of a traveller at an inn, who tarrieth but for a night; so that if honour and wealth do not soon leave him, he must soon leave them, and, like the brutes around him, return to his earth, never more to be seen, and little more to be thought of. Families decay, and are extinguished, as well as individuals; and the world itself is to perish after the same example. Bp. Horne.

[x] — seeing he may be compared unto the beasts that perish;] That is, which are utterly lost and extinct. So he is in reference to all his wealth and honour, of which the Psalmist here speaks. Poole.

[y] 13. This is their foolishness: &c.] The practice of labouring to acquire wealth and greatness, which can

MORNING PRAYER.

PSALM 1. [g] Deus deorum.

THE Lord, even the most mighty God [h], hath spoken: and called be of no service after death, and of endeavouring to perpetuate the possession of the most uncertain things in nature, is doubtless a folly; but it is a folly, which, like many others, is at once blamed, and imitated. Bp. Horne.

[z] 14. They lie in the hell like sheep, &c.] The high and mighty ones of the earth, who cause people to fear, and nations to tremble around them, must one day crowd the grave; in multitude and impotence, though not in innocence, resembling sheep, driven and confined by the butcher, in his house of slaughter. There death, that ravening wolf, shall feed sweetly on them, and devour his long-expected prey, in silence and darkness, until the glorious morning of the resurrection dawn; when the once oppressed and afflicted righteous, risen from the dead, and sitting, with their Lord, in judgment, shall have the dominion over their cruel and insulting enemies; whose faded beauty, withered strength, and departed glory, shall display to men and angels the vanity of that confidence which is not placed in God. Bp. Horne.

[a] — in the sepulchre out of their dwelling.] Lodged in a dark grave, and not in those delightful mansions which they erected for themselves. Dr. Nicholls.

[b] 15. But God hath delivered &c.] The righteous, as well as the wicked, descend into the grave: to the bodies of the former it is a resting place, as the prison was to St. Peter, till the angel of the Lord shall awaken them, and call them forth; while to the latter it is a condemned hold, from which, at the appointed day, they are to be dragged to execution. The prophet here expresseth a full and firm faith in the resurrection; and may be conceived as speaking in the person of Him, who was first redeemed from the grave, and accepted by the Father; who did not "despond in the days of evil, and when the wickedness of his supplanters compassed him about:" as foreseeing their speedy destruction, and his own approaching resurrection and exaltation. And, therefore, He thus exhorts each disciple of his in the subsequent verses of our Psalm. Bp. Horne.

[c] 16. Be not thou afraid, &c.] This is the conclusion of the Psalm, naturally following from the premises; and addressed, by way of exhortation and comfort, to the meek and humble disciples of the Lamb; directing them to fear God, who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell, and not to be afraid of the short-lived power conferred in this world, by wealth, over the body only. For this purpose, nothing is requisite, but to strip the worldling of the pomp and parade, the connexions and relations of life, and to consider him, as he is to appear on the day of his burial, when nothing shall attend him, but his shroud, to the grave, and his works, to the judgment-seat. View him in this light, which is the proper light to view him in, and he will cease to be the object of fear or envy. Bp. Horne.

[d] 18. For while he lived, &c.] Such must be the worldling's end, as described above; however, in the day of health and prosperity, he may bless himself, and say, "Soul, thou hast goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." Nor will such a speech, whenever it is spoken, want its admirers: it will have the applause of numbers, whose opinion it is, that "there is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat, and drink, and enjoy himself, all the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun." Bp. Horne.

[e] 19. He shall follow &c.] They, who follow their fathers in sin, must follow them likewise into the torments of that sad place, where darkness has fixed his everlasting abode, for the reception of those that ever loved and embraced it; and where the light of life and salvation no longer visits those, who always hated, and rejected it. Bp. Horne.

Although the Atheist shall rise, yet he shall never see that light, which emphatically deserves the name: that light, of which created light is but a faint image; the light of God's glory. He shall have no share in the beatifick vision. Bp. Horsley.

[f] 20. Man being in honour &c.] That is, The man, who lives in outward honour, and yet wants true wisdom and understanding, to know God and himself, lives as a beast, and dies as a beast, brutishly. Bp. Hall. The sum of the whole matter is, that it can profit a man nothing to gain the whole world; to become possessed of all its wealth, and all its power; if, after all, he lose his own soul, and be cast away, for want of that holy and heavenly wisdom which distinguishes him from the brutes, and sets him above them, in his life, and at his death. Bp. Horne.

[g] PSALM 1.] This Psalm is a solemn magnifying of God's power and majesty, and a description of the calling of the Gentiles, and of the true evangelical way of worshipping God. It was composed probably by David, and appointed to be sung by Asaph, a Levite, appointed by David to attend the ark, and to praise the Lord God of Israel. 1 Chron. xvi. 4, 5. Dr. Hammond.

The Psalm presents us with a magnificent description, 1, 2, of the promulgation of the Gospel, followed, 3, 4, by a prediction of the terrible manner of God's coming to judge his apostate people, Israel: 5, 6, of the assembly to be present, and his appeal to men and angels; 7—13, the rejection of the legal, and, 14, 15, the establishment of the Christian worship and services; 16—20, the impenitent Jews are arraigned, and, 21, the world, from the rising up of the sun, unto the going down thereof.

2 Out of Sion[i] hath God appeared: in perfect beauty.

3 Our God shall come[k], and shall not keep silence: there shall go before him a consuming fire, and a mighty tempest shall be stirred up round about him.

4 He shall call the heaven from above[l]: and the earth, that he may judge his people.

5 Gather my saints[m] together unto me: those that have made a covenant with me with sacrifice.

6 And the heaven shall declare his righteousness: for God is Judge himself.

7 Hear, O my people[n], and I will speak: I myself will testify against thee, O Israel; for I am God, even thy God.

8 I will not reprove thee[o] because of thy sacrifices, or for thy burnt-offerings: because they were not alway before me.

9 I will take no bullock[p] out of thine house: nor he-goat out of thy folds.

10 For all the beasts of the forest are mine: and so are the cattle upon a thousand hills.

threatened; and, 22, exhorted to consider, to repent; and, 23, to embrace the evangelical, or spiritual religion. It is to be observed, that in this Psalm, as in our Lord's discourse on the same subject, the particular judgment of Jerusalem is a figure and specimen of the last general judgment. Hypocritical and wicked Christians are therefore to apply to themselves what is primarily addressed to their elder brethren, the unbelieving and rebellious sons of faithful and obedient Abraham. Bp. Horne.

[h] 1. The Lord, even the most mighty God, &c.] "God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath, in these last days, spoken unto us by his Son," Heb. i. 1. The everlasting Gospel hath made its glorious progress from the eastern to the western world; and the nations have been thereby called to repentance. Bp. Horne.

This summoning of the earth from east to west can be nothing but the general promulgation of the Gospel. Bp. Horsley.

[i] 2. Out of Sion &c.] The law, which was given by Moses, proceeded from Sinai, the mount of fear and horror; but the word of grace and truth, which came by Jesus Christ, issued forth from Sion, the chosen mountain of beauty and excellency, in Jerusalem. There that glory first arose and shone, which, like the light of heaven, soon diffused itself abroad over the face of the whole earth. Bp. Horne.

[k] 3. Our God shall come, &c.] The "coming of God" ordinarily signifies in Scripture any judicial proceeding of his, God's punishments and vengeance on his enemies. But this Psalm seems peculiarly to look forward to the times of the Messiah, and so to denote some coming of his. Now there are three comings of Christ expressed in the Scripture. The first in humility, by his being born in our flesh: the last in glory, for the universal judgment: and a middle coming, which was to be spiritual, a mighty work wrought in the world by the power of that Spirit which raised Jesus from the dead, beginning in a terrible vengeance upon his crucifiers, the notable destruction of the Jewish temple and of Jerusalem, and so of the Mosaical worship and the Judaical polity, and proceeding to the propagation of the Christian faith to all the world. To this coming the present Psalm seems most signally to belong. Dr. Hammond.

The prophet, having described the first advent of Christ, and the promulgation of the Gospel, now foretelleth his coming to take vengeance on the hypocritical Jews, as also his advent to judge the world, prefigured thereby. Upon both those occasions, his coming was to be with sounds and sights of terror, with all the marks and tokens of wrath and fiery indignation, like those displayed on Sinai. Bp. Horne.

[l] 4. He shall call the heaven from above: &c.] Heaven and earth, men and angels, were to be witnesses of the righteous judgments of God, executed upon his apostate people; as all the celestial armies, and all the generations of the sons of Adam, are to be present, at the general judgment of the last day. Bp. Horne.

[m] 5. Gather my saints &c.] These are the words of God, summoning mankind to attend the trial, "calling to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people." Thus it is said of the Son of man, Matt. xxiv. 31, "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Bp. Horne.

[n] 7. Hear, O my people, &c.] This is the voice of the omniscient Judge, impleading his ancient people, who are commanded to attend to the words of Him, their God and covenanted Saviour, thus constrained to clear his justice before the world, and to shew that they had destroyed themselves. Nominal and wicked Christians will be addressed in the same manner at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[o] 8. I will not reprove thee &c.] This judicial process was not commenced against Israel for their having neglected to offer the sacrifices of the law: their oblations were on the altar, morning and evening, continually, insomuch that God, by the prophet Isaiah, declares himself "weary of them," as not having been accompanied with faith and holiness in the offerer. Many pharisaical Christians will be condemned for the same reason, notwithstanding their strict scrupulous attendance upon the ordinances of the new law, if it shall appear that they left religion in the church behind them, instead of carrying it with them into their lives and conversations. Bp. Horne.

[p] 9. I will take no bullock &c.] The Jewish folly of doating on the legal offerings, as things in themselves acceptable to God, and conferring justification on man, is reproved in these verses, from the consideration, that the various animals, slain in sacrifice, were long before, even from the creation of the world, the sole right and property of Jehovah; which, therefore, He needed not to have required at the hands of his people; nor would He have done so, but for some farther end and intent, signified and represented by such oblations. What that end and intent was, Christians know; and Jews formerly did know. Learn we hence, not to dream of any merit in our works and services; since God hath a double claim, founded on creation and redemption, to all we have, and all we are. Bp. Horne.

11 I know all the fowls upon the mountains : and the wild beasts of the field are in my sight.

12 If I be hungry, I will not tell thee : for the whole world is mine, and all that is therein.

13 Thinkest thou that I will eat bulls' flesh[q] : and drink the blood of goats ?

14 Offer unto God thanksgiving[r] : and pay thy vows unto the most Highest.

15 And call upon me in the time of trouble : so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise me.

16 But unto the ungodly said God[s] : Why dost thou preach my laws, and takest my covenant in thy mouth ;

17 Whereas thou hatest to be reformed : and hast cast my words behind thee?

18 When thou sawest a thief, thou consentedst unto him : and hast been partaker with the adulterers.

19 Thou hast let thy mouth speak wickedness : and with thy tongue thou hast set forth deceit.

20 Thou satest, and spakest against thy brother : yea, and hast slandered thine own mother's son.

21 These things hast thou done[t], and I held my tongue, and thou thoughtest wickedly, that I am even such a one as thyself : but I will reprove thee, and set before thee the things that thou hast done.

22 O consider this[u], ye that forget God : lest I pluck you away, and there be none to deliver you.

23 Whoso offereth me thanks[x] and praise, he honoureth me : and to him that ordereth his conversation right will I shew the salvation of God.

HAVE mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness[z] : according to the multitude of thy mercies do away mine offences.

[q] 13. Thinkest thou that I will eat bulls' flesh : &c.] Another argument of the Jews' blindness is, the gross absurdity of imagining, that a spiritual and holy being could possibly be satisfied and pleased with the taste and smell of burnt-offerings, (which God often declareth himself to have been,) any otherwise, than as they were symbolical of some other sacrifice, spiritual and holy, and, therefore, really propitiatory and acceptable in his sight. That man judaizeth, who thinketh to please God by an external, without an internal service; or by any service, without Christ. Bp. Horne.

[r] 14. Offer unto God thanksgiving : &c.] The carnal and bloody sacrifices of the law being abolished by the coming of Messiah, the spiritual and unbloody oblations of the Gospel succeed in their stead. These are, the eucharistick sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving for the mercies of redemption; that hearty repentance, that faith unfeigned, and that obedience evangelical, promised and vowed in baptism; that perfect trust in God, and resignation to his will, which our Lord expressed in his prayer, during his sufferings, and which we ought to express in our prayers, when called to suffer with Him, if we desire to glorify God for our deliverance through Him, in the day of visitation. These are the services enjoined to such Jews as would become Christians, and to such Christians as would be Christians in deed and in truth. Bp. Horne.

[s] 16. But unto the ungodly said God : &c.] From hence, to the end of the Psalm, we have an expostulation of God with the unbelieving Jew, who boasted his relation to Abraham, without a spark of Abraham's faith in his heart; and gloried in a law, which condemned him as a breaker of its precepts in every instance. St. Paul's expostulation with the same person, Rom. ii. 17, &c., is so exact a parallel to this before us, that one will be the best comment upon the other. Bp. Horne.

[t] 21. These things hast thou done, &c.] The forbearance of God only tempted the Jews still to think Him on their side, till at length He made the Roman armies his instruments of conviction; who, by crucifying multitudes of their countrymen in sight of the besieged, did in a wonderful manner "reprove them, and set before them the things which they had done." The day of judgment will do this to all sinners, if temporal chastisements effect it not, before that day shall come. Bp. Horne.

[u] 22. O consider this, &c.] The stupendous desolation of Jerusalem for rejecting so kind an admonition of her Saviour, and suffering Him to weep over her in vain, should, in a most powerful manner, enforce that admonition on the inhabitants of Christendom to prevent its falling, after the same example of unbelief. Bp. Horne.

[x] 23. Whoso offereth me thanks &c.] This verse resumes and repeats the conclusion intended, by the whole Psalm, concerning the Jewish and the Christian worship; and St. Paul, in the place above cited, affords us a complete comment upon it: "He is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; nor is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh : but he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God." Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm li.] In this Psalm, composed upon a sad occasion, but too well known, we have a perfect model of penitential devotion. The royal supplicant, robed in sackcloth, and crowned with ashes, entreats for mercy, 1, 2, from a consideration of his own misery, and of the divine goodness: 3, from that of his confession, 4, of God's sole right to judge him; 5, laments the corruption of his nature; but, 6, without pleading it as an excuse; 7, prays for Gospel remission, in legal terms; 8, for spiritual joy and comfort; 9, 10, for pardoning and cleansing grace; 11, 12, for strength and perseverance, that he may, 13, instruct and convert others; 14, 15, deprecates the vengeance due to blood; 16, 17, beseeches God to accept an evangelical sacrifice; and, 18, 19, concludes with a prayer for the church. Bp. Horne.

This is a principal one of those Psalms which are called penitential, and was composed by David after his notorious guilt in the affair of Bathsheba and Uriah. It is inserted in the solemn service appropriated to the first day of Lent. Travell.

[z] 1. Have mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness: &c.] The penitent's first ground for hope of pardon is his own misery, and the divine mercy which rejoiceth to relieve that misery. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3. For I acknowledge &c.] The penitent's second plea for mercy is, that he doth not deny, excuse, or palliate his fault, but confesses it openly and honestly, with all its aggravations. Bp. Horne.

[b] 4. Against thee only have I sinned, &c.] A third reason why the penitent sues for mercy at the hand of God is, because God alone certainly knows, and is always able to punish, the sins of men. David sinned "against" many; as against Uriah, whom he slew; against Bathsheba, whom he corrupted; and against all the people, to whom he became the cause of much offence and scandal. But the sin was committed in secret; and if it had not been so, he, as king, had no superior, or judge, in this matter, but God only; who, being able to convict the offender, as he did, by the prophet Nathan, would assuredly be justified in the sentence he should pronounce. Bp. Horne.

[c] — and cleor when thou art judged.] "When thou judgest," according to the Bible translation; that is, when thou dost plead or contend with me, or execute thy sentence or judgment upon me. Or, "when thou art judged," according to this translation, and as it is rendered Rom. iii. 4: that is, when any man shall presume to censure thee, as not keeping thy covenant and mercy promised to David. Poole.

[d] 5. Behold, I was shapen in wickedness: &c.] The divine mercy is here implored by the penitent, fourthly, because that alone can dry up the fountain of original corruption, from which the streams of actual transgression derive themselves; and which is here only lamented as their cause, not alleged as their excuse; seeing, that the greater our danger is of falling, the greater should be our care to stand. David was the offspring of the marriage-bed, which is declared to be "honourable and undefiled." No more, therefore, can be intended here, than that a creature begotten by a sinner, and formed in the womb of a sinner, cannot be without that taint which is hereditary to every son and daughter of Adam and Eve. Bp. Horne.

[e] 6. But lo, thou requirest truth &c.] The force of "lo," or "behold," here is, It is too plain; I feel it but too sensibly; the punishment I suffer is evidence sufficient, that thou art not contented with a superficial appearance of goodness: thou lovest truth and sincerity in the bottom of the heart. This God was now teaching him by the correction He made him suffer. The punishment inflicted tended to give him a right understanding of things, and to work it deep into him. Bp. Horne.

[f] 7. Thou shalt purge me with hyssop, &c.] He therefore petitioneth, in this verse, for the purification which cometh from God only, through the one great propitiatory sacrifice, by the Holy Spirit; and which was foreshewn, under the law, by the ceremony of sprinkling the unclean person with a bunch of "hyssop," dipped in the "water of separation." This rite is described Numb. xix. and explained Heb. ix. 13, 14. Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. Thou shalt make me hear of joy &c.] Next to the blessing of forgiveness, is to be desired that joy and comfort in the conscience which forgiveness only can inspire; the effect of this, in repairing the vigour of the spirit, decayed through sorrow and anguish, is compared to setting broken bones, and restoring them again to perfect strength. At the resurrection of the body, this petition will be granted in a literal sense, when the "bones," that are mouldered into dust, shall "rejoice and flourish as an herb," Isa. lxvi. 14. Bp. Horne.

[h] 9. Turn thy face from my sins: &c.] The soul, still restless and uneasy, reiterates her request, that God would not only cease to behold her iniquity for the present, as a man who turneth away his face from a writing, but that he would not behold it more, as a man who blotteth out what is written, so that it can never be read again. Bp. Horne.

[i] 10. Make me a clean heart, &c.] The purification and renovation of the heart and spirit of a man is a work to which that power only is equal, which, in the beginning, created all things, and, in the end, will create all things new. "A right spirit is renewed within us," when the affections turn from the world to God, and charity takes the place of concupiscence. Bp. Horne.

[k] 11. Cast me not away from thy presence: &c.] The soul that is truly penitent, dreads nothing but the thought of being rejected from the "presence," and deserted by the "Spirit" of God. This is the most deplorable and irremediable effect of sin: but it is one, that in general perhaps is the least considered and regarded of all others. Bp. Horne.

[l] 12. — and stablish me with thy free Spirit.] Namely, the Spirit of God, which might enable him to act as became a prophet and a king, free from base desires and enslaving lusts. Bp. Horne.

[m] 13. Then shall I teach &c.] He, that would employ his abilities, his influence, and his authority, in the reformation of others, must take care to reform himself, before he enters upon the work. "When thou art converted," said Christ to St. Peter, "strengthen thy brethren," Luke xxii. 32. The history of David has "taught" us many useful lessons; such as, the frailty of man, the danger of temptation, the torment of sin, the nature and efficacy of repentance, the mercy and the judgments of God, &c. &c.; by which many "sinners" have in all ages since been "converted," and many more will be converted, so long as the Scriptures shall be read, and the 51st Psalm recited in the church. Bp. Horne.

[n] 15. Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord : &c.] The mouth, which sin hath closed, can only be opened by pardon : our Church, with great propriety, daily maketh her prayer in the words of this verse, before she entereth upon that part of her service, which consisteth of praise and thanksgiving. Bp. Horne.

[o] 16. For thou desirest no sacrifice, &c.] David in this Psalm is so evangelical, and has his thoughts so fixed upon Gospel remission, that he considers the Levitical sacrifices as already abolished, for their insufficiency to take away sin; affirming them to be (as indeed they were) nothing in the sight of God, if compared with the sacrifice of the body of sin, offered by contrition and mortification through faith in Him, who, in the fulness of time, was to die unto sin once, that we, together with Him, might for ever live unto God. Bp. Horne.

[p] 19. Then shalt thou be pleased &c.] This had its literal accomplishment, when Jerusalem was finished; when the temple was erected on mount Sion; and when the Lord graciously vouchsafed to accept the sacrifices, there offered on his holy altars, by king Solomon, at the head of his faithful and devout people. It is spiritually true in the Christian church, where the substance of all the Mosaick types and shadows is offered and presented to the Father, by the Prince of Peace, at the head of the Israel of God. And it will be eternally verified in the kingdom of heaven, where the sacrifices of righteousness and love, praise and thanksgiving, will never cease to be offered to Him, that sitteth on the throne, by the church triumphant in glory. Bp. Horne.

[q] Psalm lii.] In the person of Doeg the Edomite, who was the persecutor of David, and the murderer of the priests, are described, 1—5, the enemies of the truth and the church in all ages; whose utter destruction from the presence of the Lord is foretold, 6, with the exultation of the righteous over them, 7, 8; these last rejoice, 9, in the flourishing state under grace, 10, in hope of future glory, through faith and patience. Bp. Horne.

The occasion of this Psalm is to be found in 1 Sam. xxii, where we read, that Doeg, in order to ingratiate himself with Saul, discovered to him those who were confederate with David, particularly Abimelech; and afterwards, at the desire of Saul, murdered the priests of the Lord. Travell.

[r] 1. Why boastest thou thyself, &c.] "The Psalmist thought it strange," says the pious and ingenious Norris, "that any man should value himself for being able to do mischief, when God esteemed it his glory to do good." In vain did Doeg the Edomite boast himself, in the mischief he had done, by massacreing the innocent priests and their families; since "the goodness of God," which is "unchangeable," had decreed the preservation of David. As vainly did Herod, the Idumean, or Edomite, glory in the slaughter of the Bethlehemitish infants, since heaven had determined, that the child Jesus should not be one of the number. A persecution may produce martyrs; but the gates of hell are never to prevail against the church. Bp. Horne.

[s] 6. Therefore shall God destroy thee &c.] If a particular comment be wanted on these words, it may be found in the history of David's enemies, and the crucifiers of the Son of David: but the passage will be fully [u] 9. As for me, &c.] The representative of Messiah pourtrays himself, as the reverse of Doeg and the wicked, in terms applicable likewise to his great original. He was in the house of God, they were in the world; he was as a fruitful olive-tree, they were as barren unprofitable wood; he was to be daily more and more strengthened, established, settled, and increased; they were to be cast down, broken, swept away, and extirpated; and all this, because he had trusted in the mercy of God, they in the abundance of their riches. We Gentiles were branches of the "wild olive," but are now grafted in the good one: Lord, make us to flourish and bear fruit, in thy immortal "courts," world without end! Bp. Horne.

[x] Psalm liii.] This Psalm is in a manner the same with Psalm xiv; for the explanation of the whole, therefore, the reader is referred to the comment on that Psalm. Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm liv.] David, as it has been supposed, when betrayed by the Ziphites, and surrounded by Saul, 1, 2, committeth his cause, and preferreth his prayer, to God; 3, complaineth of his cruel treatment; 4, 5, expresseth his assurance of the divine favour, and the destruction of his enemies: 6, 7, being delivered from his danger, he blesseth and praiseth God. See the history, 1 Sam. xxiii. The application to Christ, and to Christians, is plain and easy; for which reason, our Church hath appointed this Psalm to be read on Good Friday. Bp. Horne.

[z] 3. For strangers are risen up &c.] The Ziphites, though David's countrymen, acted the part of "strangers," or "aliens," in seeking to deliver him up to his unjust and cruel enemy. Such a part did the whole Jewish nation act towards their anointed Prince and Saviour, when they actually delivered Him over to the Roman power. And the church frequently meeteth with such treatment at the hands of her children, as she had reason to expect only from "strangers to the covenant of promise." Something like this always happens, when men, instead of setting God, set the world before their eyes. Bp. Horne.

[a] 4. Behold, God is my helper: &c.] In all dangers and difficulties, whether temporal or spiritual, the faithful sons and servants of God fix their eyes upon their heavenly Father, and gracious Master: they have recourse to the divine promises, the performance of which they know to be certain, and therefore can foresee and foretel the destruction of their enemies. Thus David, and a greater than David, supported themselves in their troubles; and the church, with her children, must do likewise. Bp. Horne.

[b] 6. An offering of a free heart will I give thee, &c.] Saul, under the direction of the Ziphites, having encompassed David on every side, was suddenly called off to defend his country from an invasion of the Philistines; by which means David escaped, and "beheld his enemies" retreating, 1 Sam. xxiii. 27. For this event he offers the sacrifice of a heart freed from fear, and praises the name of his great Deliverer. Christians should follow his example; they should consider, how great things God hath done for them, and should never suffer the voice of praise and thanksgiving to cease in the church of the redeemed. Bp. Horne.

[c] PSALM lv.] David, as it is supposed, when driven out of Jerusalem by the rebellion of Absalom, and in danger of being suddenly cut off, 1—8, maketh his prayer to God, and describeth the sorrowful state of his soul; 9—11, entreateth that the iniquitous counsels of the rebels may be divided and confounded; 12—15, upbraideth Ahithophel, the Judas of those times, with his foul treason; 16—20, foretelleth the tragical end of faction, and his own re-establishment through faith in God, notwithstanding, 21—25, the base treachery of his favourite son and favourite servant. Bp. Horne.

That Absalom's rebellion gave occasion to this Psalm may seem not improbable, when we recollect the particulars of that story, as it is related in 2 Sam. xv. The consternation and distress, expressed in verses 4—8, describe the king's state of mind, when he fled from Jerusalem, and marched weeping up the mount of Olives. The iniquity cast upon the Psalmist answers to the complaints, artfully raised against the king by his son, of a negligent administration of justice, and to the reproach of cruelty cast upon him by Shimei, 2 Sam. xv. 2. 4; and xvi. 7, 8. The companion, the guide, and the familiar friend we find in Ahithophel, the confidential counsellor, first of David, and afterwards of Absalom. The "mouth softer than butter" and the "words smoother than oil" describe the insidious character of Absalom, as it is delineated by the historian, 2 Sam. xv. 5. 9. Still the believers, accustomed to the double edge of the prophetick style, in reading this Psalm, notwithstanding its agreement with the occurrences of David's life, will be led to think of David's great descendant, who endured a bitterer agony, and was the victim of a baser treachery, in the same spot where David is supposed to have uttered these complaints. Bp. Horsley.

[d] 1. Hear my prayer, O God: &c.] In the person of David, driven from his throne, and put in fear of his life, by Absalom and Ahithophel, we here behold our blessed Redeemer, on the day of his sufferings, praying earnestly, and repeating his supplications, as in the garden of Gethsemane, at the prospect of that sea of sorrows which was then about to overwhelm his agonizing soul. In all our afflictions, He was afflicted: in all his afflictions, let us be so. Bp. Horne.

[e] 4. My heart is disquieted &c.] These words describe the state of David's mind, when he went over the brook Cedron, and up mount Olivet, "weeping as he went," and expecting speedily to be cut off, 2 Sam. xv. 23. 30: they describe the agony of the Son of David, when He likewise went over the same brook Cedron, John xviii. 1, at the time of his passion, when his soul was "sore amazed and very heavy, and exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," Mark xiv. 33, 34; and every man will too surely find them applicable to himself, if not often before, yet certainly in, the day when the king of terrors shall draw up all his forces in array against him. Bp. Horne.

[f] 8. I would make haste to escape: &c.] The sentiment is, that he should with more ease provide a shelter against the storms in the wilderness, than against the malice of man in the city. Bp. Horsley.

[g] 9. Destroy their tongues, &c.] In these words, king David beseecheth God to divide, confound, and bring to nothing the counsels of the iniquitous and rampant faction; for so, in the history, we find him saying, "O Lord, I pray thee turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness," 2 Sam. xv. 31. The royal prayer was heard, the counsel of Ahithophel was overthrown by Hushai, and the disappointed traitor became his own executioner. The treason of Judas, against the Son of David, brought him likewise to the same end. Every one, who finds himself tempted to betray the cause of his prince, or his Saviour, should set these two examples before his eyes. Bp. Horne.

[h] 10. Day and night they go about &c.] The violence and strife, mentioned at the conclusion of the preceding verse, are here described as going their rounds, like an armed watch upon the walls, to guard rebellion, which had taken up its residence in the heart of the city from the attacks of loyalty, right, and justice, driven with the king beyond Jordan. Thus from the same city was righteousness afterwards expelled, in the person of the King of righteousness, and nothing left, but "mischief and sorrow, wickedness, deceit, and guile," encompassed with a guard of "violence and strife." Bp. Horne.

[l] 12. For it is not an open enemy, &c.] The many aggravating circumstances of Ahithophel's treason against David, and that of Judas against Christ, are here strongly marked. The treachery of pretended friends is generally to the church, as it was to her Lord, the beginning of sorrows. Ingratitude, malice, and falsehood, are ingredients that must always meet in the composition of a traitor. Bp. Horne.

[k] 16. Let death come hastily upon them, &c.] In these words is predicted the tragical fate of Ahithophel, and those who followed Absalom; of Judas and the Jews; and of all, who shall resemble them in wickedness. The sudden destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who, for stirring up a rebellion against Moses and Aaron, "went down alive into the pit," seems here alluded to as the grand representation of the manner in which the bottomless pit shall one day shut her mouth for ever upon all the impenitent enemies of the true King of Israel, and great High-Priest of our profession. Bp. Horne.

[l] 17. As for me, I will call upon God: &c.] Prayer is the believer's universal medicine for all the disorders of the soul within, and his invincible shield against every enemy that can attack him from without. "Morning, evening, and noon," were three of the hours of prayer in the Jewish church. We find holy Daniel observing them in Babylon, notwithstanding the royal decree, which made it death for him so to do. The event fully justified him, and shewed the power of true devotion, whose high prerogative it still is, to save the righteous from the mouth of the lion. See Dan. vi. 10. 22; 2 Tim. iv. 17; 1 Pet. v. 8. Bp. Horne.

[m] 19. It is he that hath delivered &c.] David was delivered in peace, when, after having repressed the rebellion, he was brought back in triumph to his capital; the Son of David was delivered in peace, when, victorious over the enemies of man's salvation, He arose from the dead, and returned to the Jerusalem above; the believing soul is delivered in peace, when her sins are forgiven, and her corruptions mortified; and the bodies of the saints shall be delivered in peace, at the resurrection of the just. The ground of all these deliverances is one and the same: "they that are with us are more than they that are against us," 2 Kings vi. 16. Greater is "he that is in us, than he that is in the world," 1 John iv. 4. Bp. Horne.

[n] 21. He laid his hands upon such &c.] The prophet goes on to describe the perfidy of traitors, like Ahithophel and Judas. Every wilful and malicious sinner "puts forth his hand against" the person who is "at peace with him," nay, who "made his peace" with the Father; and, by so doing, "breaketh the covenant" into which by baptism he was admitted. O blessed Jesus, how often do we betray thee to thine enemies, our own lusts, and consider it not! Bp. Horne.

[o] 23. O cast thy burden upon the Lord, &c.] The conclusion of the whole matter is, that amidst all dangers and adversities, whensoever they oppress us, we are to put our full trust and confidence only in his mercy, who delivered David, and the Son of David, out of all their troubles. He, who once bore the burden of our sorrows, requested of us, that we would now and ever permit Him to bear the burden of our cares; that, as He knoweth what is best for us, He may provide it accordingly. Bp. Horne.

[p] 24. And as for them: &c.] O terrible voice of most just judgment, pronounced against rebels and murderers! Of the sure and certain execution of his righteous sentence who can doubt, that considers the fate of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; of Absalom, Ahithophel, and Judas; and, above all, of the city which contained within its walls those rebels and murderers of the Son of God? Let us trust for ever in Him alone who can thus deliver, and thus destroy. Bp. Horne.

[q] Psalm lvi.] David, in danger with the Philistines, among whom he was driven, as well as from Saul and his associates, is supposed to, 1, 2, make supplication to God, in whom, 3, 4, he placeth all his hope and confidence, 5—7, of being saved from the wiles and stratagems of the adversary; 8, 9, he comforteth himself with the consideration that God taketh account of his sufferings, and will appear on his behalf; 10, 11, he repeateth the declaration of his faith in the divine promises; and, 12, 13, concludeth with paying his tribute of praise and thanksgiving. What David was in Philistia, the disciples of the Son of David are in the world. Bp. Horne.

[r] 1. Be merciful unto me, O God, &c.] The same words are applicable to the situation and circumstances of David, pursued by his enemies; of Christ, persecuted by the Jews; of the church, afflicted in the world; and of the soul, encompassed by enemies, against whom she is forced to wage perpetual war. Bp. Horne.

[s] 5. They daily mistake my words: &c.] These words could not be more literally descriptive of the behaviour of David's persecutors, than they certainly are of that conduct which the Scribes and Pharisees observed towards our blessed Lord; when, like serpents by the wayside, they "marked his steps," till a proper opportunity offered, to dart from their lurking-place, and "bruise his heel." We think it hard, when men use us in this manner; but surely we either forget that the Son of God was so used before us, or that we are his disciples. Bp. Horne.

[t] 8. Thou tellest my flittings; &c.] As if he had said, Thou knowest all my distresses, and how often I have been forced to wander, like a vagabond, from place to place: O Lord, preserve a kind remembrance of my tears, and let them not be lost as things which thou regardest not. But I need not doubt thy kindness, since thou keepest a register of every tear, and of all my troubles. It has been remarked, that it was the custom in some countries, particularly in the East, to use tear-bottles at funerals. Travell. Known unto God are all the afflictions of his servants, while banished, like David, from their abiding city and country, they "wander" here below, in the land of their pilgrimage. The "tears" of penitents are had in remembrance, and, as so many precious gems, will one day adorn their crowns. How dear, then, in the sight of God, were the "wanderings" and the "tears" of the holy Jesus, submitting to perform penance for those sins which He never committed! Bp. Horne.

[u] 9. Whensoever I call upon thee, &c.] What can we possibly desire more, than this assurance, that, how many, or how formidable, soever our enemies may be, yet there is one always ready to appear in our defence, whose power no creature is able to resist? "This I know," saith David; and had we the faith of David, we should know it too. Bp. Horne.

[x] 10. In God's word will I rejoice: &c.] At the conclusion of this Psalm, and of many others, the prophet speaketh of his deliverance as actually accomplished; he acknowledgeth himself under the obligation of the vows made to God in the night of affliction, which he is resolved to pay on the morning of triumph and jubilee. O come that glorious morning, when the redeemed shall sing eternal praises to the Lord God of their salvation, for having "delivered their souls from death, and their feet from falling, that they may walk before him, in the light of the living!" Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm lvii.] This Psalm is said to have been composed by David, on occasion of his escape from Saul, in the cave at Engedi. See 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. And the Church, by her appointment of it as one of the proper Psalms for Easter-day, hath instructed us to transfer the ideas to the resurrection of Christ from the grave. The Psalm containeth, 1—4, an act of faith in the promises; 5, a description of grievous sufferings; 6, a refuge, until this tyranny be overpast. (these calamities. Bib. Trans.)

2 I will call unto the most high God[a]: even unto the God that shall perform the cause which I have in hand.

3 He shall send from heaven: and save me from the reproof of him that would eat me up. (reproach. Bib. Trans. See Vocab.)

4 God shall send forth his mercy and truth: my soul is among lions[b].

5 And I lie even among the children of men, that are set on fire: whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword.

6 Set up thyself, O God, above the heavens[c]: and thy glory above all the earth. (Be thou exalted. Bib. Trans.)

7 They have laid a net for my feet[d], and pressed down my soul: they have digged a pit before me, and are fallen into the midst of it themselves.

8 My heart is fixed[e], O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing, and give praise. (or prepared. Bib. Trans. Mary.)

9 Awake up, my glory[f]; awake, lute and harp: I myself will awake right early. (my tongue. See Ps. xvi. 10, note.)

10 I will give thanks[g] unto thee, O Lord, among the people: and I will sing unto thee among the nations.

11 For the greatness of thy mercy reacheth unto the heavens: and thy truth unto the clouds.

12 Set up thyself, O God, above the heavens: and thy glory above all the earth. (Be thou exalted. Bib. Trans.) prayer for the exaltation of God's glory, which is repeated again at the conclusion; 7, a prediction of judgment on the adversary; 8—11, a strain of the highest exultation and jubilee. Bp. Horne.

The composition of this Psalm is remarkably elegant. It begins in a plaintive strain, imploring aid, and expressing deep distress and extreme danger: when suddenly, in the 8th verse, in the sure prospect of the divine assistance, the strain is changed to notes of praise and triumph, as over an enemy already fallen. Bp. Horsley.

[z] 1. Be merciful unto me, &c.] David, encompassed by his enemies at Engedi, putteth up this prayer to God; the same prayer we may suppose to have been used by our blessed Lord, when drawing near to the grave, and gate of death: and the Church ever continueth the use of it, until she be delivered from the bondage of corruption. In the mean time, she teacheth her children to put themselves, living and dying, under the protection of Him who is always ready to "gather them, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings." There they may rest in peace and security. Bp. Horne.

[a] 2. I will call unto the most high God: &c.] David cried unto God, and was delivered out of the hand of Saul; the Son of David cried unto God, and was delivered from the power of the grave: the saints on earth cry unto God, and shall be delivered out of their troubles; the souls under the altar in heaven cry unto God, Rev. vi. 10; and shall obtain a reunion with their bodies. Thus God "performeth all things for us," as well as for David. Bp. Horne.

[b] 4. — my soul is among lions, &c.] The fiercest of beasts, the most devouring of elements, and the sharpest of military weapons, are selected to represent the power and fury of David's enemies. How much stronger and more furious, were the enemies of Christ, who, in the day of his passion, resembled Daniel in the lions' den, the three children in the fiery furnace, and who stood alone, exposed to the assaults of men and evil spirits! Bp. Horne.

[c] 6. Set up thyself, O God, above the heavens: &c.] God is exalted and glorified among men by the display of mercy and judgment, in the salvation of his children from the hands of their enemies. But chiefly was He exalted, when, having raised up his Son Jesus, He set Him at his own right hand, far above all principalities and powers, and every thing that is named in heaven and in earth. This was the great exaltation, prefigured, foretold, and incessantly prayed for, in the ancient church. Bp. Horne.

[d] 7. They have laid a net for my feet, &c.] David compares himself, 1 Sam. xxvi. 20, to a bird upon the mountains, which the fowler endeavoureth to hunt into the nets and snares set up and prepared for its destruction. So was the most innocent dove, the holy Jesus, persecuted by the Jews until they had driven Him into the snares of death, and laid Him low in the grave. But the enemies of both received, in the end, the due reward of their deeds, and "fell into the pit they had digged." Bp. Horne.

[e] 8. My heart is fixed, &c.] At the prospect of approaching deliverance, the prophet, in the person of Christ, declareth his heart to be fixed and established, stedfast and unmoveable in the midst of trouble, even then preparing to celebrate its future enlargement with songs of praise. Bp. Horne.

[f] 9. Awake up, my glory; &c.] For this purpose, he calls upon his tongue, with all his instruments of musick, all the organs of the body and affections of the soul, to unite their powers in sweetest harmony and concert, and to awaken the sluggish morning with the voice of melody, sounding forth the glories of redemption. Thus should the morning be ever celebrated, on which Christ "arose from the dead, and became the first fruits of them that slept." Bp. Horne.

[g] 10. I will give thanks &c.] The resurrection of Jesus from the grave, foreshadowed in the deliverance of David from the hand of Saul, was a transaction which caused the heavens, and all the powers therein, to extol the mercy and the truth of God. The nations of the earth, whose are the benefits and the blessings of that transaction, are, therefore, bound evermore to make it the subject of their praises and thanksgivings; which is done by the members of our Church every Easter-day, in the words of this very Psalm. Bp. Horne.

[h] PSALM lviii.] This Psalm of David is a contemplation of the injustice and incorrigible wickedness of men, especially of his enemies, that exasperated Saul against him; together with God's unexpected speedy vengeance on them. Dr. Hammond. In the persons of Saul and his iniquitous counsellors, the enemies of Christ and the church, 1, 2, are reproved, and, 3—5, their malice is described, by comparing it to the poison of serpents, which are proof against every art made use of to tame them: 6—8, the destruction of the wicked is foretold and illustrated by six similitudes; 9, the triumph of the righteous is likewise predicted; as also, 10, the effect it will produce, in manifesting to all the world the providence and glory of God. Bp. Horne.

[i] 1. Are your minds set upon righteousness, &c.] The proceedings of Doeg, and other associates of Saul, against David; those of Judas and the Sanhedrim against our Lord; and those of wicked princes, and court sycophants, in different ages, against the faith and the church; as they spring from the same principles, so they flow pretty much in the same channel. Such men may here see their characters drawn, and their end foretold. Bp. Horne.

[k] 3. The ungodly are froward, &c.] The tares, sown by the enemy in human nature, appear early; and shew us how far we are estranged from original truth and righteousness. Bp. Horne. The meaning is, as soon as they are by age and understanding and use of their faculties qualified for sinning, which is not many months after their birth, they do actually fall into sin, and accordingly grow up in it without reformation. Dr. Hammond.

[l] 4. They are as venomous &c.] The wicked are here compared to serpents, for that malignity in their tempers, which is the venom and poison of the intellectual world. And whereas there are some kinds even of serpents, which, by musical sounds, may, for a time, as it is said, be disarmed of their rage, and rendered so tame as to be handled without danger; yet the evil dispositions of some men, like those of one particular species of the serpentine race, are often invincible. The enmity of a Saul was proof against the heavenly strains of the son of Jesse; and He, who spake as "never man spake," was stung to death by "a generation of vipers." Bp. Horne.

[m] 6. Break their teeth, O God, &c.] The destruction of the wicked is represented under six similitudes. The first is that of breaking the teeth of lions, being the most terrible weapons of the most terrible animals. But what is human power, at its highest exaltation, if compared to that of God? Bp. Horne.

[n] — let them fall away like water &c.] The second similitude, used to illustrate the destruction of the wicked, is that of torrents and inundations, which descend with great noise from the mountains, and cover the face of a country; but their cause soon ceasing to act, they run off and appear no more; herein affording a fine emblem of the weakness and instability of earthly power. The impotence of human efforts against divine counsels is compared, thirdly, to a man drawing a bow, when the arrow on the string is broken in two; and therefore, instead of flying to the mark, falls useless at his feet. Bp. Horne.

[o] 7. Let them consume away like a snail, &c.] A snail, which, coming forth of his shell, marks his path with slime, continually losing some part of his substance in his progress; and an abortion, which consumes away in the like manner: these are the fourth and fifth images, selected to represent the transient nature of worldly greatness, still wasting, till it comes to nothing; and the miserable fate of those, who perish, with their half-formed devices, nor ever behold the Sun of Righteousness. Bp. Horne.

[p] 8. Or ever your pots be made hot &c.] Without any delay, as a pot is set boiling by the strong heat of a fire of thorns, let the divine vengeance fret and torment them, as an inflammation rankles a wound. Dr. Nicholls. By the proverbial expression in the first clause of this verse, the Psalmist describes the sudden eruption of the divine wrath: sudden and violent, as the ascension of the dry bramble under the housewife's pot. The brightness of the flame which this material furnishes, the height to which it mounts in an instant, the fury with which it seems to rage on all sides of the vessel, give force and even sublimity to the image, though taken from one of the commonest occurrences of the lowest life. Bp. Horsley.

[q] 9. The righteous shall rejoice &c.] The victories of that just One, gained in his own person and in those of his faithful servants, over the enemies of man's salvation, are productive of a joy, which springeth not from love of revenge, but is inspired by a view of the divine mercy, justice, and truth, displayed in the redemption of the elect, the punishment of the ungodly, and the accomplishment of the promises. Whoever duly weigheth and considereth these things, will diligently seek after the reward of righteousness, and humbly adore the providence, which ordereth all things aright, in heaven and earth. Bp. Horne.

[r] Psalm lix.] This Psalm is said to have been composed on occasion of David's escape, when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him. See 1 Sam. xix. 11—18. David, in these, as in many other circumstances of his life, may be considered as the representative of Messiah. 1, 2, praying to be delivered from the power of his blood-thirsty enemies, whose indefatigable malice he, 3—7, describes: but 8—10, predicts his own enlargement through the tender mercy and mighty power of God; as also, 11—15, the singular vengeance to be poured out upon his enemies, for their punishment, and the admonition of others. The Psalm concludes with a strain of exultation and thanksgiving. Bp. Horne.

[s] 1. Deliver me from mine enemies, &c.] In these words we hear the voice of David, when a prisoner in his own house; the voice of Christ, when surrounded by his merciless enemies; the voice of the church, when under bondage in the world; and the voice of the Christian, when under temptation, affliction, and persecution. Bp. Horne.

[t] 5. Stand up, O Lord God of hosts, &c.] The prophet, in this verse, seemeth to respect that great day of final retribution, which is to succeed the day of grace, the accepted time of repentance and pardon. For then it is that Jehovah shall awake, to judge the nations; to reward every man according to his deeds; and to banish for ever, from his presence, the impenitent workers of iniquity. The malicious adversaries of David, and those of the Son of David, may not then find the mercy, so often by them rejected, in the days of their flesh. Bp. Horne.

[u] 6. They go to and fro &c.] The emissaries of Saul, coming after David in the "evening," besetting his house, and blocking up the avenues, are compared to a set of hungry blood-hounds in quest of their prey. But the picture is drawn likewise for that herd of evening wolves who thirsted after the blood of the Lamb of God, on whom their mouths were opened, crying, "Crucify him! crucify him!" Bp. Horne.

[x] — like a dog, &c.] The allusion to dogs is illustrated by the circumstance, that those animals, though not usually admitted into the houses, abound very much in the streets, of Eastern cities. Travell.

[y] 7. Behold, they speak with their mouth, &c.] Out of the abundance of malice in the heart, the mouth will speak, like the cutting of a sword; and the wicked take counsel against the just, as if there were no one above who heard and regarded. Bp. Horne.

[z] 8. But thou, O Lord, &c.] These very expressions are used in the 4th verse of the 2nd Psalm, to denote the futility of all the counsels entered into, by Jew and Gentile, against Messiah and his church. The Psalm before us seems evidently to relate to the same counsels, against the same blessed Person, whatever part of king David's history might be the occasion of its being composed. Bp. Horne.

[a] 11. Slay them not, &c.] The prophet, in the person of Messiah, predicted the singular fate of the Jews; who, for their sins, were not extirpated, lest the Gentile Christians should "forget" their punishment, but were "scattered" among all nations, and degraded from the glorious privileges of that high rank in which they once stood. Thus doth that people remain, at this day, a monument of God's vengeance against apostasy; a beacon, set up and kindled by the hand of Heaven, as a warning to all Christian churches, that they split not on the same fatal rock. Bp. Horne.

Jerome rightly conceives, that this passage alludes to the punishment of the Jewish nation, dispersed but not extinguished. Bp. Horsley.

[b] 12. For the sin of their mouth, &c.] That dreadful word, "His blood be on us and on our children." Bp. Horsley. The causes of the Jews' dispersion are here assigned, namely, "the sin of their mouth" in the "words of their lips," or their "hard speeches," spoken against the Son of God; their slanders, lying accusations, and outrageous blasphemies, together with that in Jacob, and unto the ends of the world.

14 And in the evening they will return[d]: grin like a dog, and will go about the city.

15 They will run here and there for meat: and grudge if they be not satisfied.

17 Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing: for thou, O God, art my refuge, and my merciful God.

horrid imprecation in which they involved their descendants; who have groaned under the weight of it for these 1700 years, and yet still continue to justify the deeds of their fathers, retaining that "pride" in their name, and long since forfeited privileges, which provoked the Romans to destroy their city and country. Bp. Horne.

[c] 13. Consume them in thy wrath, &c.] This prediction was accomplished in the total subversion of Jerusalem by Titus, when the Jews having no longer any city, temple, or civil polity, ceased to "be," as a nation. And they have seen enough to have convinced them, that God is the God "not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles also." The Gospel hath been preached, idolatry hath been overthrown, the nations have been converted to the faith of Abraham, and that of David, whose Psalms are used throughout the world; and God, who "ruled in Jacob, and was known in Jewry," now is known and ruleth "unto the ends of the earth;" for they have "seen the salvation," and submitted to the sceptre, of King Messiah. Bp. Horne.

[d] 14. And in the evening they will return: &c.] The punishment inflicted on the wicked often carries the mark of their crime. It is just that they, who have thirsted after the blood of the righteous, should want a drop of water to cool their tongues; and the hunger of a dog is deservedly their plague, of whom a resemblance of that unclean animal's disposition hath been the sin. Such is the present condition of the Jews, excluded from the church, and suffering all the calamities of a spiritual famine; and such will be the condition of all those who are to wail and lament in vain, without the holy city, for evermore. Rev. xxii. 15. Bp. Horne.

[e] 16. As for me, I will sing &c.] While the wicked murmur and repine at the dispensations of Heaven, the righteous are employed in giving thanks and praises for the same; and the "morning" which is to consign the former to the habitations of despair, where no sounds are heard but those of hideous wailings and horrid blasphemies, shall transport the latter to the mansions of felicity, resounding with incessant hallelujahs. Bp. Horne.

[f] Psalm lx.] This Psalm is thought to have been composed by David, when, after his coming to the throne, the tribes of Israel had submitted to his sceptre, and he was engaged in the reduction of the adjacent countries. See the history, 2 Sam. v. and viii. 1—3, He describes what Israel had lately suffered from foreign enemies, and domestick feuds; 4—6, he declareth himself appointed to conduct his people to victory and triumph, according to a divine prediction; 7, he rejoiceth in the accession of the other tribes to that of Judah, and, 8—12, sees Edom, Moab, and Philistia, already subdued by the mighty power of God. All this is now to be spiritually applied, in the Christian church, to the establishment and enlargement of Messiah's kingdom, prefigured by that of David. Bp. Horne.

[g] 1. O God, thou hast cast us out, &c.] When the church, by her sins, hath rejected God, she is rejected by Him; she is delivered into the hands of her enemies, and suffers persecution: when, by repentance and supplication, she returneth to Him, He is ready to meet and receive her. The history of Israel is one continued exemplification of these most interesting truths. It should be the care and endeavour of every church, and every individual, to profit thereby. Bp. Horne.

[h] 3. Thou hast shewed thy people heavy things: &c.] The Israelites had not only suffered "hard things" from their professed enemies the Philistines, by the overthrow of Saul and his army, but their civil dissensions at home shewed that they had drunk deep of the bitter cup of infatuation. See 1 Sam. xxxi. and 2 Sam. ii. and iii. From these two sources flow the calamities of churches and of kingdoms in all ages, whensoever it pleaseth God to visit their transgressions upon them by the instrumentality of men. Bp. Horne.

[i] 4. Thou hast given a token &c.] For the temporal salvation of Israel, God raised up David, according to his promise; to whose standard, as a centre of unity, the worshippers of the true God might resort. For the spiritual and eternal salvation of the church, God raised up his Son Jesus, according to his promise, and "displayed the banner of the cross," under which believers are enlisted, and led on to triumph, "because of the truth." Remarkable to this purpose are the words of Isaiah: "In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest," after the battle is over, and the victory gained, "shall be glorious," Isa. xi. 10. Bp. Horne.

[k] 6. God hath spoken in his holiness, &c.] Or, by his holy one. As a ground of hope and confidence, David here declares, that God, by the mouth of an holy prophet, had spoken and promised him the successes for which he prayed in the foregoing verse. And that this was known among the people, appears from a speech of Abner to the elders of Israel, 2 Sam. iii. 18, "The Lord hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies." Having, therefore, mentioned this prediction, much of which was already accomplished, he exults as a conqueror, resolving to divide into districts, and portion out under proper officers, the country about Samaria, now become his own. Bp. Horne.

[l] 7. Gilead is mine, &c.] "Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim," and the other tribes of Israel, upon the death of Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, whom Abner had set over them, joined the royal tribe of Judah, and came in, with one accord, to the house of David. See 2 Sam. ii. 8, and v. 1, "Ephraim," as a tribe abounding in valiant men, is styled by its prince, "the strength of his head," or the support of his life and kingdom; and "Judah," as the seat of empire, replenished with men of wisdom and understanding, qualified to assist the throne by their salutary counsels, is dignified with the title of "lawgiver." Thus are the tribes of the spiritual "Israel" subject to Messiah, and serve Him in various capacities, as the Spirit furnishes different men with different powers: some being endued with zeal and fortitude, to labour and suffer; others with knowledge and discretion, to instruct and govern. Bp. Horne.

[m] 8. Moab is my wash-pot; &c.] After having mentioned the submission of the Israelitish tribes to his sceptre, David predicts the extension of his kingdom over the neighbouring nations, those inveterate enemies of the people of God; such as the Moabites, the Edomites, and, above all, the Philistines. The absolute reduction of these nations under his dominion is expressed metaphorically, by the phrases of "making them his wash-pot, and extending his shoe, that is, setting his foot," upon them. The Son of David also must "reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet," 1 Cor. xv. 25. And the Christian, in these words, now declareth his hope of being enabled to do the same; to conquer through his Lord, and to triumph with Him. Bp. Horne.

[n] 9. Who will lead me into the strong city: &c.] Bozrah, the capital of Idumea, or "Edom," was a fortified town, situated on a rock, deemed impregnable. See Obad. ver. 3. Considering therefore the strength of the adversary, David, by this question, acknowledgeth his own impotency, and the need he had of superior aid, in order to achieve this important conquest. How great need, then, have we of an Almighty Saviour, who may enable us to overcome our last and strongest enemy, death! And it is very remarkable, that Christ's victory over this very enemy is set forth, by the prophet Isaiah, under the striking image of a king of Israel, returning in triumph from the reduction of Idumea. "Who is this, that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?" &c. Isa. lxiii. 1. Bp. Horne.

[o] 10. Hast not thou &c.] The question in the last verse, "Who will bring me into Edom?" is here answered by another question, "Wilt not thou, O God?" &c.; that is, to whom can we have recourse, for assistance, but to thee, O God? Deserted by thee, we fall; but do thou go forth with us, and we shall again rise superior to every enemy. So saith the Christian soldier: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life;" "Thou hast overcome the sharpness of death, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers." Bp. Horne.

[p] 11. O be thou our help &c.] David, like a wise and pious prince, acknowledgeth the weakness of the fleshly arm, and strengtheneth himself in the Lord his God. Much more ought we to confess the impotence of nature, and to implore the succours of grace; that so we may happily accomplish our spiritual warfare, tread Satan under our feet, and triumph finally over the last enemy, death himself. Bp. Horne.

[q] PSALM lxi.] In the person of David, for a while driven into exile, and then restored to his kingdom, we here behold the church, or any member thereof, 1—3, preferring a petition for deliverance from the troubles and temptations of this mortal state; 4, 5, expressing faith and hope in God; 6, 7, praying for the prosperity and perpetuity of Messiah's kingdom; and, 8, resolving to praise God evermore for the same. Bp. Horne.

[r] 3. —for thou hast been my hope, &c.] Meditation on God our Saviour, as set forth in the Scriptures, will ever prove, to the believer, "a strong tower" or fortress, in which he will be safe from the darts of the enemy, and will be furnished with impregnable arguments, wherewith to oppose and blunt the force of every temptation which Satan can launch against his soul. Bp. Horne.

[s] 4. I will dwell in thy tabernacle &c.] They, who sojourn in the "tabernacle" of the church militant on earth, and continue faithful members of the same, shall take up their eternal residence in that permanent "temple," the church triumphant in heaven. Below, they are protected by the all-shadowing "wing" of God's fatherly providence; above, they will be rewarded with the all-illuminating vision of his glorious presence. Bp. Horne.

[t] 5. For thou, O Lord, hast heard my desires:] Or "vows." The "vows" of David, made during his banishment, were heard, and he was restored to the possession of his kingdom, in that land which God had given to his people, for an "heritage." The vows of Messiah, made in the days of his pilgrimage, were heard, and He hath re-assumed his ancient throne in the heavenly Jerusalem. The prayers of the faithful, made in the land where they are in exile, are heard, and their spirits shall return to God, who will "give them the heritage of those that fear his name." Bp. Horne.

[u] 6 Thou shalt grant the King a long life: &c.] Thou shalt bless me with a long and prosperous life, and therein make me a type of the Messiah, whose kingdom, when it commences, shall have no end. Dr. Hammond. The King is evidently the Messiah. Bp. Horsley. These words must be applied to Him, of whom it was said by the angel, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Luke i. 32. The ancient church prayed for "his" exaltation and glory, under those of his representative; nay, the Chaldee paraphrast expounds this passage of Messiah only: "Thou shalt add days to the days of King Messias; his years shall be as the generation of this world, and of the world to come." Nor can a better paraphrase be easily devised. Bp. Horne.

[x] 8. So will I always sing praise &c.] For the preservation and prosperity, the exaltation, the power, and the everlasting glory of Christ's kingdom, with all the benefits and blessings thereof, we are bound to sing praise unto God's holy name for ever, and daily to perform the vows made in baptism, that we would believe in Him, and serve Him, all the days of our life; until the blessed day shall dawn, which no night is to follow, when faith shall end in vision, and duty be resolved into praise. Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm lxii.] There are no petitions nor thanksgivings in this Psalm; but expressions of David's faith and confidence in God, and exhortations to all other persons to place all their confidence in God only. Bp. Patrick. This Psalm containeth, 1, 2, a resolution to trust in God alone; 3, 4, a denunciation of judgment against the persecutors of the just One; 5—7, a repeated act of faith, and resolution to trust in God, with, 8, an exhortation to all nations to do the same; and that, 9, 10, because there is no confidence to be placed in man, or in the world; but only, 11, in the divine power, and, 12, mercy. Bp. Horne.

[z] 1. My soul truly waiteth still upon God: &c.] David, in the midst of trouble, and perhaps tempted to have recourse to sinful expedients for his preservation, determined still to repose all his confidence on the promised mercy of Him who is the "salvation," the "rock," and the "high place," or fortress of men. Christ would not be delivered from his sufferings, by any other means than those which the Father had ordained. The church, in like manner, should patiently wait for the salvation of God, and not attempt, through distrust of the divine mercy, to save herself by unwarrantable methods, of her own devising. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3. How long will ye imagine mischief &c.] From a declaration of his trust in God, the prophet passeth to an expostulation with his enemies, for continually plotting against him; and foretelleth, that their destruction will happen suddenly and irremediably, like the downfal of a wall that is out of the perpendicular, or a stone fence, the parts of which are not cemented together. See Isa. xxx. 13. How striking is this expostulation, and this prediction, if considered as addressed by Messiah to his implacable enemies! Bp. Horne.

[b] — like a broken hedge.] A shaken fence; that is, you are yourselves upon the verge of ruin, while ye are busied in these wicked plots. This was remarkably the case with the Jewish people at the time when our Lord was the object of their malice. Bp. Horsley.

[c] 4. Their device is only &c.] The adversaries of David "consulted" how to deprive him of those honours to which God designed to exalt him; the Scribes and Pharisees took counsel against Jesus, with the same intent; and to rob the Christian of the glory and immortality prepared for him, is the end of every temptation which the enemy throws in his way, whether it be of the terrifying, or, which oftener succeeds, the flattering, alluring, and deceiving kind. Bp. Horne.

[d] 8. O put your trust in him &c.] The comforts, which David had found, he exhorteth others to seek, in faith and prayer; in such a faith as fixeth itself on God, when the whole world is against it; and such prayer, as poureth forth all the desires of the soul into the bosom of the Almighty. How often in repeating the Psalms, do we declare, that "God is our refuge;" yet how very seldom do we recur to Him, as such, in the hour of temptation! Bp. Horne.

[e] 11. God spake once, &c.] In opposition to the vain boasts of worldly men, trusting in their riches, &c., is cited the declaration of God, when, from mount Sinai, He proclaimed Himself to be Jehovah, the fountain of all "power," in heaven above, and on earth beneath, jealous of the glory of this attribute, ready to avenge Himself on the wicked, and able to abase the pride of man. At the same time also, He proclaimed Himself "the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin," Exod. xxxiv. 6. To all mankind, therefore, the prophet here recommendeth meditation on these two most interesting subjects, the "power" of God to punish sin, and his "mercy" to pardon it. Fear of the former will beget desire of the latter, and both together will set a man upon doing works worthy of their parent faith; works, which God, of his infinite "mercy," for the sake of Christ, has graciously promised to accept, and to "reward." Bp. Horne.

[f] Psalm lxiii.] David, in the wilderness of Judah, expresseth, 1—3, his longing desire after the presence of God, and the divine pleasures of the sanctuary; 4—7, he blesseth and praiseth God both day and night, in the midst of affliction, and, 8, 9, declareth his faith to be immoveable; 10, 11, he predicteth the fate of the wicked, with, 12, the exaltation, triumph, and glory of Messiah, to be exhibited in his own. The whole Psalm is applicable to the circumstances of Christ in the flesh, and to those of his people in the world. Bp. Horne.

[g] 3. Thus have I looked for thee in holiness: &c.] With the like eagerness have I expected to wait upon thee again near thy "holiness" or sanctuary; and that I may behold thy ark, where thy majestick power and glory does most eminently reside. Dr. Nicholls. After the example of the persecuted David in the wilderness of Judah, and that of the afflicted Jesus upon earth, the true Christian dedicates to God "the sweet hour of prime;" he opens the eyes of his understanding, together with those of his body, and awakes, each morning, to righteousness. He arises with an inextinguishable thirst after those comforts which the world cannot give; and has immediate recourse, by prayer, to the fountain of the water of life; ever longing to behold the divine power and glory, in the sanctuary above, of which he has been favoured with some glimpse in the services of the church below. Bp. Horne.

[h] 4. For thy loving-kindness &c.] "Life" is the greatest of earthly blessings, all others being included in it; "all that a man hath," saith Satan, "will he give for his life," Job ii. 4. Not so the Psalmist. He knew a pearl of far greater price, namely, the "loving-kindness" of Jehovah, on which is suspended not only the life which now is, but that which is to come. The sense of this loving-kindness tuned the harp of the son of Jesse, and now tunes those of the spirits before the throne. Bp. Horne.

[i] 6. My soul shall be satisfied, &c.] Solitude and stillness render the "night watches" a fit season for meditation on the so often experienced mercies of God; which, when thus called to remembrance, become a delicious repast to the spirit, filling it with all joy and peace and consolation; giving songs in the night, and making darkness itself cheerful. How cheerful, then, will be that last morning, when the righteous, awaking up after the divine likeness, shall be "satisfied" with all the fulness of God, and "praise him with joyful lips," in those eternal courts, where there is no night, and from whence sorrow and sighing fly far away! Bp. Horne.

[k] 8. Because thou hast been my helper: &c.] Recollection of past mercies inclines the soul to put herself under the "wing" of an all-shadowing Providence. Should her Redeemer, for a time, seem to be deserting her, faith constraineth her to "follow hard after him," as a child doth after the father; and not to let go the PSALM lxv.[s] Te decet hymnus.

THOU, O God, art praised in Sion[t]: and unto thee shall the vow be performed in Jerusalem.

"hand" which hath so often "upholden" her from falling. Bp. Horne.

[l] 10. These also that seek the hurt of my soul: &c.] The enemies of Jehovah, and his Anointed, if they come not to a violent death, an early grave, or to have their carcasses devoured by the beasts of the field (as hath sometimes been the case), yet, in an after-state, their condition will certainly be deplorable. Their habitation must be in the "pit;" their punishment, the flaming "sword" of almighty vengeance; and their companions, those crafty and malicious ones, who, having contributed to seduce, will help to torment them. Bp. Horne.

[m] 12. But the King shall rejoice &c.] If David found cause to rejoice in God, who gave him the victory over all his enemies; if the subjects of David might well glory in their king; if the slanderers of David were put to silence, at beholding him exalted to the throne of Israel; how much greater is the joy of Messiah in the Godhead, giving the manhood victory over his enemies, sin, death, and hell; how much rather may his subjects and worshippers glory in their triumphant King; and how much more shall the blasphemers of such a Saviour be everlastingly confounded, when they shall behold Him invested with all the power and majesty of the Father, and seated on the throne of judgment! Surely, then, "the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped." Bp. Horne.

[n] Psalm lxiv.] This, which is a Psalm of David, is a prayer for deliverance, with a just complaint of his enemies, and a prediction of God's signal destructions upon them. Dr. Hammond. The Psalmist, in the person of Messiah, 1, 2, prayeth to be delivered from his enemies, from their counsels and insurrections; 3, 4, he describeth their calumnies and slanders, their scoffs and blasphemies, and, 5, 6, their indefatigable malice; predicting, 7—9, their astonishing fall, with, 10, the exaltation of the church, in God her Saviour. Bp. Horne.

[o] 2. Hide me from the gathering together &c.] The "counsels and insurrections" of the Israelites against David; of the same people, afterwards, against the Son of David; of worldly and wicked men against the church; and of the powers of darkness against us all; are here, respectively, understood to be deprecated. Bp. Horne.

[p] 7. But God shall suddenly shoot at them &c.] While the enemies of the "just One" were shooting in secret at Him, He that dwelleth in the heavens was levelling an arrow at them, and one which would not fail to take place. It accordingly did so; and the direful imprecations of "their own tongues fell," in unexampled vengeance, on the heads of them, and their children, who continued to justify the deeds of their fathers. All would "flee away" from the punishment of Jerusalem; let all then depart from the sins which occasioned it. Bp. Horne.

[q] 9. And all men that see it shall say, &c.] It is remarkable that the desolation of the once holy and beloved city filled "all men with fear" and astonishment, forcing them to acknowledge and "declare" it to be the "work of God." Even Titus, the Roman emperor, confessed that he had fought, and conquered, by the favour, and under the direction, of heaven. O that men would "wisely consider" of this, and other wonderful works of the Almighty! Bp. Horne.

[r] 10. The righteous shall rejoice &c.] As sorrow, sooner or later, will be the portion of Messiah's enemies, so joy is the high privilege of his friends and disciples. "The righteous" man alone can be truly glad, because he alone can be glad "in the Lord" Jesus, the object of all his confidence. There was light in Goshen, when darkness covered the Egyptians: the Christian church drank the cup of salvation, when that of vengeance was mingled for Jerusalem: and, when the empire of Satan shall fall, heaven will resound with Hallelujahs. Bp. Horne.

[a] Psalm lxv.] The design of this Psalm of David seems to be to declare the great and glorious work of Divine Providence, both towards his church, and the land of his people, and towards the rest of mankind. Poole. In this Psalm God is praised for his providential government of the material world. It seems to have been a thanksgiving for the getting in of the fruits of the earth, and might be composed for the feast of tabernacles. But considering the manifest allusion to redemption, and the conversion of the Gentiles, in the former part of the Psalm, I cannot but think that the blessings of the Gospel are adumbrated under the image of genial showers, and luxuriant crops. Bp. Horsley.

In this very lovely song of Sion, the prophet treats, 1, of the praise due to Jehovah, for, 2, his mercy in hearing the prayers of his servants, and, 3, in redeeming them from their sins; 4, he declareth the blessedness of the elect in Christ their head; 5, predicteth the wonderful things which God would do for the salvation of men, by that power, which, 6, 7, established the mountains, and confined the sea within its bounds; 8, foretelleth the conversion of the nations; and, 9—14, describeth the blessed effects of the Spirit poured out upon the church, under the figure of rain, descending upon a dry ground. Bp. Horne.

[t] 1. Thou, O God, art praised in Sion: &c.] The obligations of "praise and thanksgiving" were formerly offered, and all "vows" were paid in the temple on mount "Sion." At Jerusalem was performed the promise of man's redemption by the sacrifice of the Son of God; since which event, and the call of the Gentiles, the Christian church has been the holy city and temple. In our communion we are to offer up our devotions, and to perform the vow made in baptism; until we come to the heavenly Sion, to pay our vows, with the church triumphant, in everlasting hymns of praise. Bp. Horne.

[u] 2. Thou that hearest the prayer: &c.] The prophet here foretels, that, on account of God's mercy, in hearing the prayers of his people, "all flesh," that is, all mankind, out of every nation, should "come" at his gracious call, and make their supplications before Him in his church. And to whom should "all flesh come" but to Him that "heareth prayer?" Bp. Horne.

[x] 5. Thou shalt shew us wonderful things &c.] The ancient church foretelleth, that God would "answer" her prayers for the coming of Messiah, "by wonderful things in righteousness;" which was brought to pass, by the death and resurrection of Christ, the overthrow of idolatry, and the conversion of the nations. Then "the God of salvation" became "the confidence of all the ends of the earth," and the inhabitants of the most distant "island" believed in Jesus. By "wonderful things in righteousness," will the prayers of the church, which now is, be answered at the second manifestation of the Son of God in the glory of his Father. Bp. Horne.

[y] 6, 7. Who in his strength setteth fast &c.] The power, which originally fixed the foundations of the "mountains," and which, from time to time, controls the "waves" of the sea, is engaged in the support and preservation of the church; and will never suffer the "waves" of this troublesome world to overwhelm the "mountain of his holiness." Bp. Horne.

[z] 8. They also that dwell &c.] The "tokens," or signs, mentioned in this verse, are the exertions of divine power and mercy, called above, "wonderful things in righteousness;" which at the publication of the Gospel, produced a saving "fear" of God among the nations, "dwelling in the uttermost parts of the earth." "The isles," saith Isaiah on the same occasion, "saw it, and feared; the ends of the earth were afraid; they drew near and came," Isa. xli. 5. And then it was, that the "outgoings of the morning and evening," all the inhabitants of the earth, as many as experienced the sweet vicissitudes of day and night, of morning and evening, were "made to rejoice" in God their Saviour; whose name was praised, from the rising to the setting sun. Bp. Horne.

[a] 9. Thou visitest the earth, &c.] Under the beautiful image of a once barren and dry land, rendered fruitful by kindly showers of rain, turning dearth into plenteousness, are represented here (as in Isa. xxxv, and numberless other places) the gracious "visitation" of the church by the Spirit; the "riches" of grace and mercy, poured upon the hearts of men, from the exhaustless "river of God;" and the bountiful provision made thereby, for the relief of that spiritual famine which had been sore in all lands. See Isa. iv. 10; Rev. xxii. 1 ; Amos viii. 11. Bp. Horne.

[b] 13. — the little hills shall rejoice &c.] Such passions and actions as these are often figuratively ascribed to lifeless creatures, both in sacred and profane poetical writings : which are said to "rejoice" or "mourn" and the like, when their condition is such as calls for rejoicing or mourning, and would cause them to do so, if they were capable of such actions. Poole.

[c] 14. The folds shall be full of sheep : &c.] The happy effects of God's visiting the earth with rain, are valleys covered with corn, verdant meads, and thriving flocks. All these ideas, in the prophetical Scriptures, are frequently transferred to the times of refreshment and consolation, of peace and fruitfulness, in the church ; which breaks forth into joy, in the one case, as the world is always ready to do in the other. Manifold and marvellous, O Lord, are thy works, whether of nature or of grace ; surely in wisdom and loving-kindness hast thou made them all ; the earth, in every sense, is full of thy riches ! Bp. Horne.

[d] Psalm lxvi.] In this Psalm the prophet, 1, exciteth all the world to sing the praises of God ; 2, 3, the power and universality of his kingdom ; 4—11, the deliverance of the church from various afflictions and temptations ; for which, 12, 13, we are to offer the sacrifices which had been vowed ; 14—17, to declare the mercies and loving-kindnesses of the Lord towards us ; and, 18, to bless his holy name continually. Bp. Horne. The author and time of the composing of this Psalm are uncertain. Poole.

[e] 1. O be joyful in God, all ye lands : &c.] The holy church, throughout all the world, is here called upon to lift up her voice, like the jubilee trumpet of old, in thanksgiving ; and to celebrate that name, which is above every name. Bp. Horne.

[f] 2. Say unto God, O how wonderful &c.] The subjects proposed are the various and awful manifestations of divine "power ;" of that power which made, and which continues to support, the world ; which overthrows, and raises up, empires ; which subverted the kingdom of Satan, established that of Christ, and caused its enemies either to relinquish, or dissemble, their hostility. Bp. Horne.

[g] 3. For all the world shall worship thee : &c.] What David spake in the future, the Church now speaketh in the present, tense : "All the earth doth worship thee, the Father everlasting—Day by day we magnify thee ; and we worship thy name ever world without end." A day is coming when this shall be the case, in an unlimited sense of the words ; when Jews and Gentiles, quick and dead, heaven and earth, shall compose one perfect and truly harmonious choir. Bp. Horne.

[h] 4, 5. O come hither, and behold the works of God : &c.] The prophet, after inviting men to contemplate "the works of God," sets before them, for that purpose, two great miracles wrought for Israel ; namely, the division of the Red Sea, and that of the river Jordan ; by the former they escaped Egypt, by the latter they entered Canaan. Under these two figurative transactions, the Christian church beholds, and, in the words which describe them, she celebrates, two corresponding works of mercy wrought for her ; namely, the deliverance of her children from the dominion of sin, by the waters of baptism ; and their admission into the kingdom of heaven, through the grave and gate of death. If the Israelites rejoiced in God their Saviour, for the former blessings, much more, surely, ought we so to do, for the latter. Bp. Horne.

[i] 5. — there did we rejoice thereof.] "We :" that is, our nation or our ancestors, in whose loins we then were, and the benefits of which ancient deliverance we at this day enjoy. See the like expressions Ps. lxxxi. 5, Bib. Trans. ; Hos. xii. 4. The whole people of Israel are often considered as one body, continued through all succeeding generations, united in the same covenant and worship, possessed of the same promises, privileges, and blessings, and actuated by one and the same Spirit. Poole.

[k] 9. For thou, O God, hast proved us : &c.] Notwithstanding the mercy of God, and the salvation wrought for us, we are here taught to expect affliction and tribulation ; which indeed are oftentimes necessary ; for, having in our composition a mixture of the earth from whence we came, with a base alloy of concupiscence, we stand as much in need of adversity, as metals, in like circumstances, do of the fire, to refine and purify our tempers. Try us, O God; but enable us to stand the trial! Bp. Horne.

[l] 10, 11. Thou broughtest us into the snare: &c.] Various calamities are here mentioned, which God suffers to fall upon his people. As, first, their being "brought into the net," or ensnared and taken captive by their enemies, whom they had not power to resist or escape. Secondly, "affliction upon the loins," or hard servitude under heavy burdens. Thirdly, "men riding over their heads," or the manifold oppressions of persecuting tyrants, trampling them under their feet, like war-horses in the day of battle. Fourthly, passing "through fire and water," or troubles of different and contrary kinds, though alike deadly and destructive. But He who brought Israel from among the brick-kilns of Egypt, and through the waters of the Red Sea, and the river Jordan, into the promised rest, will bring us safely through every fiery trial, and through the waves of a troublesome world, to the land of everlasting peace and comfort. Bp. Horne.

[m] 12, 13. I will go into thine house with burnt offerings: &c.] Under the Gospel, the obligation of "going to the house of God" and there "paying vows," still continues; but the "offerings" are changed. The legal sacrifices have been abolished by the oblation of the body of Christ, once for all. This oblation is commemorated in the eucharist; at the celebration of which, we now offer up our prayers and praises, ourselves, our souls and bodies, a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice, acceptable to God, in the name and through the merits of the Redeemer. These offerings, if vowed in the season of sickness and sorrow, should be paid in the days of health and gladness. Bp. Horne.

[n] 17. But God hath heard me: &c.] David was heard, when God delivered him from his enemies, and set him on the throne of Israel: Christ was heard, when God raised Him from the dead, and exalted Him to the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens: and every man is heard, when God raises him from sin to righteousness, as an earnest of his future resurrection from dust to glory. Let every such man praise the Lord, and say, with David, in the last verse of our Psalm, "Praised be God, who hath not cast out my prayer, nor turned his mercy from me." Bp. Horne.

[o] PSALM lxvii.] In this evangelical hymn, the Israelitish church is introduced as partly praying for, and partly foretelling, the advent of Christ, and the conversion of the nations, with the joy and gladness that should be consequent thereupon. The Christian church now uses, and will continue to use, the Psalm with propriety, until the fulness of the Gentiles shall be come in, the conversion of the Jews effected, and Christ shall appear the second time, finally to accomplish the salvation of his chosen. Bp. Horne.

[p] 1. God be merciful unto us, &c.] The Israelitish church, by the mouth of the prophet, expresseth her ardent desire after Messiah's advent, and appearance in the flesh; she prayeth, that God would be "merciful unto her," as He had promised; that, by so doing, He would "bless" her with the blessings of pardon and peace, of grace and glory; and, in one word, that He would "cause his face to shine upon her," or "shew her the light of his countenance," by the rising of the Sun of Righteousness, making her to behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, reviving her with the glad tidings of the Gospel, and enlightening her with the light of salvation. Bp. Horne.

[q] 2. That thy way may be known upon earth: &c.] Nor was she studious, as her degenerate children have since been, to confine the favour of heaven within her own pale. If she had a good wish for herself, she had one likewise for others; and therefore prayed that the "way" to life eternal might be "known," not in Jewry alone, but over all the "earth;" and that the virtues of that salutary medicine, which was able to restore health and vigour to the diseased and languishing spirits of men, might be published "among all nations." Bp. Horne.

[r] 4. O let the nations rejoice &c.] A very sufficient cause, surely, is here assigned, why the "nations" should "be glad, and sing for joy," upon the erection of Messiah's kingdom in the midst of them; namely, because He would "judge the people righteously;" breaking the yoke of the oppressor, and the iron rod of the prince of this world; becoming Himself an advocate in the cause of his church; introducing her into the glorious liberty of the children of God, whose service is Whit-Sunday, second Psalm Morn. Serv.

PSALM lxviii.[u] Exurgat Deus.

LET God arise[x], and let his enemies be scattered : let them also that hate him flee before him.

3 But let the righteous be glad and rejoice before God : let them also be merry and joyful.

4 O sing unto God[y], and sing praises unto his Name : magnify him that rideth upon the heavens, as it were upon an horse ; praise him in his name JAH, and rejoice before him.

perfect freedom ; and, with a sceptre, around which justice and mercy are wreathed together, "governing the nations upon earth." Bp. Horne.

[s] 6. Then shall the earth bring forth her increase : &c.] Then, when that long-expected time shall arrive, "the earth shall yield her increase ;" the nations of the world shall be converted to the faith, and become fruitful in every good word and work, through the benediction of heaven upon them. Bp. Horne.

[t] 7. God shall bless us : &c.] The evangelical "blessings," predicted in this Psalm, have been long since poured out upon "the ends of the earth," by the bountiful hand of God in Christ. Let us beseech Him to add yet this to all his other mercies, that, in return for such unmerited favours, the redeemed may have grace evermore to pay Him the tribute of fear and obedience, of duty and love. Bp. Horne.

[u] Psalm lxviii.] This Psalm, beginning in the same manner as Moses's song at the setting forward of the ark, Numb. x. 35, was composed by David in commemoration of the great deliverances afforded to the Israelites, and judgments inflicted on their enemies, especially in that of their coming out of Egypt ; and mystically contains and predicts the resurrection of Christ, and the exaltation of the Christian church consequent thereto. Dr. Hammond.

This beautiful, sublime, and comprehensive, but very difficult, Psalm, is one of those which the Church has appointed to be used on Whit-Sunday. It seems evidently to have been composed on that festive and joyful occasion, the removal of the ark to Mount Sion. See 2 Sam. vi. ; 1 Chron. xv. Under this figure, David, foreseeing the exaltation of Messiah, speaks of Him, whom he describes, 1, 2, as arising, and vanquishing his enemies ; 3—6, as causing the faithful to rejoice, and shewing mercy to the afflicted ; 7—15, as bringing his church out of bondage, supporting her in the world by the Word and the Spirit, purging away her corruptions, and subduing her adversaries ; the groundwork being laid in the history of the Egyptian deliverance, the manna and the law given in the wilderness, and the overthrow of the Canaanitish nations. 16—20, David returns to the scene before him, celebrates the ascension of Christ with power and great glory, to the heavenly Sion, and the gifts He should from thence pour down upon men ; 21—23, foretels the vengeance He would take on his opposers ; 24—28, sets forth the order of the church in his services ; 29—31, predicts the conversion of the nations ; all of whom, 32—35, he exhorts to unite in chanting forth the praises of their God and Saviour. Bp. Horne.

Dr. Chandler, in his "Critical History of the Life of David," has given an admirable exposition of the literal, or historical, sense of this Psalm, and a very ingenious division of it into five parts, founded on the supposition of its being performed at the removal of the ark. The author has been greatly assisted, in the ensuing comment, by the Doctor's exposition, and the reader will find the division of the Psalm inserted. Bp. Horne.

[x] 1. Let God arise, &c.] These words were used by Moses, whenever the ark set forward before the armies of Israel, in their progress towards Canaan, Numb. x. 35. David, in like manner, uses them in this triumphal hymn, on the removal of the ark to the city of Zion, 1 Chron. xiii. and xv. Dr. Chandler supposes this part of the Psalm, from ver. 1 to ver. 6, inclusive, to have been sung when the ark was taken up on the shoulders of the Levites. The Church now celebrates, in the same terms, the substance of the foregoing shadows ; she sings the praises of her Redeemer, rising from the dead, and preceding the Israel of God, to the true land of promise ; when his "enemies," the powers of darkness, sin, and death, "were scattered, and they that hated him fled before him." Bp. Horne.

[y] 4. O sing unto God, &c.] The prophet exhorts the people of God to magnify, with psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, the eternal and incommunicable "name" of Him "who was, and is, and is to come ;" who, deriving being from none, gives it to all ; and who, as Redeemer of his people, is exalted above the "heavens," and all the powers therein ; above the gods of the nations ; acknowledged and glorified by saints and angels ; feared and trembled at by ungodly men, and evil spirits. Bp. Horne.

[z] 5. He is a Father of the fatherless, &c.] After a description of God's "majesty," the Psalmist proceeds to make mention of his "mercy" towards the afflicted Israelites, who had suffered so much in Egypt, and in the wilderness. The cause of the "fatherless and widow" He takes into his own hands. But never did He do this in so full and extensive a manner, as when, by becoming man, He betrothed the church to Himself in righteousness, and became a father to her fatherless children. Bp. Horne.

margin. The "solitary," or destitute, in this verse, are the same persons with the "fatherless and widow," in the foregoing: those, as Dr. Chandler observes, whose fathers and families had been destroyed in Egypt, or had fallen in the wilderness; who, therefore, were left alone, destitute of help. These God afterwards "made to sit down in families," blessed them with a numerous progeny, and the peaceable enjoyment of domestick felicity. Thus hath since been manifested the same tender care of heaven, in calling home the wretched outcasts among the nations, and admitting them into the holy and happy family of the children of God. Another instance of God's mercy, mentioned in this verse, is that He "bringeth out those which are bound with chains," delivering his people from a spiritual, as He once did Israel from a temporal bondage. "But the rebellions," the ungodly and impenitent, "dwell in a dry land," in a spiritual desert, where no waters of life, of comfort, and salvation, flow. Such is the state of the rebellious Jews at this day, like that of their murmuring predecessors in the wilderness. This allusion, says Bishop Lowth, to the deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, and the destruction of the murmurers in the desert, brings in, with great ease, the full subject of the Exodus, in the next verse. Bp. Horne.

[b] 7, 8. O God, when thou wentest forth &c.] This part of the Psalm, from ver. 7 to ver. 14, is the second, in Dr. Chandler's division. It is supposed to have been sung when the procession began, and to have lasted till Mount Sion was in view. The prophet goes back to commemorate the wonders wrought for Israel, when Jehovah, by his presence in the cloudy pillar, conducted them through the wilderness: when, descending to deliver the law, He bowed the heavens and shook the earth, and caused Sinai to quake from its foundations. The Christian church, singing this Psalm on the day of Pentecost, commemorates, under these terms and figures, her redemption from the spiritual Egypt, by the resurrection of Jesus, with mighty signs and wonders, and the succeeding delivery of the new law from Mount Sion, after the descent of the Holy Spirit; by which the old Jewish dispensation was shaken and removed, to make way for one that should last for ever. See Heb. xii. 18—28. Bp. Horne.

[c] 9. Thou, O God, sentest a gracious rain &c.] As the heavens, at the command of God, rained down manna, &c. to strengthen and refresh the well-nigh famished people in the wilderness; so, by the descent of the Spirit from above, bringing with Him the word of life, the church, in her infant and languid state, was mightily confirmed and invigorated. Bp. Horne.

[d] 10. Thy congregation shall dwell therein: &c.] In the former verse, the Psalmist tells us, that God hath confirmed, refreshed, and revived, his inheritance, by the plentiful, and as it were voluntary, showers of bread and flesh that He rained down upon them. In these words, Dr. Chandler apprehends, he speaks of the manner, as well as abundance of the food thus given them. Thus the history informs us, that the manna, covered by the dew, "lay round about the host;" and that the quails were "let fall by the camp, about a day's journey on one side, and a day's journey on the other, round about the camp," Exod. xvi. 13; Numb. xi. 31. This was literally "dwelling in the midst of the food God had provided them." By the ministration of the word and sacraments, in the Christian church, the true manna, the bread which cometh down, with the dew of God's blessing, from heaven, is continually furnished, for the nourishment of those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness." It "falls round about the camp," and, "as to this thy food, O God," we, thy favoured people, have the happiness to "dwell in the midst of it:" thus "thou hast prepared, of thy goodness, for the poor in spirit." Bp. Horne.

[e] 11. The Lord gave the word: &c.] He, who supplied his people with food in the wilderness, enabled them likewise to vanquish the numerous enemies that opposed them in their passage through it, the Amalekites, the Amorites, the Midianites, the Moabites, &c. With respect to all these enemies, "the Lord gave the word." The Israelites engaged them, by his order, see Numb. xxi. 34; xxv. 17; and under his conduct and blessing, obtained the victory over them. When the enemies of man's salvation were vanquished by the resurrection of Christ, and the heathen nations were to own his power, again "the Lord gave the word." It was published, at first, by apostles, confessors, and martyrs, and hath been since published continually, by all the churches, who celebrate in their services the victories of their Redeemer; as in old time, prophets and prophetesses, Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Deborah, and others, with the armies of Israel, sang triumphal songs, on occasion of temporal, but figurative conquests. Bp. Horne.

[f] 12. Kings with their armies did flee, &c.] When God, by the hand of Moses and his successor Joshua, led his people, through the wilderness, into the land of promise, the kings of Canaan, with their mighty hosts, were discomfited; and the women of Israel, who "tarried at home, divided the spoil" of their vanquished enemies. After the conquest of the Midianites, as Dr. Chandler observes, God ordered the prey to be divided between them who went out on that expedition, and the rest of the congregation who continued in their tents, Numb. xxxi. 27. Thus, in the spiritual war, apostles, confessors, and martyrs, went out to the battle, fought and conquered; while the benefits of the victory extended to thousands and millions, who, without being exposed to their conflicts and torments, have enjoyed the fruit of their labours. Bp. Horne.

[g] 13. Though ye have lien among the pots, &c.] By "lying among the pots," or in "dust and ashes," is evidently denoted a state of affliction and wretchedness, like that of Israel in Egypt, which was exchanged for one of the utmost dignity and splendour in Canaan; one as different from the former, as a cauldron discoloured by smoke and soot, is from the bright and beautiful plumage of an eastern dove, glistering interchangeably, as with silver and gold. Thus the church of Christ emerged from a state of persecution and tribulation, into one of splendour and magnificence. Bp. Horne.

[h] 14. When the Almighty scattered kings &c.] As if it were said, And howsoever God's church seemed to be overcast with darkness of discomfort, while tyrants oppressed her, yet now the Almighty hath subdued and put to flight the enemies thereof, it was white and glorious, like to the hill of Salmon, of itself dark and shady, when it is covered with snow. Bp. Hall.

[i] 15. As the hill of Basan, so is God's hill : &c.] Sion, which is God's hill where He pleaseth to dwell, may well compare with the fruitful hill of Basan : in height if it may not equal it, in dignity and privilege it is much above it. Bp. Hall.

When the ark came in view of mount Sion, the place of its fixed residence for the future, and probably when they began to ascend it, Dr. Chandler apprehends, this and the two following verses were sung. Bp. Horne.

[k] 16. Why hop ye so, &c.] The Psalmist in commemorating God's former mercies and loving-kindnesses, having been led to mention the towering hills of Salmon and Bashan, by a masterly transition suddenly resumes his original subject, with a beautiful apostrophe to those mountains, letting them know, that, however proudly they might lift up their heads above mount Sion, yet this was the mount which Jehovah had determined to honour with his special presence; thither He was now ascending, with the ark of his strength; and there, between the cherubims, in the place prepared for Him, He would "dwell for ever;" till the whole dispensation would be at an end; till the glory of the Lord should be revealed in human nature; till God should be manifest in the flesh; and the true tabernacle and temple should succeed the typical. After that, the privileges of Sion were transferred to the Christian church; she became, and, while the world lasts, will continue to be, the "hill in which God delighteth to dwell :" she will therefore be justly entitled to the pre-eminence over all that may seem to be great and glorious in the world. Bp. Horne.

[l] 17. The chariots of God &c.] The Psalmist, in the preceding verse, had declared Sion to be the habitation of Jehovah. In this verse is described the majesty and magnificence of his appearance there, as a mighty conqueror of the enemies of his people, riding upon the cherubim, as in a triumphal chariot, with all the hosts of heaven, as it were, in his retinue. Thus God descended on Sinai, with the fire, the cloud, and the glory; thus He manifested Himself, when taking possession of "the holy place" prepared for Him in Sion; 2 Chron. v. 13; and in some such manner we may suppose King Messiah to have entered heaven at his ascension, when He went up in the clouds, with power and great glory, and all the attendant spirits joined his train, rejoicing to minister to their Lord, and increase the pomp and splendour of that glorious day. Bp. Horne.

[m] 18. Thou art gone up on high, &c.] When the ark had ascended mount Sion, and was deposited in the place assigned for it, the singers are supposed, by Dr. Chandler, to have proceeded with this part of the Psalm, in which they celebrate the ascension of their God and King, by the symbol of his presence, to the heights of Sion, after having subdued their enemies, and enriched his people with the spoil of the vanquished, and the gifts of the tributary nations; of which much was probably employed in the service of the tabernacle, and afterwards in building the temple, first designed by David, "that the Lord God might dwell," and have a fixed permanent habitation, among his people. But this whole transaction, like many others of old, being a figurative one, the apostle, Eph. iv. 8, has applied the words before us to our blessed Saviour, (the true ark on which the glory rested,) who personally ascended up to the highest heavens, "led captivity captive," by triumphing over his conquered enemies, and having received gifts from his heavenly Father, as the fruits of his victory, gave them unto men, as was most conducive to the establishment of his church, "that the Lord God might dwell among them." "Thou hast ascended on high;" thou, O Christ, who didst descend, from the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, to the lower parts of the earth, art again ascended, from the lower parts of the earth, to the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens: "thou hast led captivity captive;" thou hast conquered the conqueror, bound the strong one, redeemed human nature from the grave, and triumphantly carried it, with thee, to the throne of God; "thou hast received gifts for men, yea, for the rebellious also;" and, being thus ascended into thy glory, thou hast received of the Father the promise of the Spirit, with all his gifts and graces, to bestow upon the sons of men; even upon such as heretofore have not only broken thy laws, but appeared in arms against thee; yet of such as these, converted by the power of thy Gospel, wilt thou form and establish a church; "that the Lord God may dwell among them;" that so, of thy faithful people, gathered from all parts of the world, may be built up a living temple, "an habitation of God through the Spirit." Bp. Horne.

[n] 19. Praised be the Lord daily: &c.] The preceding survey of God's dispensations constraineth the church to break out into an act of praise, and to bless the Preserver of men, the Author of eternal "salvation;" in whose hands are the "goings forth of death;" in other words, who has "the keys of death and the grave," Rev. i. 18; who is possessed of power to confine, and to release; to kill, and to make alive. Bp. Horne.

[o] 21. God shall wound the head &c.] The meaning is, God shall strike deep, or exhaust the blood of the head of his enemies, even the hairy crown of him that goes on in his guilty practices; where the emphasis consists in the description of God's enemies, who were such as persevered in their criminal actions. This verse begins a prediction of that vengeance, which the person, who was "ascended on high," would infallibly execute upon his impenitent enemies, and which was shadowed forth in the destruction of the enemies of Israel, by David, after that the ark of God was placed upon the hill of Sion. See 2 Sam. viii. The expressions, "the head," and "the hairy crown," denote the principal part, the strength, the pride, and the glory of the adversary, which was to be crushed, according to the original sentence; "He shall bruise thy head," Gen. iii. 15. Bp. Horne.

[p] 22, 23. The Lord hath said, &c.] Abner, in his conference with the elders of Israel, to bring them over to David's interest, tells them, "The Lord hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant, David, I will save my people Israel, out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies," 2 Sam. iii. 18. Thus Jehovah had promised to repeat in Israel, by David, his glorious acts; to work as signal victories and deliverances for his people, as He had formerly done in the field of Bashan, and at the Red Sea; when they saw their enemies dead at their feet. By the glorious resurrection, and triumphant ascension of King Messiah, by the conquests of the Gospel, and the unparalleled overthrow of its opposers, were these figures realized, and these shadows changed into substances. Bp. Horne.

[q] 24. It is well seen, O God, &c.] When the ark was safely deposited, the sacrifices were offered, the solemnity well-nigh concluded, and the whole assembly about to return back, Dr. Chandler supposes the singers to have struck up, and joined in the remaining part of this noble anthem. These words contain a sort of triumph, because this great work of translating the ark was now so happily accomplished. The people of Israel had a pledge and earnest of those mighty things which God would do for them, by the joyful and victorious manner, in which, with the ark of his presence, He had taken possession of the place prepared for Him on Mount Sion, and gone "into the sanctuary." A like pledge and earnest of her future enlargement and exaltation, was the ascension of her Lord and Head to the Christian church. Bp. Horne.

[r] 25. The singers go before, &c.] The joy and gladness expressed by David, and the house of Israel, when, in solemn procession, with the sound of vocal and instrumental musick, they "brought up the ark of Jehovah, and set it in its place," 2 Sam. vi. 5. 15. 17, may be considered as a prelude to that voice of universal exultation, with which the Christian church, in her holy services, doth now celebrate the resurrection and ascension of her Redeemer. Bp. Horne.

[s] 26. Give thanks, O Israel, &c.] Or, "Bless ye God in the congregations;" in this form of words the Israelites are supposed, when accompanying the ark, to have reciprocally exhorted and encouraged each other to exert their utmost powers in the sacred employment of blessing and thanking God. Bp. Horne.

[t] 27. There is little Benjamin their ruler, &c.] In this enumeration of the tribes of Israel, that were present at the removal of the ark, four only are mentioned; Benjamin and Judah, who dwelt nearest to the city of David, Zebulun and Naphtali, who were the farthest distant from it; to shew, as Dr. Chandler observes, the unanimity of the whole nation, and of all the tribes far and near, in attending this solemnity, to testify their willing acknowledgment of David for their king, and the city of David for their capital, where all the great solemnities of religion should be performed, and their annual festivals continually celebrated. Benjamin, though the youngest tribe, is named first, and called the "ruler;" because from that tribe sprang Saul, the first king of Israel. The attendance of this tribe shewed, that all envy and opposition to David from Saul's party was at an end. Upon David's accession to the crown, Judah became the royal tribe, and supported the throne by its counsels. Zebulun and Naphtali were tribes of eminent learning and knowledge. See Gen. xlix. 21; Judges v. 14. Thus, after the publication of the Gospel, the nations flocked into the church, both those that were near, and those that were afar off; power, wisdom, and learning, submitted themselves to the kingdom, and conspired to set forth the glory, of Messiah. Bp. Horne.

PSALM lxix.[d] Salvum me fac.

Good Friday, first Psalm Even. Serv.

SAVE me, O God [e] : for the waters are come in, even unto my soul.

2 I stick fast in the deep mire,

---

[u] 28. Thy God hath sent forth strength &c.] The former part of this verse contains a comfortable assurance given to the church, that God had made provision, and issued out orders, for her establishment and security. In the latter clause is a prayer, that He would accomplish all his counsels concerning her; and, as He had begun a good work, so that He would vouchsafe to perfect it unto the day of the Lord. Bp. Horne.

[x] 29. For thy temple's sake at Jerusalem: &c.] David foretels, that on the establishment of the then church, and worship in Jerusalem, the kings of the Gentiles should come, and make their oblations at the temple of God; which happened in his days, and those of his son Solomon, as an earnest and figure of that plenary accession of the kings of the earth to the church of Christ, which was to take place in the latter days, under the Gospel. See 2 Sam. viii. 9—11; 1 Kings v. 1; x. 1. 24; 2 Chron. ix. 23; Isa. ix. 3. 6; Matt. ii. 11; Rev. xxi. 24. Bp. Horne.

[y] 30, 31. When the company of the spear-men, &c.] The hostile powers being overthrown, and the church of Israel fully established, the nations around her, even those which had been most given to idolatry, sued for her friendship, and came to Jerusalem with their gifts and oblations; as, in like manner, after the defeat of Maxentius and Maximin, the Roman empire, with all its tributary provinces, was added to the church of Christ. Bp. Horne.

[z] 32. Sing unto God, &c.] "Rapt into future times," the prophet exhorteth, not Judea only, but all "the kingdoms of the earth," to unite in chanting forth the praises of their God and Saviour. In the fulness of time, this exhortation was heard and obeyed. For Eusebius thus describes the state of the church in the days of Constantine: "There was one and the same power of the Holy Spirit, which passed through all the members; one soul in all; the same alacrity of faith; one common consent in chanting forth the praises of God," Euseb. Eccles. Hist. book x. chap. 2. And it deserves notice, that the primitive Christians, when, delivered from the rage of persecuting tyrants, they freely celebrated their holy festivals, could find no words so well calculated to express the joy and gladness of their hearts, as the songs of Moses, and David, and the prophets, which seem to have been divinely penned on purpose for their use, upon that glorious occasion. Bp. Horne.

[a] 33. Who sitteth in the heavens &c.] The praises of the church are sung to Him, who, after his sufferings here below, re-ascended to take possession of his ancient throne, high above all heavens; who from thence speaketh to the world by his glorious Gospel, mighty and powerful, as thunder, in its effects upon the hearts of men. The power of Christ's voice, when He was on earth, appeared by the effects which followed, when He said, "Young man, arise:" "Lazarus, come forth:" "Peace, be still:" and it will yet farther appear, when "all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of man, and come forth." Bp. Horne.

[b] 34. Ascribe ye the power to God &c.] God requires his people to ascribe unto Him the kingdom, and the power, and the glory; to acknowledge Him as the Author of life, health, and salvation, of all they are, and all they have, in nature and in grace; to glorify Him as the Creator and Governor of the world, the Redeemer and Sanctifier of his church. Bp. Horne.

[c] 35. O God, wonderful art thou &c.] The Psalmist, here exemplifying the precept laid down in the foregoing verse, ascribes to God the glory of his appearance in the sanctuary, as the God and King of Israel, terrifying and dismaying his enemies, comforting and invigorating his people. Such is the presence of a glorified Saviour, by his Spirit, in the Christian church. For this, and all other his mercies, she is bound continually to say, and, by her holy services, continually doth she say, "Blessed be God." Bp. Horne.

[d] Psalm lxix.] This Psalm was composed by David, in some season of extreme danger. But some of the expressions, it is manifest, are such, as were not literally fulfilled in him, but in Christ; of whom David was a figure, both in his sufferings, and in his advancement after them to a kingdom. Bp. Patrick.

The application of many passages in this Psalm to our Lord, made by Himself and his apostles, as well as the appointment of the whole, by the church, to be used on Good Friday, direct us to consider it as uttered by the Son of God, in the day of his passion. 1—5. He describeth his sufferings, undergone for the sins of men; 6, 7, prayeth that his disciples may not be offended at the pain and shame of the cross; 8—12, relateth the usage He met with at the hands of the Jews; 13—20, maketh his prayer to the Father; 21, 22, complaineth of his desolate estate, of the reproach cast upon Him, and of the gall and vinegar administered to Him; 23—29, foretelleth the judgments of heaven, about to fall upon the Jewish nation; 30, returneth to the consideration of his own sorrows, and prayeth for deliverance; 31, 32, praiseth the Father for the accomplishment of that deliverance; 33, 34, exhorteth all men to come and partake of it, and, 35, the whole creation to join in a chorus of thanksgiving for it; 36, 37, predicteth the salvation, edification, and perpetuity, of the church. Bp. Horne.

[e] 1. Save me, O God: &c.] The Gospels inform us concerning the constancy and patience of Christ under his sufferings: the sufferings themselves (those in particular of his soul) are largely described in the Psalms; many of which, and this among the rest, seem to have been indited beforehand by the Spirit, for his use in the day of trouble. Bp. Horne.

[f] 3. I am weary of crying; &c.] This verse describes the effects of those supplications which the Son of God offered up, "with strong crying and tears, in the days of his flesh," Heb. v. 7: of that thirst, which, through loss of blood on the cross, "dried his throat;" and of that long and patient endurance, when his "eyes failed," and were closed in darkness, while his faith "waited" for the deliverance promised by the Father. Bp. Horne.

[g] 4. They that hate me &c.] The Jews, the Romans, and the spirits of darkness, made up that multitude of enemies, which, like an herd of evening wolves, surrounded the Lamb of God, thirsting after his blood, nor resting till they had drawn forth the very last drop of it from his heart. And thus the only innocent person in the world suffered for all its guilt, making satisfaction for wrongs which He never did, and "restoring that which he took not away." Bp. Horne.

[h] 5. — God, thou knowest my simpleness, &c.] These words, in the mouth of David, or any other sinful son of Adam, are plain enough. They may, nevertheless, be spoken, as the rest of the Psalm is, in the person of Christ, concerning the iniquities committed by us, but "laid on him" which He therefore mentions, as if they had been his own; the head complaining of diseases incident only to the members. See Isa. liii. 6. Bp. Horne.

[i] 6. Let not them that trust in thee, &c.] The Son of God prefers a petition to the Father, that his disciples may not be scandalized on account of his passion, or be tempted to relinquish their trust in God, at beholding his only and beloved Son forsaken on the cross; since it was not for any demerit of his own, but for the sake of God's glory, as well as man's salvation, that He "bore reproach, and shame covered his face." Bp. Horne.

[k] 8, 9. I am become a stranger &c.] The Jews were Christ's "brethren," according to the flesh. To them He was a "stranger and an alien." "He came to his own, and his own received him not." "We know," said they, "that God spake unto Moses; but as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is." And again, "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil," John i. 11; ix. 29; viii. 48. The ground of all this enmity was the "zeal" of Christ for the reformation and purification of the church, which He manifested in his reproofs and exhortations, as also by the emblematical act of driving the buyers and sellers out of the temple. Upon this latter occasion, the Evangelist tells us, "his disciples remembered that it was written," that is, it was predicted of Messiah in this Psalm, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," John ii. 17. Therefore, as he adds immediately, "the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me." In calumniating and blaspheming the works of the Son of God, the Jews reproached both the Father who gave Him those works to do, and the Spirit by which He did them: all which reproaches fell on the man Christ, as the visible instrument employed in the doing of them. This last passage is thus quoted and applied by St. Paul, "Even Christ pleased not himself: but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me," Rom. xv. 3. Bp. Horne.

[l] 10—12. I wept, and chastened myself &c.] To expiate the sins of his creatures, the King of glory became a man of sorrows; He put on mortal flesh as a penitential garment; He fasted, and prayed, and mourned, and wept, and humbled Himself to the dust, as if He had been the offender, and we the righteous persons that needed no repentance. And what return was made Him? "It was to his reproach, and he became a proverb to them," for whom He suffered. "They that sat in the gate," or, on the "judgment-seat," which used to be in the gates of cities, even the senators and judges of the land, the chief priests and elders, "spake against against me : and the drunkards make songs upon me.

13 But, Lord, I make my prayer [m] unto thee : in an acceptable time.

14 Hear me, O God, in the multitude of thy mercy : even in the truth of thy salvation.

15 Take me out of the mire [n], that I sink not : O let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters.

16 Let not the water-flood drown me, neither let the deep swallow me up : and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.

17 Hear me, O Lord, for thy loving-kindness is comfortable : turn thee unto me according to the multitude of thy mercies.

18 And hide not thy face from thy servant, for I am in trouble : O haste thee, and hear me.

19 Draw nigh unto my soul, and save it : O deliver me, because of mine enemies.

20 Thou hast known my reproof, my shame, and my dishonour : mine adversaries are all in thy sight.

him," with cool and deliberate malice; while He was "the song of the drunken," and profligate, who more grossly insulted and derided Him. Bp. Horne.

[m] 13, 14. But, Lord, I make my prayer &c.] The Son of God Himself, in the midst of sorrows and sufferings, has recourse to prayer. The "acceptable time," in which Christ prayed, was the time when He offered the great propitiatory sacrifice. Through the merit of that sacrifice it is, that we have an "acceptable time, and a day of salvation," allowed us. Behold, now is that time, behold, now is that day! Let us not delay one moment to use and improve it aright. Bp. Horne.

[n] 15, 16. Take me out of the mire, &c.] Messiah petitions for deliverance from calamities, under the same images which were employed at the beginning of the Psalm, to describe those calamities. The purport of the petition is, that the sins of the world, and the sufferings due to them, may not finally overwhelm Him, nor the grave "shut her mouth upon him" for ever; but that the morning of his resurrection may at length succeed the night of his passion. Bp. Horne.

[o] 21. Thy rebuke hath broken my heart, &c.] The reproaches which thou hast been pleased to expose me to, have wounded me to the very heart. Dr. Nicholls. The argument urged by Christ, in these most affecting words, is, that in the extremity of his passion He was left alone without a comforter, a friend, or an attendant; while all that were round about Him studied to infuse every bitter and acrimonious ingredient into his cup of sorrows. This was literally as well as metaphorically true, when "they gave him to drink vinegar mingled with gall." See Matt. xxvii. 34; John xix. 29. Bp. Horne.

[p] 23. Let their table be made a snare &c.] That this and the following verses are to be understood in the future sense by way of prediction, and not as an imprecation, is affirmed by St. Augustine: and indeed the original is most fitly rendered in the future "shall be." And so doth the Jewish Arab interpreter observe, that such seeming imprecations, as here and elsewhere occur in this book of Psalms, are not so much by way of imprecation, as by way of propheey or prediction of what in God's just judgment would certainly befal. Dr. Hammond. At this verse beginneth a prediction of those dreadful judgments which heaven has since inflicted upon the crucifiers of the Lord of glory. By their "table becoming a snare, and their peace-offerings a trap," is pointed out the consequence of the Jews adhering to the legal services, in opposition to Him who is "the end of the law, for righteousness." After his sufferings and exaltation, to continue under the law became not only unprofitable, but destructive, inasmuch as it implied a denial of Messiah's advent, and a renunciation of every evangelical benefit and blessing. Bp. Horne.

[q] 24. Let their eyes be blinded, &c.] They who loved darkness rather than light, by the righteous judgment of God were permitted to walk on in darkness, while the blind led the blind. And such still continues to be the state of the Jews, notwithstanding the intolerable weight of woe which made "their loins to shake," and bowed down their backs to the earth. "The veil remaineth yet upon their hearts," in the reading of the Old Testament; nor can they see therein "the things which belong unto their peace." These last two verses are cited, as spoken of Israel, by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 9, 10. Bp. Horne.

[r] 25. Pour out thine indignation &c.] Never was "indignation so poured out," never did "wrath so take hold" on any nation as on that, which once was, beyond every other, beloved and favoured. "The wrath," says St. Paul, 1 Thess. ii. 16, "is come upon them to the uttermost," to the very last dregs of the cup of fury. Bp. Horne.

[s] 26. Let their habitation be void: &c.] Our Lord seems to have had this passage in his view, when He said to the Jews, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate," Matt. xxiii. 38. Jerusalem was by the Roman armies destroyed from the foundations. It hath been since indeed rebuilt, and inhabited by Gentiles, by Christians, and by Saracens, but no more by the Jewish people. It is remarkable, that this verse is applied, Acts i. 20, to Judas, considered as the head and representative of that apostate nation, which rejected and delivered up its Prince and Saviour to be crucified. "He was guide to them that took Jesus," Acts i. 16. The punishment, therefore, as well as the sin of Israel, is portrayed in his person, and the same prophecy is applicable to him and to his countrymen. Bp. Horne.

[t] 27. For they persecute him &c.] The cause of the foregoing calamities, inflicted on the Jews, is here assigned; namely, that, instead of mourning and sympathizing with Messiah, in the day when Jehovah laid on Him the iniquities of us all, and afflicted Him for our sakes, they, by reproaches and blasphemies, aggravated his sufferings to the uttermost; and afterwards continued to use his disciples in the same manner. Bp. Horne.

[u] 28. Let them fall from one wickedness to another : &c.] As they added affliction to the afflictions of Christ, so God permitted them to go on, blinded and deserted, in their wickedness, "adding sin to sin," filling up the measure of their fathers, still obstinately refusing to come into the church, and partake of the "righteousness" which is by faith. Bp. Horne.

[x] 29. Let them be wiped out &c.] By "the book of the living," in which the names of the "righteous are written," is to be understood the register of the true servants and worshippers of God, of those who are "justified," or made "righteous," through faith. In this register, the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the ancient fathers of the Israelitish race, with their true children, stand recorded; but the degenerate and apostate Jews have been long since "blotted out;" they are no longer the peculium of heaven; nor have they any part or portion in the inheritance of the sons of God. Thus Ezekiel: "They shall not be in the assembly of my people, nor shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel:" xiii. 9. And our Lord, in his conversations with the Jews, took every opportunity to tell them that they, for their unbelief, should be "cast out," and that the Gentiles, obeying the call of the Gospel, should come from all quarters of the world, and "sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God." Bp. Horne.

[y] 30. As for me, &c.] Here, as in the 22nd, and many other Psalms, the scene changes from sorrow to joy; from a state of suffering to one of triumph; from the passion to the resurrection. Jesus, risen from the dead, declares his resolution of praising and magnifying the Father, for the salvation of the world, happily accomplished by his labours and sufferings, which were now for ever at an end. The church does the same incessantly, on earth and in heaven. Bp. Horne.

[z] 32. This also shall please the Lord : &c.] A bullock was in its prime for sacrifice, under the law, when it began to put forth its "horns and hoofs." The infinite distance, therefore, in point of value, between the best legal sacrifices, and those of obedience, love, and praise, as offered by Christ, and through Him, by his church, under the Gospel, is pointed out in this verse. See Ps. xl. 6, &c.; l. 23. Bp. Horne.

[a] 33. The humble shall consider this, &c.] It is foretold, that the "humble," or the "poor in spirit," that is, the meek and lowly followers of the holy Jesus, should find everlasting joy and comfort in the glad tidings of salvation; all mankind are exhorted to "seek after God," as manifested in the Gospel of his Son; and the reward promised is "life spiritual and eternal." Bp. Horne.

[b] 36. For God will save Sion, &c.] The salvation and edification of the church followed the passion and resurrection of Christ. "God will save Sion," that is, the church, which at first consisted of the apostles, who were Jews, and others of that nation by them converted to the faith. "And build the cities of Judah," or cause churches to arise in all the world, which shall from thenceforth take the names, and inherit the privileges, of "Israel and Judah; that men," even such as God shall call from among the nations, "may dwell there," as citizens of the new Jerusalem, "and," instead of the rejected Jews, "have it in their possession." Bp. Horne.

[c] 37. The posterity also of his servants &c.] The continuation of the church in the posterity of the faithful is here predicted. Accordingly, the descendants of the proselyted Gentiles have been in possession of the Gospel privileges, for above 1700 years. And thus it will be, while they abide in the faith, and "love the name," of Jesus. Should the Gentiles apostatize as the Jews did, and the Jews be converted as the Gentiles were, then the Gospel would go from the Gentiles to the Jews, as before it went from the Jews to the Gentiles;

2 Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul: let them be turned backward and put to confusion that wish me evil.

3 Let them for their reward be soon brought to shame: that cry over me, There, there.

4 But let all those that seek thee be joyful and glad in thee: and let all such as delight in thy salvation say alway, The Lord be praised.

5 As for me, I am poor and in misery: haste thee unto me, O God.

6 Thou art my helper, and my redeemer: O Lord, make no long tarrying.

[d] PSALM lxx.] The words of this Psalm occur, without any material variations, in Ps. xl. verse 16, to the end. The reader is therefore referred thither for the exposition; as before, in the case of the 53rd and 14th Psalms. Bp. Horne.

[e] PSALM lxxi.] The Psalmist, sorely distressed in his old age (see ver. 8, and 16,) by the rebellion of Absalom, which was his great affliction at that period of life, ver. 1, prayeth for the divine assistance; pleading God's righteousness, 2, and promise; 3, the iniquity of his persecutors; 4, 5, the mercies vouchsafed him from his birth; 6, 7, his being deserted and given up by man; 8, his old age; 9, the taunts and insults of his adversaries; 10, he repeateth his request; 11, prophesieth the downfal of his enemies; declareth, 12, his hope, 13, his gratitude, 14, his faith; 15, 16, wisheth to be preserved, that he might shew forth the power and glory of God, whose righteousness and marvellous acts, 17, he extolleth, and thence, 18, 19, promiseth himself a final redemption from all his troubles, and a restoration to honour and comfort; when, 20—22, he shall sing and speak the praises of the Lord. Bp. Horne.

[f] 1. In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust, &c.] The promises of salvation are made to those, who, renouncing all confidence in the world and themselves, "trust" in God alone for it. For this reason the Psalmist so often begins his prayer with a declaration of his "faith," which is to the soul in affliction, what an anchor is to a ship in distress. Bp. Horne.

[g] — but rid me, and deliver me in thy righteousness;] A second argument here used is the "righteousness" of God, who cannot but be faithful and just to his own gracious word. By that word, He had engaged to establish the temporal throne of David, and the eternal throne of the Son of David. And, by the same word, He has engaged to bring those who believe in Him, through sufferings to glory. Bp. Horne.

[h] 3. Deliver me, O my God, &c.] The divine assistance is implored by the Psalmist, thirdly, on the foot of the goodness of his cause, and the iniquity of his enemies. Such were Absalom, Ahithophel, &c. to David; Judas and the Jews to Christ; and such are the world, the flesh, and the devil, to the Christian. Against them he is to pray and fight continually. Bp. Horne.

[i] 4. For thou, O Lord God, art &c.] Former mercies are urged, as a fourth motive, for the divine goodness to continue those mercies. The watchful care of heaven over us, at an age when we are able to take no care of ourselves, deserves consideration. Bp. Horne.

[k] 6. I am become as it were a monster &c.] David, banished from his kingdom, was regarded as a "wonder," or a prodigy of wretchedness; Christ, in his state of humiliation upon earth, was a "sign," every where "spoken against," as Simeon foretold He would be, Luke ii. 34. Bp. Horne.

[l] 8. Cast me not away in the time of age: &c.] David, mindful of the noble actions which, through God's assistance, he had achieved in his youth, beseeches Him not to desert his servant when persecuted by a rebellious son in his old age. The weaknesses and temptations, peculiar to that time of life, render this a petition necessary for us all to make, before we are overtaken by it. Bp. Horne.

[m] 9. For mine enemies speak against me, &c.] They who saw David ascending mount Olivet in tears, when Absalom had driven him from Jerusalem, and they who beheld Jesus led forth out of the same Jerusalem, to be crucified on mount Calvary, were tempted to regard both the one and the other, as finally deserted by God. They who view the church, or any member thereof, under affliction and persecution, are too frequently tempted to think the same, and to act accordingly; soul take their counsel together, saying: God hath forsaken him; persecute him, and take him, for there is none to deliver him.

10 Go not far from me, O God: my God, haste thee to help me.

11 Let them be confounded and perish that are against my soul: let them be covered with shame and dishonour that seek to do me evil.

12 As for me, I will patiently abide alway: and will praise thee more and more.

13 My mouth shall daily speak of thy righteousness and salvation: for I know no end thereof.

14 I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God: and will make mention of thy righteousness only.

15 Thou, O God, hast taught me[n] from my youth up until now: therefore will I tell of thy wondrous works.

16 Forsake me not, O God, in mine old age, when I am grayheaded: until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to all them that are yet for to come.

17 Thy righteousness, O God, is very high: and great things are they that thou hast done; O God, who is like unto thee?

18 O what great troubles and adversities hast thou shewed me[o]! and yet didst thou turn and refresh me: yea, and broughtest me from the deep of the earth again. quicken me again. Bib. Trans.

19 Thou hast brought me to great honour: and comforted me on every side.

20 Therefore will I praise thee[p] and thy faithfulness, O God, playing upon an instrument of musick: unto thee will I sing upon the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel.

21 My lips will be fain when I sing unto thee: and so will my soul whom thou hast delivered. shall greatly rejoice. Bib. Trans. See Vocab.

22 My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long: for they are confounded and brought unto shame that seek to do me evil.

PSALM lxxii.[q] Deus, judicium.

GIVE the King thy judgements, O God[r]: and thy righteousness unto the King's son.

2 Then shall he judge thy people according unto right: and defend the poor.

3 The mountains also shall bring though they are so plainly taught the contrary, by the restoration of the king of Israel, and the resurrection of the Son of God. Bp. Horne.

[n] 15. Thou, O God, hast taught me &c.] It was the God of Israel, who "taught" David, as a warrior, to conquer, and, as a Psalmist, to "declare the wondrous works" of his great Benefactor. He requests to be preserved in his old age, until, by completing his victories, and his Psalms composed to celebrate them, he had "shewed the strength and power of God," not only to the men of the "generation" in which he lived, but also to "every one that should come," or arise in after-times, and chant those divine hymns in the assemblies of the faithful, throughout all ages. Bp. Horne.

[o] 18. O what great troubles—hast thou shewed me! &c.] In David, delivered out of his troubles, and restored to his throne, we behold our Lord, after his "great and sore trouble, literally quickened, or revived, brought up again from the depths of the earth, increased in greatness, and comforted on every side." In Him we were virtually, by his grace we are actually, raised from sin and sorrow, to righteousness and comfort; and through his power we shall be raised, from dust and corruption, to glory and immortality. Bp. Horne.

[p] 20. Therefore will I praise thee &c.] The truth of God, in accomplishing his promises, by the redemption of our souls, and the confusion of our spiritual enemies, is a subject which demands a never-ceasing tribute of gratitude and love, of praise and thanksgiving. To celebrate it aright, with the melody of instruments, voices, and affections, all in perfect concord, is the duty and delight of the church militant; which, when thus employed, affords the best resemblance of the church triumphant. Bp. Horne.

[q] Psalm lxxii.] David, praying for Solomon, foretelleth his peaceful and glorious reign, and under that figure in most lively and beautiful colours pourtrayeth the kingdom of Messiah; 1—4, its righteous administration; 5, its duration; 6, 7, its blessings; 8, its extent; 9—11, the accession of the Gentiles to it; 12—14, the redemption to be wrought, and, 15, the prayers and praises to be offered up in it; 16, its miraculous increase and fruitfulness; 17, its perpetuity and universality; 18, 19, a doxology sung to God for it. Bp. Horne.

This Psalm was composed in contemplation of Solomon's succeeding David in the throne, and the happy days of his reign; and under that type looks forward to the days of the Messiah, as the Jews themselves apply it. Dr. Hammond.

[r] 1. Give the king thy judgements, O God: &c.] In this prophetical prayer, the aged monarch of Israel, about to resign the kingdom into the hands of his son Solomon, makes unto God the request of a wise father for him. He asks such a portion of wisdom and integrity from above, as might enable the young prince to govern aright the people of God, and to exhibit to the world a fair resemblance of that King of Israel, who was, in the fulness of time, to sit upon "the throne of his father David," Luke i. 32; "to reign in righteousness," Isa. xxxii. 1; and "to have all judgment committed unto him," John v. 22. Bp. Horne.

[s] 3. The mountains also shall bring peace: &c.] In other words, peace, manifested by its consequence, plenteousness, shall be upon all the mountains and little hills of Judea, by means of that righteous judgment which Solomon will execute in the land. And thus in the days of Messiah, "Beautiful upon the mountains were the feet of them that brought the glad tidings of peace;" which the fruits of the Spirit, in the churches, plainly shewed to have been derived from above, through the righteousness of the Redeemer, producing "peace on earth." Bp. Horne.

[t] 4. He shall keep the simple folk by their right: &c.] It is the part of justice, in well-ordered governments, to see that the "poor and needy have right;" to break the teeth of "oppression," and pluck indigence from its devouring jaws. This Christ performed, when, having undertaken the cause of his people against the adversary, He "saved" them by his resurrection, and "broke in pieces" the power of the great oppressor. Bp. Horne.

[u] 5. They shall fear thee, &c.] The kingdom of Solomon continued, in his own person, only for forty years; but in his seed, that is, Christ, it is established throughout all generations. He reigneth "over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Luke i. 33. His dominion over the world by his providence, and in the church by the influences of his grace, is to be coeval with that of the celestial luminaries in nature. And when the "moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed," when the heavens shall be dissolved, and the earth burnt up, "the Lord of hosts shall reign on mount Zion," in the Jerusalem above, in glory everlasting. See Isa. xxiv. 23. Bp. Horne.

[x] 6. He shall come down like the rain &c.] Refreshing and salutary, as the drops of heaven to the shorn and parched grass, is the mild administration of a wise and pious prince to his subjects. And what image can convey a better idea of those most beneficial and blessed effects, which followed the descent of the Son of God upon the earth, and that of the Spirit, at the day of Pentecost? The prophets abound with descriptions of those great events, couched in terms borrowed from the philosophy of rain and dew. See Isa. xliv. 3; lv. 10; Hos. xiv. 5; Heb. vi. 7. In the last words of David, the reign of Messiah is described under this figure: "He shall be as the tender grass, springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain," 2 Sam. xxiii. 4. Bp. Horne.

[y] 7. In his time shall the righteous flourish: &c.] By means of rain and dew, the grass springeth out of the ground. In the kingdom of Solomon, through the influences of his wisdom, good men were encouraged, righteousness flourished, and the land enjoyed tranquillity. In the days of Messiah, the fruit of the Spirit was righteousness, and the fruit of righteousness was "abundance of peace." He was the true "Melchisedeck," or "King of righteousness," and therefore the true Solomon, the "King of Salem, the Prince of peace." And his peace is to endure, when the moon shall have ceased to vary her appearances, and when a period shall be put to all sublunary vicissitudes. Bp. Horne.

[z] 8. His dominion shall be also &c.] As applicable to the kingdom of Solomon, this verse describes the extent and limits of the promised "land;" if it be interpreted of the wide-extended empire of Christ, that empire knows no bounds, but those of the "earth" itself. And it is observable that when the prophet Zechariah foretels the advent of "the King of Sion," in great humility, "meek, and riding on an ass," he describes the extent of his kingdom in these words, "His dominion shall be even from sea to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth," Zech. ix. 9, 10. Bp. Horne.

[a] 9. They that dwell in the wilderness &c.] Distant nations submitted themselves to the sceptre and prostrated themselves before the throne of Solomon, foreshewing the conversion of the heathen world (in the figurative language of prophecy, frequently styled, "the wilderness") to the Gospel, and the lowly adoration to be made by penitent sinners, at the footstool of the King of glory. They, who take not the advantage of the day of grace, will feel the rod of his power in the day of vengeance, when his "enemies" shall be subjected to Him; when death himself shall be destroyed; and "dust shall be the serpent's meat," Isa. lxv. 25; Gen. iii. 14. Bp. Horne.

[b] 10. The kings of Tharsis &c.] This verse suggesteth to our meditation several curious and interesting particulars, all tending to one and the same end. As 1. The munificent presents and immense treasures, brought to Solomon from Tarshish, and the isles of the Gentiles, 1 Kings x. 22, &c. 2. The coming of the queen of Sheba from the south, with her gifts and acknowledgments, to Jerusalem. 3. The offerings made by the eastern magi, as the first-fruits of the Gentiles, to the Saviour of the world. And, lastly, the accession of the nations to the faith, (even these "isles of the Gentiles,") bringing their glory and honour into the city of God. See Isa. xlix. lx; Rev. xxi. 24. Bp. Horne.

PSALM lxxiii.[i] Quam bonus Israel!

is said, 2 Chron. ix. 23. 26. 28, that "all the kings of the earth sought the presence of Solomon to hear his wisdom; that he reigned over all the kings, from the river even unto the land of the Philistines, and to the border of Egypt; and that they brought unto him horses out of Egypt, and out of all lands." The dominion of Christ is universal; and it will appear to be so at the last day; when, before men and angels, He shall prove his claim to the title, "King of kings, Lord of lords." Bp. Horne.

[d] 12—14. For he shall deliver the poor &c.] These three verses, considered as describing the just and merciful administration of Solomon, need no exposition. As prophetical of Messiah's reign, they may be thus connected with the context, and paraphrased: The kings and the nations of the earth shall accede to the church of Christ, induced so to do by the fame of his mercy, no less than by that of his majesty. They shall hear of the great deliverance wrought by Him for the poor in spirit, who make their prayer unto Him, confessing their sins, and acknowledging the inability of any creature, in heaven or earth, to recover them from their lost estate. These He shall spare, and pardon, and save from sin, and from death, and from hell. He shall, for this purpose, break the snares, and destroy the power, of their great oppressor, the devil; and so dear shall their blood be in his sight, that He shall shed his own for it; after which, arising to a new and immortal life, He shall accomplish the eternal redemption of his servants. Bp. Horne.

[e] 15. He shall live, &c.] As Solomon's reign was long and prosperous, that of Messiah is everlasting and glorious: as the rich brought presents to the one; so the nations offered up themselves, their possessions, their souls and their bodies, to the other: as the former was continually "prayed for," and blessed by his subjects, who owed peace and plenteousness to his government; so, with regard to the latter, prayer is made ever in the church, for the increase and consummation of his kingdom; and "daily is he praised" by his people, for all the riches of grace, for all the comforts of the Spirit, and for all the hopes of glory, which they possess, and enjoy, through Him. Bp. Horne.

[f] 16. There shall be an heap of corn &c.] As if it were said, The blessings of this spiritual kingdom shall be multiplied, like the produce of a very fruitful year, when the barren mountains yield a plentiful crop, and the standing corn shakes with the wind upon the hills, as the trees do upon Libanus and other mountains: and the cities shall yield forth fruit from this word sown among them, as kindly as the grass grows in a fertile pasture. Dr. Nicholls.

It is here foretold, that, in the days of Solomon, wonderful shall be the fruitfulness of Judea. Such, under the reign of King Messiah, was the amazing increase of the "word," when sown in hearts barren before; such the astonishing multiplication of citizens in the Christian church: as it is written, Acts vi. 7: "And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly." So let it be, blessed Lord, wheresoever thy Gospel is preached, throughout the world. Bp. Horne.

[g] 17. His Name shall endure for ever; &c.] The person and kingdom of Solomon have been used all along as a channel, through which to convey a most illustrious prophecy concerning those of Christ. But here the type seems to be wholly absorbed in the great antitype. His "name," his saving name, "shall indeed endure for ever, propagated" with the faith, through all the generations of men, while the "sun," another of his representatives, shall continue to maintain his station in the heavens, and to diffuse his light upon the earth. In Him, as it was promised to Abraham, shall all the true children of Abraham be "blessed" with the blessings of eternity; "all nations shall call him blessed," as they are taught to do in the remaining verses of this exalted composition. Bp. Horne.

[h] 18. Blessed be the Lord God, &c.] Blessed, therefore, be thou, O Lord Jesu! for thou art the Lord God, even the God of Israel, who hast wrought such miracles of mercy, for the salvation of the church: and blessed, by the tongues of men and angels, be thy holy and glorious name; and let the whole earth be filled with the amazingly transcendent and inconceivable majesty of thy most excellent glory, for evermore! So be it, so be it. Bp. Horne.

[i] Psalm lxxiii.] Most of the Psalms from this to the 107th are attributed to Asaph; supposed by some to be the famous singer in David's time, 1 Chron. xvi. 5; 2 Chron. v. 12: by Bp. Patrick to be Asaph the seer, who lived in the days of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix. 30; and whose Psalms were ordered to be sung together with those of David by that prince. But the house of Asaph being a noted family of the tribe of Levi, there were probably several composers of Psalms of that name, whose compositions are brought together in this collection. Dr. Nicholls.

The person speaking in this Psalm relates, 1—3, the process of a temptation, occasioned by his beholding the prosperity of wicked men upon earth, which he almost gone[l]: my treadings had well-nigh slipt.

3 And why? I was grieved at the wicked: I do also see the ungodly in such prosperity.

4 For they are in no peril of death: but are lusty and strong.

6 And this is the cause that they are so holden with pride: and overwhelmed with cruelty.

8 They corrupt other, and speak of wicked blasphemy: their talking is against the most High.

9 For they stretch forth their mouth[m] unto the heaven: and their tongue goeth through the world.

10 Therefore fall the people unto them[n]: and thereout suck they no small advantage.

11 Tush, say they, how should God perceive it: is there knowledge in the most High?

12 Lo, these are the ungodly[o], these prosper in the world, and these have riches in possession: and I said, Then have I cleansed[p] my heart in vain, and washed mine hands in innocency.

13 All the day long have I been punished: and chastened every morning.

14 Yea, and I had almost said[q] even as they: but lo, then I should have condemned the generation of thy children.

15 Then thought I to understand this, but it was too hard for me.

16 Until I went into the sanctuary of God[r]: then understood I the end of these men;

17 Namely, how thou dost set them[s] in slippery places: and castest them down, and destroyest them.

describes, 4—11, with, 12, 13, the suggestions of nature on the occasion; but, in opposition to these, grace urges, 14, the examples of saints, 15, the difficulty of judging concerning God's dispensations, and, above all, 16—19, the final issue of things at the last day, and the end of that prosperity, which had excited his envy. Perfectly satisfied with these considerations, 20, 21, he owns his uneasiness to have sprung from his ignorance; and, 22—27, closes the Psalm with the most affectionate expressions of his full trust and confidence in the divine mercy and goodness. No temptation is more common, or more formidable, than that above mentioned. A more powerful and effectual antidote to it cannot be devised, than this most instructive and beautiful Psalm affords. Bp. Horne.

[k] 1. Truly God is loving &c.] This declaration seems to be the result of a long struggle in the mind of the Psalmist, between nature and grace, in which the latter proves victorious, and, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary, determines, against the suggestions of the former, that God is the same good and merciful God to his church and people, if they do but preserve inviolable their fidelity to Him, whether, in this world, they enjoy prosperity, or endure affliction. Bp. Horne.

[l] 2. Nevertheless, my feet were almost gone: &c.] Temptations impede the progress of the Christian in the way of righteousness, and incline him to fall; as it happens to one who walks in a slippery path. The temptation, here complained of, is that excited by seeing wealth and honour in the hands of infidelity and villany, while the faithful servants of God are covered with infamy, and oppressed by poverty. A prospect of this sort is apt to make us distrust the love of heaven towards us, and its providence over us. For our benefit, therefore, in the course of this Psalm, the disease is particularized, and the remedy prescribed. Bp. Horne.

[m] 9. For they stretch forth their mouth &c.] They spare neither God nor man in their impious discourse: they open their mouth against heaven, and every thing else that is sacred; nor do they spare to take the liberty of abusing the holiest man upon earth. Dr. Nicholls.

[n] 10. Therefore fall the people unto them: &c.] This raises their credit in the opinion of ignorant people, which they are sure to turn to their own advantage. Travell.

[o] 12. Lo, these are the ungodly, &c.] The temptation is now stated in its full force. "These" worthless, ungodly, blasphemous wretches, whose characters I have been delineating, "these" are the men who prosper in the world, who succeed in every thing they undertake, and roll in riches! What are we to think of God, his providence, and his promises? Bp. Horne.

[p] —and I said, Then have I cleansed &c.] Nature will be apt upon this occasion to suggest, that all my faith, my charity, and my devotion, all my watching, and fastings, in short, all the labour and pains I have taken in the way of goodness, have been altogether vain and fruitless: since, while the rebellious enemies of God enjoy the world and themselves at pleasure, I, who continue his servant, am in perpetual tribulation and affliction. Bp. Horne.

[q] 14. Yea, and I had almost said &c.] The Psalmist, having thus particularized the disease, proceeds now, like a skilful physician of the soul, to prescribe a medicine for it, which is compounded of many salutary ingredients. And, first, to the suggestions of nature, grace opposes the examples of the children of God, who never fell from their hope in another world, because of their sufferings in this. For a man, therefore, to distrust the divine goodness on that account, is to belie their hope, renounce their faith, and strike his name out of their list. Bp. Horne.

[r] 16. Until I went into the sanctuary of God: &c.] Another argument, with which we may repress the spirit of murmuring and distrust, so apt to be excited by the prosperity of the wicked, is one communicated to us by the word of God, which alone can acquaint us with what is to be the "end," the final portion of sinners at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[s] 17. Namely, how thou dost set them &c.] Worldly

PSALM lxxiv.[b] Ut quid, Deus?

O God, wherefore art thou absent from us so long : why is thy prosperity is as the narrow and slippery summit of a mountain, on which, to answer the designs of his providence, God permits the wicked, during his pleasure, to take their station; till at length the fatal hour arrives, when, by a stroke unseen, they fall from thence, and are lost in the fathomless ocean of sorrow, torment, and despair. Bp. Horne.

[t] 19. Yea, even like as a dream &c.] The life of the ungodly is a sleep; their happiness a dream, illusive and transitory; at best a shadow; afterwards nothing. At the day of death, the soul is roused out of this sleep, and the dream vanishes. When God shall thus awaken them, He will "despise their image," He will bring to nought, and render utterly contemptible, even in their own sight, as well as that of Himself, of his holy angels, and the spirits of the righteous, those imaginary and fantastick pleasures, for which they have lost the substantial joys and glories of his heavenly kingdom. Now, therefore, while it will not be in vain, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light," Eph. v. 14. See Job xx. 4, &c. Isa. xxix. 8. Bp. Horne.

[u] 20. Thus my heart was grieved: &c.] The Psalmist, fully satisfied with the conduct of Providence, reflects upon the folly of his former uneasiness, and humbly owns, that his doubts were occasioned solely by his ignorance of God's ways; while he formed his judgment of them without having duly taken into consideration the final issue of things. The last day, when it comes, will bring with it a solution of all difficulties. He who bears impressed upon his mind such an idea of that day, as the Scriptures can give him, may solve them now. Bp. Horne.

[x] 22. Nevertheless, I am alway by thee: &c.] The remainder of the Psalm contains the most dutiful and affectionate expressions of a mind perfectly at ease, and reposing itself, with comfortable assurance, on the loving-kindness of the Lord, of which it had experienced a fresh instance in its support under the late temptation, and complete victory over it. "I am continually with thee," as a child under the tender care of a parent; and, as a parent, during my danger of falling in a slippery path, "thou hast holden me," thy child, "by my right hand." Bp. Horne.

[y] 23. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel: &c.] He, who but a little while ago seemed to question the providence of God over the affairs of men, now exults in happy confidence of the divine mercy and favour towards himself, nothing doubting but that grace would ever continue to guide him upon earth till glory should crown him in heaven. Such are the blessed effects of "going into the sanctuary," and consulting the "lively oracles" in all our doubts, difficultics, and temptations. Bp. Horne.

[z] 25. My flesh and my heart faileth: &c.] None of these things, in the abundance of which the wicked place their happiness, can deliver us in the day of death. "Flesh" must revert to dust, and the "heart" must cease its beating. He alone, therefore, is the proper object of our faith and love, who can support, and carry us through the dreadful hour, and then raise us again, to be our "portion for ever." Bp. Horne.

[a] 27. But it is good for me &c.] As if the Psalmist had said, in other words, Hear, therefore, the conclusion of the whole matter. Let others, dazzled by the blaze of worldly prosperity, forsake God, to obtain a share of it; or murmur against Him, because they cannot obtain it. I am persuaded, it now is, and finally will be, "good," delightful, profitable, and honourable, "for me to draw near," and join myself "to him;" which, in this life, I can do no otherwise, than by believing and hoping in his holy name: "I will put my trust in the Lord God," and excite others to do the same by "declaring his works," and dispensations; that all may perceive what an amazing difference will one day be made, between him who lusteth after the creature, and him who loveth the Creator. Bp. Horne.

[b] Psalm lxxiv.] This is another Psalm, composed during the time of the captivity by another Asaph, different from the author of the foregoing. It contains a very mournful relation of the destruction of the temple, most probably by Nebuchadnezzar's soldiers, and of the miserable calamities and reproaches which the Jews sustained in their captivity. Dr. Nicholls.

Upon whatever occasion this Psalm might have been originally composed, it is plainly intended for the use of the church in time of persecution. 1. She bemoans herself as deserted by God; the return of whose favour she entreats, 2, 3, on account of his having redeemed her, 4—10, of the ravages made, and, 11, the reproaches thrown out, by the enemy; 12—16, she reminds Him of the wonders formerly wrought in her behalf, and, 17, 18, of his power and goodness, manifested in the common course of nature; 20, of the relation in which she stands to Him; 21, of his covenant; 22, 23, of the honour of his name, and, 24, the increasing fury of her adversaries, just ready to swallow her up. Bp. Horne.

[c] 2. O think upon thy congregation: &c.] The Israelitish church pleads for mercy, upon these considerations, that God had formerly vouchsafed to redeem her from the Egyptian bondage, and to fix his residence on mount Sion, all which would prove to have been done in vain, should He leave her, at last, in the hands of her enemies. The redemption by Jesus Christ, and his habitation in the church Christian by his Spirit, are the corresponding arguments to be urged, on similar occasions, by her, and by the believing soul. Bp. Horne.

[d] 4. Lift up thy feet, &c.] God is represented as having withdrawn Himself, and departed afar off; He is therefore entreated to return without delay, to view the long-lasting desolations of the once highly favoured city, and the ravages made by aliens in the sanctuary; which could not but excite in Him compassion for his people, and indignation against their enemies. Bp. Horne.

[e] 5. Thine adversaries roar &c.] No sound can be more shocking than the confused clamours of an heathen army sacking the temple; no sight so afflicting, as that of "the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place." Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. 7. He that hewed timber afore &c.] As if it were said, It is well known from the sacred records of our nation, to what admirable beauty the skilful hand of the artificers brought the rough cedar-trees, which were cut down by the hatchets of Hiram's woodmen in the thick Tyrian forests, 1 Kings v. 10. But now they tear down all the curious carvings, that cost so much time and exquisite labour, with axes and hammers and such other rude instruments of iron. Dr. Nicholls.

The words suggest another reason why God should arise and have mercy upon Sion, lest his name should be blasphemed among the nations, when they saw and heard of the sacrilegious and horrible destruction wrought by the enemy; whom neither the majesty of the temple, nor the reverence of its divine inhabitant, could restrain from defacing the beauty of holiness. Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. They have set fire upon thy holy places: &c.] The gates of the second temple were set on fire by Antiochus; see 1 Macc. iv. 38; but the whole fabrick of the first was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar. Bp. Horne.

[h] 9. Yea, they said in their hearts, &c.] Such is the rage of infidels, when it pleases God, for the sins of his people, to let them loose upon the church as beasts of prey. From scenes like these, we learn the temper and disposition of that raging adversary of mankind and his associates: who, if permitted, would root Christianity out of every heart. "Watch, therefore, and pray," saith the Captain of our salvation to all his soldiers. Bp. Horne.

[i] 10. We see not our tokens, &c.] Darkness is horrible in itself, and adds horror to every thing else. The church therefore complains, that, in the midst of all her other troubles, she was deserted by the light of heaven. No "signs" or miracles were exhibited for her comfort; there was no "prophet" to inform her concerning the will of God, or to promise her an "end" of her afflictions, as Daniel did when she was a captive in Babylon. Bp. Horne.

[k] 11. O God, how long shall the adversary &c.] To an enumeration of calamities succeeds a prayer for deliverance, grounded on the necessity of God's vindicating the honour of his name from the insolent and blasphemous reproaches and scoffs of the enemy; see Ezek. xx. 9. He is therefore entreated to make bare his arm in the sight of the nations, and to let his right hand become glorious in the vindication of his name, and the defence of his inheritance. Bp. Horne.

[l] 14. Thou didst divide the sea &c.] The first part of this verse alludes to that marvellous act of Omnipotence, which divided the Red Sea, for Israel to pass over; the second part, to the return of its waves upon the heads of the Egyptians, who, like so many sea-monsters, opening their mouths to devour the people of God, were overwhelmed, and perished in the mighty waters. The Christian church is taught to contemplate, under this figure, the salvation of her children, and the destruction of their spiritual enemies, by the waters of baptism: see 1 Cor. x. 2, and the Office of Baptism in the Church of England. Parallel to this passage in our Psalm, is that most sublime one, Isa. li. 9—11. Bp. Horne.

[m] 15. Thou smotest the heads of Leviathan &c.] "Leviathan" stands for Pharaoh, or the Egyptian power, represented by the Egyptian animal, the crocodile of Nile, the Egyptian river. The "heads of Leviathan" are the princes of Egypt, the leaders of the Egyptian armies. And "the people, or inhabitants, of the wilderness," to whom they were given for a prey, are not men, but a species of wild beasts, haunting the deserts: see Isa. xiii. 21; and xxxiv. 14. The sense therefore is, that the bodies of Pharaoh and his captains were thrown on shore by the sea, and so became food for the wild beasts of the neighbouring deserts. The final destruction of the adversaries of Messiah's kingdom is described at large under a like image, Rev. xix. 17, &c. Bp. Horne.

[n] 16. Thou broughtest out fountains &c.] Two other remarkable exertions of the divine power in favour of the Israelites are here referred to. Water was brought out of the rock, to satisfy their thirst in the time of drought; and the river Jordan was dried up, to open the passage for them into Canaan. In the former of these transactions, faith beholds the water of life springing from the Rock of salvation; in the latter are discerned the mystick death and resurrection of Christians, as a prelude to the corporeal; when, rising from the depths of the grave, they shall enter into the kingdom of heaven. Bp. Horne.

[o] 17. The day is thine, &c.] From the miraculous interpositions of God, in behalf of his people, the church passes to those ordinary and standing evidences of his goodness towards us, the sweet vicissitudes of light and darkness, and the grateful succession of times and seasons, by which man is taught, in the most sorrowful night, to look for a joyful morning; and, during the severest winter, to expect a reviving spring. Thus is the revolving year our constant instructor and monitor; incessantly inculcating the duties of faith and hope, as well as those of adoration, gratitude, and praise. Bp. Horne.

[p] 19. Remember this, O Lord, &c.] After endeavouring to support her own faith, and excite the zeal of God for his inheritance, by a rehearsal of former mercies, the church again urges the argument of "reproach," touched on before at ver. 11, and then reminds her Saviour of that endearing appellation of his "turtle-dove," by which He had not disdained to address her in times past. This turtle-dove, simple, defenceless, solitary, meek, timid, and mournful, was in danger of being speedily devoured by her inveterate and implacable enemies; who, like birds of prey, beset her on all sides, thirsting impatiently for her blood. Bp. Horne.

[q] 21. Look upon the covenant, &c.] The main anchor of the holy ark, in storms and tempests, is faith in the covenant of grace, made from the beginning in Messiah; communicated to Noah, Abraham, David, &c., as his illustrious representatives, and in them to the house of Israel; accomplished (as Zacharias beareth witness by his song, Luke i. 72, &c.) at the birth of Christ, and then extended to the Gentiles. To this covenant, and the promises made therein, the church here appeals, at a time when the enemy ravaged the promised land at pleasure, and every thing seemed to forebode the utter extirpation of the law, and people of God. Hither, therefore, the soul is to fly for refuge, when nothing else seems capable of affording any. Bp. Horne.

[r] 23. Arise, O God, &c.] The church growing more importunate in her petitions, as the danger increases, beseeches God to appear in her cause, as being in effect his own, on account of his promises, his attributes of righteousness and truth, and the reproaches cast on Him, through his people. While speaking, she seems to hear the tumultuous clamours of the approaching enemy, growing every minute louder as they advance: and we leave the "turtle-dove," without the divine assistance, ready to sink under the talons of the rapacious eagle. Bp. Horne.

[s] PSALM lxxv.] This Psalm was composed, either by David, or by Asaph in David's name and person. It seems to relate to the time when David had entered upon, but not got full possession of, the kingdom. Poole.

The prophet, 1, 2, gives thanks, with the church, to PSALM lxxvi.[b] Notus in Judæa.

IN Jewry is God known[c]: his Name is great in Israel. Judah. Bib. Trans.

God for the manifestation of his name, and the wonders of salvation wrought thereby. 3. He declares his resolution of executing judgment and justice in his kingdom, which, 4, had been in disorder and confusion; 5, 6, he rebukes the wicked; 7—10, reminds them of the power, providence, counsels, and judgments of God; 11, 12, he concludes with repeating his resolution to praise God, to break the power of wickedness, and to establish righteousness. Bp. Horne.

[t] 3. When I receive the congregation: &c.] The first verse was spoken by many persons; "Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks:" here the speaker is one, and that one is plainly a ruler, who promises, that when he shall have "received the congregation," or, as some render it, "when he shall have gotten an appointed, or fit time, or season," that is, when he shall be established in power and authority, at a fit time and place, he will "judge uprightly," and introduce a thorough reformation into a kingdom, which, as we shall find by the following verse, stood greatly in need of it. From these circumstances it should seem most probable, that David is speaking of his advancement to the throne of Israel, and the intended rectitude of his administration, when he should be settled thereon. What David did in Israel, was done in the church universal by Him, who sat upon the throne of David, when He "received," for his inheritance, the great "congregation" of the Gentiles, and the earth was full of the "righteousness" of Jehovah. Bp. Horne.

[u] 4. The earth is weak, &c.] Civil distractions, and the continual irruptions of foreign enemies, had thrown the Israelitish affairs into confusion, and "dissolved" the frame of government; until, by the re-establishment of royal authority, countenance and support were again given to all the subordinate magistrates; who are, in their respective stations, the "pillars" of a community. Such was the universal corruption and dissolution of manners both among Jews and Gentiles, when Messias, entering upon his regal office, reformed the world, raised the glorious fabriek of the church, and made his apostles and their successors the "pillars" of his spiritual kingdom. Let men support religion, and God will support them. Bp. Horne.

[x] 5. — Set not up your horn.] The principal strength and defence of some beasts consisting in their horns, the word "horn" in Scripture language is used as an emblem of strength and power. To "lift up the horn" signifies to behave in a haughty boasting manner: to "break," or "cut off the horn," is to lessen the power of any one: and to "exalt the horns" is to raise and extend it. It seems to have been a custom among some nations, in times of peculiar triumph and rejoicing, for the great men to march in procession with a kind of "horn" bound upon their foreheads; and to prevent it from slipping off, they were obliged to hold their "necks" in a "stiff" erect position. Travell.

[y] 7. For promotion cometh &c.] For indeed it is God only that can exalt or suppress, and no power on earth can be properly said to do it: this is the privilege and prerogative of the one supreme super-eminent Ruler of the world. Dr. Hammond.

[z] 9. For in the hand of the Lord &c.] As the choicest of heavenly blessings are frequently in Scripture represented by the salutary effects of wine, a cup of which the master of the family is supposed to hold in his hand, ready to distribute due portions of it to those around him; so from the noxious and intoxicating qualities of that liquor, when drunk strong, and in too large a quantity, is borrowed a most tremendous image of the wrath and indignation of Almighty God. Calamity and sorrow, fear and trembling, infatuation and despair, the evils of the present life, and of that which is to come, are the bitter ingredients which compose this most horrible cup of mixture. It is entirely in the hand and disposal of God, who, through every age, has been pouring out, and administering of its contents, more or less, in proportion to the sins of men. But much of the strength and power of the liquor still remains behind, until the day of final vengeance. It will be then exhausted, even to the dregs, by unrepenting rebels; when "burning coals, fire, and brimstone," and eternal "tempest," shall be "the portion of their cup," Psalm xi. 7. Bp. Horne.

[a] 12. All the horns of the ungodly &c.] The prophet determines, as every good governor should do, to exert the authority with which he was intrusted; to break the power of triumphant wickedness, and to exalt that righteousness which exalteth a nation; hereby rendering himself a fit image of Him, who hath since done away transgression, and brought in everlasting righteousness, who will one day turn the wicked into hell, and exalt his faithful servants to reign with Him in heaven. Already He reigns in them upon earth; causing "all carnal affections to die in them, and all things belonging to the Spirit to live and grow in them." Bp. Horne.

[b] Psalm lxxvi.] This Psalm was probably written by that Asaph, who bears the name of the seer, 2 Chron. xxix. 30; and seems to be a song for a publick rejoicing after the great destruction of Sennacherib's army. Dr. Nicholls It is obvious at first sight to any one who reads this Psalm, that it was composed as a thanksgiving hymn, on account of some great deliverance, wrought for his people, by the immediate hand of God. The miraculous destruction of the Assyrian army by the angel, in the days of king Hezekiah, is generally pitched upon, as the subject of it, and affirmed to be so by the ancient Greek inscription prefixed to it in the Septuagint version. The prophet, 1, 2, declares the glory which God hath gotten Him in Israel; 3—6, describes the circumstances of the deliverance, with, 7, a reflection thereupon; 8—10, he mentions the effects it had produced among the nations, and, 11, 12, those which it ought to produce in Israelitish hearts. The ideas are to be transferred to the salvation of the church universal, by the destruction of sin and Satan, and the overthrow of the persecuting powers. Bp. Horne.

[c] 1. In Jewry is God known: &c.] On occasion of some great deliverance, the prophet speaks in transport concerning that presence and protection of God, which the highly favoured Judah once enjoyed. She enjoyed them while she continued faithful, and really was what she professed to be. But, on account of her infidelity, and rejection of her Messiah, an alteration of circumstances has taken place. The Gentile Christian church hath succeeded to the privileges of the Israelitish. In her now "God is known" by the Gospel; and "his name is great" in her, by reason of all the mighty wonders which He hath wrought for her: she is the true "Salem," or city of peace; she is the true "Sion," the spiritual, holy, and beloved hill; and in her is the "tabernacle" and "dwelling place" of God her Saviour, by the Spirit. Bp. Horne.

[d] 3. There brake he the arrows &c.] When God appeared in the defence of his ancient people, the weapons of their enemies were at once blunted and broken, and all the formidable apparatus of war became, in a moment, utterly useless. Such was the event, when the holy Jesus entered the lists against our spiritual adversaries, "for" us; and such ever will be the event, when He engages them "in" us. Bp. Horne.

[e] 4. Thou art of more honour &c.] This may be a beautiful apostrophe to mount Sion, (mentioned ver. 2,) as appearing infinitely more glorious and excellent, through the favour and protection of her God, than the arm of flesh and the instruments of war could render the kingdoms of the earth, which set themselves against her. Bp. Horne.

Or, the sense may be, O God, thou shewest thyself more mighty, than all the forces of those Assyrians, which dwell upon the mountains: yea, than the strongest powers upon earth, though seconded with the advantage of the steep and rocky mountains. Bp. Hall.

[f] 5. The proud are robbed, &c.] It must be acknowledged, that these two verses seem in a very particular manner to point at the miraculous destruction of Sennacherib's army, when the "stout-hearted," who doubted not of taking and spoiling the holy city, were themselves suddenly "spoiled" of strength and life; they "slept their sleep, and found not their hands;" they awaked not again to the use of their powers and faculties; a rebuking blast was sent from the God of Jacob, under which the flower of Assyria withered in the space of a night, and in the morning was no more; "the horse and his rider were cast into a dead sleep:" they slept the sleep of death. How, in a moment, "were the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!" How astonishing the downfal of the tyrant! How complete the triumph of the daughter of Sion! Such will be the destruction of the world; such the salvation of the people of God. Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. Thou didst cause thy judgment &c.] A destruction, so far exceeding human power, was evidently the sentence of God's judgment, audibly pronounced from the eternal throne; and it was heard by all the earth with an awful silence, as when He speaks to attentive nature in thunder. Such was the effect, which this interposition in behalf of his people produced among the surviving Assyrians, and the neighbouring nations. Let us carry our thoughts on to the sensations, which will be felt in the hearts of men at that hour, when the last trump shall sound in the heavens, and the earth shall shake from her foundations; when God shall arise to execute judgment on the adversaries of his church; and to save, with an everlasting salvation, all the meek and afflicted of the earth. Bp. Horne.

[h] 10. The fierceness of man shall turn to thy praise: &c.] The fierceness of man, and of Satan himself, against the church, turns, in the end, to the praise and glory of God, who represses it when at its height; and at all times appoints those bounds which it cannot pass, any more than the raging waves of the ocean can overflow their appointed barrier of sand. Bp. Horne.

[i] 11. Promise unto the Lord &c.] If such should have been the gratitude and devotion of Israelites, for a temporary deliverance from the fury of an earthly tyrant; how much higher ought that of Christians to rise, for eternal redemption from the great oppressor! How ought they to "vow and pay their vows unto the Lord their God; to bring presents," to offer all they have, and all they are, to Him who is so greatly "to be feared," so highly to be loved; to Him who "restrains" the fury of evil angels, as well as "the spirit of princes;" and is "terrible" to the powers of darkness, no less than to "the kings of the earth!" Bp. Horne.

12 He shall refrain the spirit of princes : and is wonderful among the kings of the earth.

[k] Psalm lxxvii.] This Psalm was probably composed by one of the house of Asaph, who lived during the captivity, the miseries and length of which he bemoans. Dr. Nicholls.

As the foregoing Psalm was evidently composed, when the church had obtained deliverance from her enemies, this seems no less plainly to have been written at a time when she was in captivity under them. It contains, 1—4, a complaint of sufferings; and, 5—20, a description at large of the struggle between distrust and faith; which latter prevails, by having recourse to the consideration of ancient mercies; particularly that of redemption from Egypt. The Psalm is admirably calculated for the use and consolation of any church, or soul, when in affliction and distress. Bp. Horne.

[l] 2. — my soul refused comfort.] The Psalmist means not to charge himself with the guilt of an impious despair or impatience; but he describes the assiduity of his religious exercises. His soul was never in such sort comforted, that he lost sight of his situation, and for a moment intermitted his devotions. Bp. Horsley.

[m] 4. Thou holdest mine eyes waking:] Through grief and anxiety it is, that the eyes are made to keep all the watches of the night, and wait in vain for sleep to relieve them from duty, until the dawning of the morning. Bp. Horne.

[n] 5, 6. I have considered the days of old: &c.] Recollection of former mercies is the proper antidote against a temptation to despair, in the day of calamity. And as in the divine dispensations, which are always uniform and like themselves, whatever has happened happens again when the circumstances are similar; the experience of "ancient times" is to be called in to our aid, and duly consulted. Nay, we may perhaps "remember" the time when we ourselves were led to compose and utter a "song" of joy and triumph, on occasion of signal mercies vouchsafed us. Upon these topicks we should, "in the night of affliction, commune with our own hearts, and make diligent search," as Daniel did in Babylon, into the cause, the nature, and the probable continuance of our troubles; with the proper methods of shortening, and bringing them to an end, by suffering them to have their intended and full effect, in a sincere repentance, and thorough reformation. Bp. Horne.

[o] 7—9. Will the Lord absent himself for ever: &c.] The Psalmist now relates the process of his meditations, and of that controversy which arose in his heart between faith and distrust. While he viewed the distressful scene around him, he found himself strongly tempted to question God's love of the church; to think that He had finally rejected his people; that the promised mercy of redemption would never be accomplished; and that indignation had constrained the bowels of our heavenly Father, which no longer yearned towards his afflicted children. Bp. Horne.

[p] 10. And I said, It is mine own infirmity: &c.] To the insinuations of distrust, faith now begins to reply. The sufferer checks himself in his former train of thought, and humbly acknowledges it to have sprung from a mind dispirited, and rendered timid, by misfortunes: "I said, This is my infirmity;" but he immediately strengthens himself by reflecting, that all "changes" in the conditions of men are effected, for reasons of infinite wisdom and goodness, by "the right hand of the Most High;" which is not shortened, but can still, as formerly, when he sees fit, deliver and exalt, as well as punish and depress, his people. Bp. Horne.

[q] 11. I will remember the works of the Lord: &c.] Thus restored to a right frame of mind, the Psalmist, instead of brooding any longer over the calamities of his own time, resolves to turn his thoughts towards the divine dispensations of old; to meditate on God's former works and wonders; his works of justice and mercy, of power and wisdom, of nature and grace; and, by gratefully celebrating them, to invigorate his faith in the salvation to come, of which there were so many earnests and pledges. And it is this consideration, which makes the eucharistick Psalms ever pleasing, and ever comfortable to the mind; they are appeals to those attributes which have been so often displayed in the cause of the church; they are acts of faith, looking backward to the past, and forward to the future; they are praises, and they are prayers. Bp. Horne.

14 Thou art the God that doeth wonders[r]: and hast declared thy power among the people.

15 Thou hast mightily delivered thy people: even the sons of Jacob and Joseph.

16 The waters saw thee, O God[s], the waters saw thee, and were afraid: the depths also were troubled.

17 The clouds poured out water[t], the air thundered: and thine arrows went abroad.

18 The voice of thy thunder was heard round about: the lightnings shone upon the ground; the earth was moved, and shook withal.

19 Thy way is in the sea[u], and thy paths in the great waters: and thy footsteps are not known.

20 Thou leddest thy people like sheep[x]: by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

EVENING PRAYER.

PSALM lxxviii.[y] Attendite, populc.

HEAR my law, O my people[z]: incline your ears unto the words of my mouth.

2 I will open my mouth in a parable[a]: I will declare hard sentences of old;

[r] 14. Thou art the God that doeth wonders: &c.] Israel, in times of trouble and distress, was wont to look back to the "wonders" wrought in Egypt, and the redemption of all her tribes from that house of bondage. We Christians are taught, while we use the same words, to regard parallel, but more important, transactions; we reflect on the "wonders" wrought for the bodies and souls of men, by the "strength and the arm" of Jehovah, revealed and manifested to the world in Christ; and we celebrate the redemption, not of "the sons of Jacob and Joseph" only, but of all nations, from the bondage of corruption; a redemption, compared with which, the deliverance from Egypt, though glorious in itself, hath yet no glory at all, by reason of the glory that so far excelleth. Our confidence in God, during the seasons of affliction, should therefore rise in proportion. Bp. Horne.

[s] 16. The waters saw thee, O God, &c.] The waters of the Red Sea are here beautifully represented as endued with sensibility, as seeing, feeling, and being confounded, even to the lowest depths, at the presence and power of their great Creator, when He commanded them to open a way, and to form a wall on each side of it until his people were passed over: until his people were passed over whom He had redeemed. In this amazing transaction, let us behold, as in a glass, the salvation of believers by baptism, through the death and resurreetion of Jesus Christ, who made the depths of the grave, as He had done those of the sea, a way for his ransomed to pass over; and the church, like another Israel, saw her enemies, in effect, dead at her feet. Bp. Horne.

[t] 17, 18. The clouds poured out water, &c.] See the history in Exod. xiv. 24. The verses now before us seem to explain more particularly the manner in which the Lord "looked upon, and troubled, and fought against the Egyptians," upon that occasion; namely, by thunders and lightnings, storms and tempests, rain, hail, and earthquake, the usual tokens and instruments of Almighty displeasure. From scenes like these, we learn to form an idea of that power which discomfited the infernal host; raised Christ from the dead; vanquished the opposition and persecution; subdued the world to the obedience of faith; supports and protects the church; will overthrow antichrist; raise the dead; cast the wicked, with death and Satan, into the lake of fire; and exalt the righteous to sing, with angels in heaven, "the song of Moses and of the Lamb." See Rev. xv. 3. Bp. Horne.

[u] 19. Thy way is in the sea, &c.] The dispensations and ways of God, like the passage through the Red Sea, are all full of mercy to his people; but they are also, like that, often unusual, marvellous, inscrutable; and we can no more trace his footsteps, than we could have done those of Israel, after the waters had returned to their place again. Bp. Horne.

[x] 20. Thou leddest thy people like sheep: &c.] The loving-kindness of God towards Israel did not stop at the Red Sea, but He conducted his chosen flock, by the guidance of faithful pastors, through all the perils of the wilderness, to the land of promise. We likewise, through thy mercy, O blessed Lord Jesus, have passed the Red Sea at our baptism; and are now journeying in the wilderness. Give us those meek and lowly and tractable dispositions, which become the sheep of thy pasture; set over us skilful and vigilant shepherds; and be thou ever both with them and with us; until, having surmounted all difficulties and dangers, led by grace, and supported by thy providence, we all come, in perfect safety, to the land of everlasting rest; there to live with thee, one fold under one shepherd, world without end. Bp. Horne.

[y] PSALM lxxviii.] This Psalm containeth a declaration of God's dealings with his people, and of their behaviour to Him, in Egypt, in the wilderness, and after their settlement in Canaan, to the days of David. It is written for the use and admonition of Christians; who may here view, as in a glass, the mercies they have received, and the returns which, alas! they have but too often made for them. Bp. Horne.

As the author closes his pious observations, taken out of the sacred history, with the reign of David; it is highly probable that the Asaph, who composed it, was the famous inspired singer, who belonged to the tabernacle in David's time. Dr. Nicholls.

[z] 1. Hear my law, O my people: &c.] In this verse the Psalmist opens his commission, and speaks, as one having authority from above to instruct the world. He demands a large and attentive audience, while, by a series of examples, he sets forth the goodness of God, and the ingratitude of man, for the admonition of succeeding ages, to the end of time. St. Paul, speaking of the very transactions related in our Psalm, saith of them, "Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples, and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come," 1 Cor. x. 11. We Christians, therefore, must consider ourselves as the "people" who are to "give ear to the law," or "doctrine," inculcated by the following epitome of the Israelitish history; we must "incline our ears to the words of" the prophet's "mouth." Bp. Horne.

[a] 2. I will open my mouth in a parable: &c.] It is observable, that our Lord is, by St. Matthew, said to have spoken to the multitude altogether in parables, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables," &c., citing the second verse of the Psalm now before us, Matt. xiii. 35. If it doth not follow from this citation, that the prophet actually speaks the Psalm in the person of Christ, yet thus much at least is evident from it, that the history of old Israel somewhat resembles the letter of the Gospel parables, and contains, shadowed out under it, the history of a correspondent state of things in the new Israel, or church Christian. Bp. Horne.

[b] 5—7. He made a covenant with Jacob, &c.] The account of God's dealings with his people, to be celebrated in our Psalm, begins with the "law," or "testimony, appointed and established in Israel," by the hand of Moses. Under these names are comprehended, not only the precepts and ceremonies, but the several transactions to which they referred, and in commemoration of which they were instituted; as also that future salvation, to which they, as well as the transactions, had an aspect. Thus the passover, for instance, looked backward to the redemption by Moses, and forward to that by Messiah. The law thus considered, as involving the Gospel within it, was, to understanding and pious Israelites, the fountain of wisdom and source of delight. They were to meditate therein day and night, and teach their children to do likewise; until, with its types realized, and its prophecies accomplished, in the Redeemer, it should go forth out of Sion in perfect beauty, and run and be glorified among the nations. The "law" and the "testimony" are now become ours; and it is our duty to transmit them down to latest posterity, until Jesus shall return to judgment. Bp. Horne.

[c] 10. Like as the children of Ephraim: &c.] As the context treats concerning the behaviour of Israel in general, upon their coming out of Egypt; and as the cowardice of the tribe of Ephraim in particular, at that time, is no where mentioned; it is therefore most probable that one tribe is here put for all the rest; and that, under the figure of men, when prepared for battle, turning their backs at sight of an enemy, is pointed out that disposition of the Israelites, after all their promises, resolutions, and vows of serving and obeying God, to fall away, and relapse into sin, upon the first temptation. How often is this the case with the Christian soldier! Let not him, who hath but just put on his spiritual armour, boast, like him who is putting it off, when the fight is over, and the victory obtained. Bp. Horne.

[d] 14. He divided the sea, &c.] From the miracles wrought in Egypt, the Psalmist proceeds to what happened at the Exodus. Bp. Horne.

[e] 18. Yet for all this they sinned more &c.] These frequent rebellions of Israel, with the presence of God in the midst of them, and his miracles before their eyes, would seem incredible, had they been related any where but in the oracles of truth; and did not the heart of every self-knowing Christian at once acknowledge the picture which is here drawn of human nature, its incredulity and perverseness. For hath not God delivered us from the house of bondage, and supported us in the wilderness? is not Jesus present in the church, and are not his miracles of love and mercy continually before our eyes, in the Word and in the Sacrament? Yet, who does not still "provoke" and "tempt the Most

21 He smote the stony rock indeed, that the water gushed out, and the streams flowed withal : but can he give bread also, or provide flesh for his people?

22 When the Lord heard this, he was wroth[f] : so the fire was kindled in Jacob, and there came up heavy displeasure against Israel;

28 He rained flesh upon them as thick as dust : and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea.

29 He let it fall among their tents : even round about their habitation.

30 So they did eat, and were well filled; for he gave them their own desire : they were not disappointed of their lust.

High?" who does not ask provision for his "lust," when his necessities are satisfied? and who, after all the proofs he has had of God's power and goodness, is not apt, upon every appearance of danger, to be diffident and distrustful of his providence? Before we condemn others, let us try ourselves, and judge righteous judgment. Bp. Horne.

[f] 22. When the Lord heard this, he was wroth : &c.] The discontents mentioned above, in verse 18, &c., were posterior not only to the miracle at the rock, but also to the gift of "manna," which, after some little time, the people "loathed," and demanded "flesh," repenting that they had forsaken Egypt, where they fared more to their satisfaction : see Numb. xi. The cause of the discontents was infidelity, and the effect of them a display of God's indignation : "The Lord was wroth—because they believed not," &c. Now, as St. Paul styles the water "spiritual," or sacramental "drink," proceeding from "a spiritual rock, which rock was Christ;" so he terms the manna, "spiritual," or sacramental "meat :" "they did all eat of that same spiritual meat," 1 Cor. x. 3. And our Lord, in John vi, discourses at large upon the subject, to convince the Jews, that God, who gave to their fathers manna in the wilderness, had in HIM given them "the true bread" of eternal life, which the manna was intended to represent. "I am the living bread which came down from heaven : if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever; and the bread, that I will give, is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Christ crucified is the support of spiritual and eternal life; faith is the mouth by which this support is received; manna was an outward and visible sign of it to the Israelites in the wilderness; the eucharistick bread is such to Christians in the world. When that holy ordinance is celebrated, "the doors of heaven are opened," spiritual food is given from above, "and man eats the bread of the mighty ones;" whether by "mighty ones" we understand those who eat the bread, and are invigorated thereby, or the blessed persons who give the bread to man. Such is our manna, our sustenance in the wilderness, our viaticum, while on the road to Canaan. But how is it "loathed," and despised, in comparison with "the flesh-pots of Egypt," by men who "believe not in God, and trust not in his salvation!" Will not the same cause produce the same effect? Will not "Jehovah hear this, and be wroth?" Will not "a fire be kindled against Jacob, and anger also come up against Israel?" "For this cause," saith an apostle to the irreverent Corinthian receivers, "many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep," 1 Cor. xi. 30. Bp. Horne.

[g] 27. He caused the east-wind &c.] The people, discontented with manna, asked, in a tumultuous and rebellious way, for flesh, at the same time distrusting the power of God to give it them in the wilderness. Flesh, however, was procured. A wind, proper for the occasion, went forth from Jehovah, and brought a cloud of quails, which furnished the whole camp with a most delicious kind of flesh food, for the space of an entire month. But from the event we learn, that inordinate desires, though sometimes complied with, and satisfied by heaven, do not therefore go unpunished; on the contrary, they are often punished by being complied with. Bp. Horne.

[h] 32. But for all this they sinned yet more, &c.] Mercies are followed by provocations; provocations are punished with judgments; to judgments succeed repeated provocations, which call down fresh judgments. Immediately after the history of the quails, we read of a sedition stirred up by Aaron and Miriam, and of new murmurs at the report, brought by the spies, concerning the promised land; in consequence of which last, the nation had been destroyed, but for the intercession of Moses; and the whole generation of those who came out of Egypt, except Joshua and Caleb, actually fell in the wilderness, wasted and consumed by various plagues and calamities, during a forty years' peregrination; see Numb. xii—xiv. St. Jude makes mention of such a generation in the early days of the Christian church, speakers of "hard speeches against Christ, murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts;" and he therefore puts converts "in remembrance, how that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not," Jude, verse 5, and 15. Bp. Horne.

[l] 34. When he slew them, they sought him: &c.] Several instances of this behaviour occur in the history of Korah's rebellion and punishment, of the fiery serpents, and of Israel and Moab: see Numb. xvi. xx, xxi. xxv. The Israelites, in this particular, resembled their great persecutor Pharaoh; their repentance, which came with the divine judgments, went also away with them, and appeared no more. Bp. Horne.

[k] 38. But he was so merciful, &c.] Had God "stirred up all his wrath," the Israelites must have been exterminated in the wilderness. But then the promises made to Abraham, of mercy and "compassion" to them, and by them to all mankind, had failed. Therefore they "were forgiven," and not "destroyed:" judgment was executed, from time to time, upon the persons of offenders; but still a remnant was left; the nation subsisted, until the seed came to whom the promise was made. Nay, although, in consequence of their last and greatest crime, their polity was subverted with their city and temple, the race is yet marvellously preserved; and we trust, preserved for mercy to be shewn them in the last days. Bp. Horne.

[l] 44. How he had wrought his miracles in Egypt: &c.] The Psalm goes back to the subject of Israelitish ingratitude, mentioned at the beginning, verse 11, 12, in order to introduce an account of the miracles wrought in Egypt previous to the Exodus. These miracles were intended to evince the superiority of Jehovah over the elements and powers of nature, which at that time were objects of worship amongst the Egyptians, but plainly appeared to act at the command of Moses, in subordination to their great Creator, the God of the Hebrews. In the heavens, on the earth, and in the waters, supremacy and independency were demonstrated to belong to Him only; fire and air, thunder and lightning, wind, rain, and hail, obeyed his word: rivers became blood, and their inhabitants perished; insects and animals left their wonted habitations, to destroy vegetables, or torment man: so that wherever the gods of Egypt were supposed to reside, and to exert their influences in favour of their votaries, in all places, and in all circumstances, victory declared for Jehovah. Hence modern as well as ancient idolaters may learn not to put their trust in the world, but in Him who made, and who can and will destroy, it; whose power can render the most insignificant of his creatures instruments of his vengeance, and, in a moment, arm all the elements against sinners; and whose mercy will employ that power in the final salvation of the church; when, as the author of the book of Wisdom expresseth it, "He shall make the creature his weapon for the revenge of his enemies, and the world shall fight for him against the unwise," Wisd. v. 17. 20. The curious and striking reflections which that author makes on the plagues of Egypt, in chap. xi. xvii—xix, are well worthy an attentive perusal. Bp. Horne.

[m] 50. He casts upon them the furiousness of his wrath, &c.] Some of the Egyptian plagues having been specified in the foregoing verses, others of them are here thrown together, and the whole scene is affirmed to have been a full display of wrath and vengeance, executed upon the oppressors of the church by "evil angels, agents, or messengers:" whether by this expression we understand the material instruments of divine displeasure; or angels employed as ministers of vengeance; or the actual appearance and ministration of evil spirits, suffered to torment the wicked in this world, as they certainly will do in the next. Bp. Horne.

last plague was the death of the first-born both of man and beast, Exod. xii. 29; when God, having removed every obstacle that mercy had thrown in the path of justice, "made a way to his indignation," which then rushed forth like a fiery stream. An unlimited commission was given to the destroyer, who at midnight passed through the land, and gave the fatal stroke in every house. Pharaoh and all his servants rose up in the night; there was a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt; and universal consternation reigned, inferior only to that which is to extend its empire over the world, when "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised." May we be saved, like Israel, in that hour, through the blood of the true paschal Lamb, slain to take away the sins of the world! "When I see the blood," says Jehovah to his people, "I will pass over you." Bp. Horne.

[o] 53. But as for his own people, &c.] Having related the punishments inflicted on Egypt, the Psalmist returns to those mercies experienced by the Israelites, when God overthrew their enemies, took them under his protection, fed and conducted them in the wilderness, brought them to the promised land, expelled the heathen, settled his people, and at length fixed his residence on mount Sion, which is represented as the conquest and acquisition of his own arm; since the victories of Joshua, &c. were all owing to the divine presence and assistance. The Christian church, after her redemption by "the blood of the Lamb," passed three hundred years in a state of minority, as it were, and under persecution, which, with allusion to what befel Israel of old, is called in the Revelation, her flight and abode in the wilderness: Rev. xii. 6. At length the true "Joshua," or Jesus, "brought" her "into the possession of the Gentiles;" see Acts vii. 45; and she enjoyed a temporary rest and prosperity. But no terrestrial Canaan, no secular advantages, should make us forget, as the Jews did, and as Christians are apt to do, that the church is in the wilderness, while she is in the world; and that "there remaineth yet" another and far more glorious "rest for the people of God," after which they ought ever to be aspiring. See Heb. iv. 9. Bp. Horne.

[p] 57. So they tempted, &c.] The Israelites when settled in the promised land, soon shewed themselves to be the genuine descendants of those men who tempted God in the desert. We can hardly read two chapters in the book of Judges, but we meet with the words, "And the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord." For this their frequent revolting they are compared to "a deceitful bow," which, when put to the trial, is sure to disappoint the archer, either dropping the arrow at his feet, or carrying it wide of the mark. Their zeal and love were either wholly relaxed and enervated by sensuality and indolence, or else turned aside, and misplaced on false objects of worship. Bp. Horne.

[q] 60. When God heard this, he was wroth: &c.] Rebellion against God, will, sooner or later, draw down his vengeance, and cause the most beloved nation to be "abhorred" by Him: He will forsake the place of his residence, "the tent placed among men," where He dwelleth by his Spirit; and the church, by which his "strength" and his "glory" are manifested to the world, shall go "into captivity, and the enemy's hand." All this we are taught by that which came to pass in Israel, when, for the sins of priests and people, the ark of God, which then abode in Shiloh, was suffered to fall into the hands of the Philistines: 1 Sam. iv. The present state of Jerusalem, and of all the once-flourishing Eastern and African churches, speaks aloud the same awful and concerning truth. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Bp. Horne.

[r] 63. He gave his people over also unto the sword: &c.] These verses refer to the slaughter of Israel by the Philistines, which was an effect of divine wrath, compared here, as elsewhere, to "a consuming fire;" they refer likewise to the death of old Eli, of Hophni and Phinehas, and the widow of Phinehas, who expired in childbed, on hearing the mournful news: 1 Sam. iv. His-

71 He chose David also his servant[u]: and took him away from the sheep-folds.

72 As he was following the ewes great with young ones he took him: that he might feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance.

PSALM lxxix.[x] Deus, venerunt.

King Charles's Mart. first Psalm Even. Serv.

O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance: thy holy temple have they defiled, and made Jerusalem an heap of stones.

2 The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the air: and the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the land.

3 Their blood have they shed like water on every side of Jerusalem: and there was no man to bury them.

4 We are become an open shame to our enemies: a very scorn and derision unto them that are round about us.

5 Lord, how long wilt thou be angry: shall thy jealousy burn like fire for ever?

6 Pour out thine indignation[y] upon the heathen that have not known thee: and upon the king-tory abounds with the tragical stories of wars and captivities: Scripture informs us they are the judgments of God against sin. But calamities affect us not, till they become our own: it is well if they reform us, even when they do become so. Bp. Horne.

[s] 66. So the Lord awaked &c.] While, by God's permission, the Philistines were chastising his people for their sins, He held his peace, and seemed unconcerned, as one asleep. But when due chastisement had brought the delinquents to themselves, the cries of penitent Israel awakened, as it were, and called forth the zeal of the Lord of hosts, to vindicate his honour, and deliver his servants: and then the vigour of his operations was such, as might be compared to the alacrity and courage of a mighty champion, when, refreshed and inspirited by wine, he attacks his adversaries, and bears down all before him. Under all our sufferings let us rest contented with this assurance, that God acts the part of a father; and will therefore remove the rod, when it has answered the end proposed. Bp. Horne.

[t] 68. He refused the tabernacle of Joseph: &c.] The ark, after its return, went no more to Shiloh, which was in the tribe of Ephraim, the son of Joseph, but was brought first to Kiriathaim, 1 Sam. vi. 21, a city of the tribe of Judah, and from thence, after a short stay at the house of Obed-Edom, to mount Sion, 1 Chron. xiv, and xv, which was the chosen and highly favoured mount; where was afterward erected, by Solomon, a magnificent and permanent habitation for the God of Jacob, during the continuance of the old dispensation: a resemblance of that eternal temple, in which all the fulness of the Godhead hath since dwelt bodily. The divine presence removed at this time to the tribe of Judah, because out of that tribe, after the rejection of Saul, came the great representative, as well as progenitor, of King Messiah. Bp. Horne.

[u] 71. He chose David also his servant: &c.] The call of David from a sheepfold to a throne teacheth us, that he, who hath shewed himself faithful in a few and small concerns, is worthy of promotion to more and more important cares; that the qualifications, requisite for the due discharge of high offices, are best learned, at first, in an inferior station, especially if it be one that will inure to labour and vigilance; and that kings are to consider themselves as "shepherds;" which consideration would perhaps teach them their duty better than all the precepts in the world. From the last verse, relative to David's manner of conducting himself after his advancement, we learn that integrity and discretion, when they meet in the same person, form a complete ruler, and one fit to represent that blessed person who entered, like his father David, through sufferings into his glory; who governeth his church in wisdom and righteousness; and of whom it is said, by the evangelical prophet, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young," Isa. xl. 11. Bp. Horne.

[x] Psalm lxxix.] The argument of this Psalm is nearly the same with that of the 74th. The church, persecuted and afflicted, sets forth, 1—3, the sacrilegious devastation, and cruel slaughter, made by the enemy, with, 4, the reproach occasioned thereby; 5—7, she prayeth for redress and deliverance; 8, 9, confesseth, and entreateth forgiveness of the sins which had brought these calamities upon her; and then, 10—13, asketh a removal of her reproach and misery; promising, 14, endless gratitude and praise for the same. We meet with passages of this Psalm, Jer. x. 25; 1 Macc. vii. 17: but when it was composed is not known. Bp. Horne.

It was probably composed by the same Asaph, who wrote the 74th Psalm, which is upon the same subject: namely, the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Dr. Nicholls.

[y] 6. Pour out thine indignation &c.] This, though uttered in the form of a wish, or prayer, is to be considered, like many other passages of the same nature, as a prediction of what would afterwards come to pass. Pagan ambition and cruelty were often employed to chastise offending Israel; but were, themselves, notwithstanding, justly punished, in their turn, by other powers raised up for that end. That relation, in which doms that have not called upon thy Name.

7 For they have devoured Jacob: and laid waste his dwelling-place.

8 O remember not our old sins, but have mercy upon us, and that soon: for we are come to great misery.

9 Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy Name: O deliver us, and be merciful unto our sins, for thy Name's sake.

10 Wherefore do the heathen say[z]: Where is now their God?

11 O let the vengeance of thy servants' blood that is shed: be openly shewed upon the heathen in our sight.

12 O let the sorrowful sighing of the prisoners come before thee: according to the greatness of thy power, preserve thou those that are appointed to die.

13 And for the blasphemy[a] wherewith our neighbours have blasphemed thee: reward thou them, O Lord, seven-fold into their bosom[b].

14 So we, that are thy people[c], and sheep of thy pasture, shall give thee thanks for ever: and will alway be shewing forth thy praise from generation to generation.

PSALM lxxx.[d] Qui regis Isroel.

HEAR, O thou Shepherd of Israel[e], thou that leadest Joseph like a sheep: shew thyself also, thou that sittest upon the cherubims.

2 Before Ephraim[f], Benjamin, and Manasses: stir up thy strength, and come, and help us.

3 Turn us again, O God[g]: shew the light of thy countenance, and we shall be whole.

the church stands to God, causes Him, upon her repentance, to appear in her behalf, and to execute vengeance on her oppressors, who "know him not, nor call upon his name." "We are thine," saith Isaiah; "thou never barest rule over them, they were not called by thy name," lxiii. 19. The church, for her sins, may deserve to suffer; but her enemies are not therefore without guilt, nor will they escape without punishment. Bp. Horne.

[z] 10. Wherefore do the heathen say: &c.] It is for "the glory of God's name," to deliver his church; because, while she is in trouble, that name is blasphemed by the enemy, as if he wanted either power, or will, to prevent or remove the calamities of his servants. Prayer is therefore here made by the faithful, that God, not to gratify any vindictive spirit of theirs, but to vindicate his own attributes, would break the teeth of the oppressor, and work a publick and glorious salvation for his chosen: at beholding which, the very adversaries themselves might possibly be converted. Bp. Horne.

[a] 13. And for the blasphemy &c.] That is, As they have reproached thee with weakness, so manifest to others their weakness, who are but sinful dust and ashes; as they have endeavoured to make thee contemptible, so let the world have just cause to despise them, who have thus presumptuously offended; according as it is written, "Them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed," 1 Sam. ii. 30. And, however different the appearance of things may now be, this will certainly be found true, in every instance, at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[b] — into their bosom.] This is an allusion to the long mantles worn by the Jews, in which the common people used often to carry corn and other things. See Luke vi. 38. Travell.

[c] 14. So we, that are thy people, &c.] Such is the resolution of a church under persecution; and such ought to be the practice of every church, when delivered out of it, and restored to the favour and protection of her God. The same is the duty of every soul, with regard to afflictions and mercies of a private kind. But how glorious will be the day, when, triumphant over sin and sorrow, over every thing that exalteth and opposeth itself, the church universal shall behold the adversary disarmed for ever; while she herself, placed in pastures of joy, and led to the waters of eternal comfort, shall, from age to age, incessantly sing the praises of her great Shepherd and Bishop, her King and her God! Bp. Horne.

[d] PSALM lxxx.] The church, still in captivity, 1—3, crieth unto God for help and redemption; 4—7, complaineth of her grievous afflictions; 8—13, describeth her former exaltation, and present depression, under the beautiful figure of a vine: 14—16, returneth again to her supplications, and, 17—19, prayeth for the advent of Messiah to quicken and comfort her, vowing all loyal obedience, adoration, and praise to Him, as the Author of her salvation. Bp. Horne.

The person, who composed this Psalm, was one of the family of Asaph, who was carried into captivity, and indited this hymn on the same subject as the former. Dr. Nicholls.

[e] 1. Hear, O thou Shepherd of Israel, &c.] O thou great Ruler and Protector of thy people Israel: thou, that both guidest and defendest the posterity of Joseph, as a good shepherd doth his flock; thou, that art graciously wont to manifest thy presence in thy mercy-seat, which is between the wings of the cherubim; look down graciously upon us, and shew thy power in our deliverance. Bp. Hall.

[f] 2. Before Ephraim, &c.] God is intreated to go forth, in his strength and his salvation, before the tribes of Israel, as formerly in the wilderness. Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, are particularly mentioned; perhaps, because, according to the established order, those three tribes immediately followed the ark and cherubim, the symbols of the divine presence. See Numb. ii. 18. 20. 22. Bp. Horne.

[g] 3. Turn us again, O God: &c.] This verse is a kind of chorus, occurring three times in the course of our Psalm. It implies, that the church is in captivity, from which she prayeth to be "restored" to her former freedom and prosperity; that she expecteth such restoration, not from any might or merit of her own, but from the grace and mercy of her Saviour; as well knowing, that her night can be turned into day, and her winter give place to spring, only by the Sun of Righteousness rising, and causing his face to shine upon her desolations. Bp. Horne.

4 O Lord God of hosts: how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth?

5 Thou feedest them with the bread of tears[h]: and givest them plenteousness of tears to drink.

6 Thou hast made us a very strife unto our neighbours: and our enemies laugh us to scorn.

7 Turn us again, thou God of hosts: shew the light of thy countenance, and we shall be whole.

8 Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt[i]: thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it.

9 Thou madest room for it: and when it had taken root it filled the land.

10 The hills are covered with the shadow of it: and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedar-trees.

11 She stretched out her branches[k] unto the sea: and her boughs unto the river.

12 Why hast thou then broken down her hedge[l]: that all they that go by pluck off her grapes?

13 The wild boar out of the wood[m] doth root it up: and the wild beasts of the field devour it.

14 Turn thee again, thou God of hosts[n], look down from heaven: behold, and visit this vine;

15 And the place of the vineyard that thy right hand hath planted: and the branch that thou madest so strong for thyself.

16 It is burnt with fire[o], and cut

[h] 5. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears: &c.] There cannot be a more striking picture of Sion in captivity. Her bread is dipped in tears, and her cup is filled to the brim with them: no time is free from grief and lamentation. Bp. Horne.

[i] 8. Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: &c.] God is reminded of the favour once shewn by Him to the church of Israel, and of that prosperity which she once enjoyed. She is compared to a "vine," removed, from the unkindly soil of Egypt, to the happier regions of Canaan, and there planted by Jehovah, in the place of nations extirpated for their unfruitfulness. The vine is a plant weak and lowly, and needing support; when supported, wild and luxuriant, unless restrained by the pruning-knife; capable of producing the most valuable fruit; but, if barren, the most unprofitable among trees, and fit only for the flames. In all these respects it is a lively emblem of the church, and used as such by Isaiah v. 7; by Ezekiel xv, xvii, xix; and by our Lord Himself, Matt. xxi. 33. The Christian church, after her redemption, by the death and resurrection of Jesus, was planted in the heathen world, as Israel had been in Canaan; and the description suits one as well as the other. Bp. Horne.

[k] 11. She stretched out her branches &c.] This relates to the extent of Palestine, which was occupied by the tribes of Israel, even from the Mediterranean "sea," westward, to the "river" Euphrates, eastward. This was promised, Deut. xi. 24: "From the river Euphrates to the uttermost sea shall your coast be;" and fulfilled in the days of Solomon. See 1 Kings iv. 21; Ps. lxxii. 8. To the Christian church the whole earth was the land of promise, and the Gospel was preached to all nations: "I will give thee," saith Jehovah to Christ, "the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession," Ps. ii. 8. Bp. Horne.

[l] 12. Why hast thou then broken down her hedge: &c.] The Psalmist, having described the exaltation of Israel, under the figure of a vine, proceeds, under the same figure, to lament her depression. She is now represented as deprived of the protection of God, the counsels of the wise, and the arms of the valiant; of all her bulwarks and fortifications, and whatever else could contribute to her defence and security; so that, like a vineyard without a fence, she lay open on every side to the incursions and ravages of her neighbouring adversaries; who soon stripped her of all that was valuable, and trod her under foot.

[m] 13. The wild boar out of the wood &c.] Fierce and unrelenting, her heathen persecutor issued, at different times, for his abode, like a "wild boar" out of the forest, resolved not only to spoil and plunder, but to eradicate and extirpate her for ever. Nor let the church Christian imagine, that these things relate only to her elder sister. Greater mercies, and more excellent gifts, should excite in her greater thankfulness and call forth more excellent virtues; otherwise they will serve only to enhance her account, and multiply her sorrows. If she sin, and fall after the same example of unbelief, she must not think to be distinguished in her punishment, unless by the severity of it. She may expect to see the favour of heaven withdrawn, and the secular arm, instead of supporting, employed to crush her; her discipline may be annihilated, her unity broken, her doctrines perverted, her worship deformed, her practice corrupted, her possessions alienated, and her revenues seized; till at length the word be given from above, and some antichristian power be unchained, to execute upon her the full vengeance due to her crimes. Bp. Horne.

[n] 14. Turn thee again, thou God of hosts, &c.] The church, thus distressed and desolated, offereth a prayer for the return of the divine favour, and for a gracious visitation from on high; she beseecheth God to look down, with an eye of pity, from heaven, on the vineyard, which his own hands had "planted," and on that royal branch, the family of David, in particular, which He had raised and established for Himself, to accomplish his eternal purpose of saving mankind by Messiah, who was, one day, to spring from the root of Jesse. To the advent of this Son of man, Israel was ever accustomed to look forward, in time of affliction: on his second and glorious advent the Christian church must fix her eye, in the day of her calamities. Bp. Horne.

[o] 16. It is burnt with fire, &c.] The sad estate of the vineyard is yet again set forth, to excite the compassion of heaven. As to the latter clause of this verse, "they shall perish at the rebuke of thy countenance," it may be supposed to predict the fate of the adversaries, when God should deliver his people out of their hands. Bp. Horne.

down: and they shall perish at the rebuke of thy countenance.

17 Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand[p]: and upon the son of man, whom thou madest so strong for thine own self.

18 And so will not we go back from thee[q]: O let us live, and we shall call upon thy Name.

19 Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts: shew the light of thy countenance, and we shall be whole.

PSALM lxxxi.[r] Exultate Deo.

SING we merrily unto God[s] our strength: make a cheerful noise unto the God of Jacob.

2 Take the psalm, bring hither the tabret: the merry harp with the lute.

3 Blow up the trumpet in the new moon[t]: even in the time appointed, and upon our solemn feast-day.

4 For this was made a statute for Israel[u]: and a law of the God of Jacob.

5 This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony: when he came out of the land of Egypt, and had heard a strange language. The posterity of Joseph, used for the people of Israel. See Ps. lxxx. 1. Poole.

6 I eased his shoulder from the burden[x]: and his hands were delivered from making the pots.

"They shall perish:" they, the spoilers of the vineyard, described under the image of the wild boar and beasts in the 13th verse. Bp. Horsley.

[p] 17. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand: &c.] These phrases, "the man of thy right hand," and "the son of man," if at all applicable, in a lower and subordinate sense, to a temporal king of Israel, considered as a representative of Messiah, are most certainly in their full and prophetical acceptation intended to denote King Messiah Himself. Assured of his coming, the church prayeth that the "hand," the protection, and the power of Jehovah might be "upon" Him, over Him, and with Him, in his great undertaking finally to deliver her out of all her troubles, and to "lead her captivity captive." Bp. Horne.

As if it were said, Do thou prosper and bless the great work of thy dear and powerful Messiah; even that Son of man, that Son of God, that God and man, whom thou hast set apart for this blessed work of mediation, and furnished with power and graces fit for so glorious an employment. Bp. Hall.

[q] 18. And so will not we go back from thee: &c.] The end of our redemption is, that we should serve Him who hath redeemed us, and "go back" no more to our old sins. That soul, which hath been "quickened," and made alive by Christ, should live to his honour and glory; that mouth, which hath been opened by Him, can do no less than shew forth his praise, and "call upon his" saving "name." Bp. Horne.

[r] Psalm lxxxi.] This Psalm, whensoever, or by whomsoever, composed, was, probably, intended to be sung at the feast of trumpets, as also at any other feast-time. It contains, 1—3, an exhortation duly to observe the festivals of the church, 4, 5, as God had appointed, who is introduced expostulating with his people, on account, 6—11, of his mercies, and, 12, 13, their ingratitude, and, 14—17, under the form of a most affectionate wish, renewing his promises, on condition of their obedience. Bp. Horne.

It is attributed, not improbably, to Asaph of David's time. Dr. Nicholls.

[s] 1. Sing we merrily unto God &c.] If Israelites were thus exhorted to keep their feast-days with joy and gladness of heart; to exalt their voices, and join together all their sweetest instruments of musick, in honour of Him who had rescued them from the Egyptian bondage, and given them a law from Sinai; in what exulting strains ought we to celebrate the festivals of the Christian church? With what triumph of soul, and harmony of affections, are we bound to "sing aloud to God our strength," who hath redeemed us from death, and published the Gospel from Sion? since, as the apostle saith, "holy days, new moons, and sabbath days," of old, "were" only "a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." Col. ii. 16, 17. Bp. Horne.

[t] 3. Blow up the trumpet in the new moon: &c.] In the Jewish church, notice was given of feasts, jubilees, &c. by sound of trumpet. All the new moons, or beginnings of months, were observed in this manner; see Numb. x. 1; but on the September new moon, or first day of the seventh month, was kept a great festival, called "the feast of trumpets;" Lev. xxiii. 24; Numb. xxix. 1; which, probably, is here intended. This September new moon had a particular regard paid to it, because, according to the old calculation, before Israel came out of Egypt, it was the first new moon in the year, which began upon this day, the first of the (afterwards) seventh month. The tenth of the same month was the great day of atonement; and on the fifteenth was celebrated the feast of tabernacles. See Lev. xxiii. 27, and 34. Our Psalm, therefore, seems to have been designed for the purpose of awakening and stirring up the devotions of the people upon the solemn entrance of a month, in which they were to commemorate so many past blessings, prefigurative of much greater blessings to come. We have now our feast-days, our Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, &c. On these, and all other solemn occasions, let the evangelical trumpet give a sound of victory, of liberty, of joy and rejoicing; of victory over death, of liberty from sin, of joy and rejoicing in Christ Jesus our Saviour. Bp. Horne.

[u] 4. For this was made a statute for Israel: &c.] The meaning is, that the observation of feasts, with blowing of trumpets, was a statute, law, or testimony, ordained in Joseph, or Israel, by God Himself, after He had destroyed the Egyptians, and brought his people into the wilderness, where the law was given. The new law, with its sacraments and ordinances, was promulged after the spiritual redemption by Christ, as the old law, with its rites and ceremonies, was published, after the temporal deliverance by Moses. Bp. Horne.

[x] 6. I eased his shoulder from the burden: &c.] From this verse to the end, it is plain, that God is the speaker. He reminds Israel of their redemption, by his mercy and power, from the burdens and the drudgery imposed on them in Egypt. Moses describeth their then state of servitude, by saying, "The Egyptians made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick,

7 Thou calledst upon me in troubles, and I delivered thee : and heard thee what time as the storm fell upon thee.

namely, at the giving of the law in Sinai. See Exod. xix. 16; xx. 18. Deut. v. 23—28. Heb. xii. 19. Dr. Hammond.

9 Hear, O my people, and I will assure thee, O Israel : if thou wilt hearken unto me.

11 I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt : open thy mouth wide, and I shall fill it.

12 But my people would not hear my voice : and Israel would not obey me.

13 So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lusts : and let them follow their own imaginations.

14 O that my people would have hearkened [y] unto me : for if Israel had walked in my ways, 15 I should soon have put down their enemies : and turned my hand against their adversaries.

16 The haters of the Lord should have been found liars : but their time should have endured for ever.

should have submitted themselves unto him. Bib. Trans.

and in all manner of service in the field;" Exod. i. 14; that is, probably, in making vessels of clay, as this verse seems to imply. Let us remember, that we have been eased of far heavier burdens, delivered from severer task-masters, and freed from a baser drudgery; the intolerable load of sin, the cruel tyranny of Satan, the vile service and bitter bondage of concupiscence. Bp. Horne.

[y] 14. O that my people would have hearkened &c.] Such are the tender mercies of our God, that He is not only careful to provide for us the means of salvation, but represents Himself as mourning with a paternal affection over his children, when their frowardness and obstinacy disappoint the efforts of his love. One cannot help observing the similitude between the complaint here uttered, and one which hath been since breathed forth, over the same people: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Bp. Horne.

[z] 17. He should have fed them also &c.] That is, the Israelites, if obedient, would still have enjoyed the sweets of that good land, in which the Lord their God had placed them, where the fruits of the earth were produced in the highest perfection, and honey streamed from the very rocks, so that no part of the country was without its increase. Upon the same conditions of faith and obedience, do Christians hold those spiritual and eternal good things, of which the pleasant fields and fertile hills of Canaan were sacramental. Christ is the "bread" of life, He is the "rock" of salvation, and his promises are as "honey" to pious minds. But they who reject Him, as their Lord and Master, must also lose Him as their Saviour and their reward. Bp. Horne.

[a] Psalm lxxxii.] This Psalm was probably written in Hezekiah's reign by Asaph, on the corruption of some wicked magistrates. King Jehoshaphat had made a reformation of several abuses which had crept into the judicatories in his reign, 2 Chron. xix. 7; but before Hezekiah's time matters were grown into disorder again, as Isaiah complains, i. 12. On this account Asaph the seer wrote this Psalm. Dr. Nicholls.

The Psalmist addresseth himself to judges and magistrates; 1, he remindeth them of the presence of that God whom they represent, and to whom they are accountable; 2—4, he exhorteth them to the due discharge of their office; 5, reproveth the ignorance and corruption among them; 6, 7, threateneth their fall and punishment; 8, prayeth for the manifestation of Messiah, and the establishment of his righteous kingdom. Bp. Horne.

[b] 1. God standeth in the congregation &c.] Earthly judicatories are the appointment of God. All magistrates act in his name, and by virtue of his commission. He is invisibly present in their assemblies, and superintends their proceedings. He receives appeals from their wrongful decisions; He will one day re-hear all causes at his own tribunal, and reverse every iniquitous sentence, before the great congregation of men and angels. Unjust judges must either disbelieve or forget all this. Bp. Horne.

[c] — among gods] This word is applied to all judges and magistrates, administering justice to the people in the name and by commission from God, whose "ministers" they are, Rom. xiii. 4, "appointed by God," ver. 1. Dr. Hommond.

[d] 2. How long will ye give wrong judgement: &c.] A charge is here given, by the Spirit of God, to all magistrates, much like that which king Jehoshaphat gave to judges, 2 Chron. xix. 6, 7. Bp. Horne.

[e] 5. They will not be learned &c.] We here find the prophet deploring, in magistrates, a method of proceeding contrary to that above described. He laments their voluntary ignorance in the ways of righteousness, and their choosing to "walk in darkness." In judges this is occasioned by "presents and gifts," which, as saith the son of Sirach, "blind the eyes of the wise," Ecclus.

xx. 29. And if once the "pillars" and "foundations" are moved from their integrity, and "shaken" to and fro by every blast of fear and favour, what shall become of the political fabrick erected upon them? Verily it must fall; and great and terrible will be the fall thereof. A community, whether ecclesiastical or civil, consisteth of great numbers; but its well-being dependeth on a few in whose hands the administration is placed. When the salt hath lost its savour, the mass must putrify; when the light becometh darkness, how great must be that darkness! Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. I have said, Ye are gods: &c.] It is true, then, that magistrates are exalted above other men; that they are dignified with a commission from above; appointed to be the vicegerents of heaven upon earth; and therefore called by the name of Him in whose name they act. But it is likewise as true, that, notwithstanding all this honour conferred upon them, for the good of others, and of themselves, if they use it aright, they still continue to be the mortal sons of mortal "Adam;" like him, they must fall and perish; God can, at any time, cast them down from their high estate, as He did the heathen "princes" who misbehaved themselves, and opposed his counsels: death certainly will strip them of all their authority, and lay them low in the grave; from thence the last trumpet shall call them forth, to stand, with the rest of their brethren, before the judgment-seat of Christ, there to take their trial, and receive their everlasting sentence. Bp. Horne.

[g] 8. Arise, O God, &c.] A view of that disorder and confusion in which frequently the Jewish nation, as well as the rest of the world, was involved, caused the prophets most earnestly to wish and pray for the coming of that time when "God" should "arise," in the person of Messiah, to visit and "judge the earth;" to deliver it from the powers of darkness, and the tyranny of sin; to "inherit all nations," as purchased and redeemed by Him; to establish his church among them; and to rule with a sceptre of righteousness in the hearts of his people. "Arise" yet once again, O Lord Jesu, from thy throne, where thou sittest at the right hand of the Father; "judge the earth," again corrupted and overwhelmed with iniquity; do away sin, and put an end for ever to the power of Satan; "inherit all nations," redeemed from death, and ransomed from the grave; and reign to eternity, King of righteousness, peace, and glory. Bp. Horne.

[h] PSALM lxxxiii.] This Psalm, the last of those composed by Asaph, is a complaint to God against the oppressors of his people the Jews, and, under that type, the opposers of the church of Christ; and a prediction of God's severe punishments that should fall upon them. It was most probably composed in Jehoshaphat's time. See 2 Chron. xx. Dr. Hammond.

In this Psalm the church, 1—8, complaineth to God of the insolence, subtilty, rage, and malice, of her enemies, united in close confederacy against her; 9—12, she prayeth for a manifestation of that power which formerly discomfited Jabin, Sisera, and the Midianites, that so the hostile nations, 13—15, made sensible of the superiority of Israel's God, 16—18, might either themselves be induced to acknowledge Him, or else, by their destruction, become a warning and admonition to others. As, while the world endureth there will be a church, and while there is a church she will have her enemies, who are to increase upon her as the end approacheth, this Psalm can never be out of date. And to the spiritual adversaries of his soul, every private Christian may apply it at all times. Bp. Horne.

[i] 1. Hold not thy tongue, O God, &c.] The church entreateth God again and again to hear and help her in the day of trouble. Her enemies and haters are here said to be the enemies and haters of God, because Christ and the church, like man and wife, are one; they have one common interest; they have the same friends, and the same foes. To Him therefore she applieth, terrified by the tumultuous noise of confederated nations roaring against her like the roaring of the sea, and "lifting up their heads," as so many monsters of the deep, to devour her at once. Bp. Horne.

[k] 5. For they have cast their heads together &c.] When Christ was about to be crucified, it is observed by St. Luke, that "the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together; for before they were at enmity between themselves," Luke xxiii. 12. And however the enemies of the church may quarrel with one another, when they have nothing else to do, yet if a favourable opportunity offer itself for making an attack upon her, they lay aside their differences, and unite as one man: by no means refusing the friendly aid even of infidels and atheists, who are always ready to join in carrying on the war against the common adversary. Bp. Horne.

[l] 6—8. The tabernacles of the Edomites, &c.] These are the names of the confederates. The Edomites were descended from Esau, that old original enemy of Jacob; the Ishmaelites from Ishmael, the son of the bondwoman, and sworn foe to Isaac, heir of the promises; the Moabites sprang from Moab, one of the incestuous children of Lot; the Hagarenes were other descendants of Hagar; who the Gebalites were is uncertain; the 12 Who say, Let us take to ourselves : the houses of God in possession.

13 O my God, make them like unto a wheel[n] : and as the stubble before the wind ;

14 Like as the fire that burneth up the wood : and as the flame that consumeth the mountains.

15 Persecute them even so with thy tempest : and make them afraid with thy storm.

16 Make their faces ashamed[o], O Lord : that they may seek thy Name.

17 Let them be confounded and vexed ever more and more : let them be put to shame, and perish.

18 And they shall know that thou, whose Name is Jehovah : art only the most Highest over all the earth.

3 Yea, the sparrow hath found her an house[r], and the swallow a nest where she may lay her young :

Ammonites came from Ammon, the son of Lot, and incestuous brother of Moab ; the Amalekites were the progeny of Amalek, the grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 16 ; the Philistines and Tyrians are well known ; and, to complete all, Assur, or the power of Assyria, was called in by the children of Lot, the Moabites and Ammonites, to assist in the great work of exterminating Israel from the face of the earth. These were the ten nations banded together, by a solemn league and covenant, against the people of God. And as Israel was the grand figure of the Christian church, which is now "the Israel of God," so her enemies are often represented by the above recited nations, and in prophetical language are called by their names. Every age has its Edomites, and its Ishmaelites, &c. &c. The actors are changed, and the scenes are shifted ; but the stage and the drama continue the same. Bp. Horne.

[m] 9—12. But do thou to them as unto the Madianites : &c.] The church, having recounted the enemies which compassed her about on every side, looks up for succour to that Almighty power, which had of old so graciously interposed on her behalf, and rescued her from her persecutors in the days of Deborah, Barak, and Gideon : see Judges iv. viii. Fully sensible that those deliverances were wrought by the immediate hand of Jehovah, she offers the prayer of faith for a like manifestation of his glory, and a like victory over those who intended, in the same manner, to seize and devour his inheritance. Of how great use and comfort are the Old Testament histories to us, in all our afflictions ! Bp. Horne.

[n] 13. O my God, make them like unto a wheel : &c.] Do thou whirl them away, and all their projects and attempts, and scatter them as stubble before the wind. Bp. Hall. The word, rendered "wheel," occurs also in Isa. xvii. 13, and is translated in the margin "thistle-down :" it is generally understood to signify any light matter, which the wind whirls round and blows away. Travell. The fate of those is here predicted, who invade the inheritance of Jehovah, and say, "Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession." The inconstancy and mutability of their fortunes is resembled to "thistle-down," or some such light revolving body, and to "stubble" or chaff, whirled about and dissipated by the "wind :" the suddenness, horror, and universality of their destruction, are set forth by the similitude of a "fire" consuming the dry trees in a "forest," or some combustible matter on the "mountains." Such is the storm and tempest of God's indignation, which pursues and terrifies the sacrilegious and ungodly. Bp. Horne.

[o] 16—18. Make their faces ashamed, &c.] The punishments, inflicted by heaven upon wicked men, are primarily intended to humble and convert them. If they continue incorrigible under every dispensation of merciful severity, they are at last cut off, and finally destroyed : that others, admonished by their example, may repent, and return and give glory to God. Salutary are the afflictions which bring men, and happy the men who are brought by them, to an acknowledgment of "Jehovah our Righteousness," our exalted and glorified Redeemer, "the Most High over all the earth ;" whom all must acknowledge, and before whom all must appear to be judged, in the great and terrible day. Bp. Horne.

[p] Psalm lxxxiv.] This Psalm, for the subject-matter of it, bears a resemblance to the forty-second. Under the figure of an Israelite, deprived of all access to Jerusalem and the sanctuary, (whether it were David when driven away by Absalom, or any other person in like circumstances at a different time,) we are presented with, 1, 2, the earnest longing of a devout soul after the house and presence of God ; 3—7, a beautiful and passionate eulogy on the blessedness of his ministers and servants ; 8—11, a fervent prayer for a participation of that blessedness ; and 12, 13, an act of faith in his power and goodness, which render him both able and willing to grant requests of this nature. Bp. Horne.

he saw the children of Israel abiding in their tents, with the glory in the midst of them, could not help exclaiming, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!" Numb. xxiv. 5. Bp. Horne.

[r] 3. Yea, the sparrow hath found her an house, &c.] The Psalmist is generally supposed, in this verse, to lament his unhappiness, in being deprived of all access to the tabernacle, or temple, a privilege enjoyed even by the birds, who were allowed to build their nests in the neighbourhood of the sanctuary. It is evidently the design of this passage to intimate to us, that in the house, and at the altar of God, a faithful soul findeth freedom from care and sorrow, quiet of mind, and gladness of spirit; like a bird, that has secured a little mansion for the reception and education of her young. And there is no heart, endued with sensibility, which doth not bear its testimony to the exquisite beauty and propriety of this affecting image. Bp. Horne.

[s] 5. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee: &c.] Not only are they pronounced blessed who "dwell" in the temple, but all they also who are "travelling" thitherward, (as the whole Jewish nation was wont to do three times in a year,) and who are therefore meditating on their "journey," and on the "way" which leadeth to the holy city, trusting in God to "strengthen," and prosper, and conduct them to the house of his habitation, the place where his glory dwelleth. Bp. Horne.

[t] 6, 7. Who going through the vale of misery &c.] Or "of Baca." After numberless uncertain conjectures offered by commentators upon the construction of these two verses, it seemeth impossible for us to attain to any other than a general idea of their true import; which is this, that the Israelites, or some of them, passed, in their way to Jerusalem, through a valley that had the name of "Baca," a noun derived from a verb which signifies to "weep;" that in this valley they were refreshed by plenty of water; that with renewed vigour they proceeded from stage to stage, until they presented themselves before God in Sion. Bp. Horne.

[u] 8. O Lord God of hosts, hear my prayer: &c.] After extolling the happiness of those who dwelt in the temple, and of those who had access to it, the Psalmist breaks forth into a most ardent prayer to his God, for his share in that happiness. He addresseth Him as "the Lord of hosts," almighty in power; as "the God of Jacob," infinite in mercy and goodness to his people; as their "shield," the object of all their trust for defence and protection; and beseecheth Him to "look upon the face of his anointed," that is, of David, if he were king of Israel when this Psalm was written; or rather of Messiah, in whom God is always well pleased; for whose sake He hath mercy upon us, through whose name and merits our prayers are accepted, and the kingdom of heaven is opened to all believers. Bp. Horne.

So the meaning may be, Lord, I deserve not one good look from thee, because by my great wickedness I have procured thy just displeasure and this banishment. But look upon thy Christ, whose coming and meritorious passion, though future to us, is present to thee; and for his sake look upon me. Poole.

[x] 10. For one day in thy courts: &c.] One day spent in meditation and devotion, affordeth a pleasure, far, far superior to that which an age of worldly prosperity could give. Happier is the least and lowest of the servants of Jesus, than the greatest and most exalted potentate who knoweth Him not. And he is no proper judge of blessedness, who hesitates a moment to prefer the condition of a penitent in the porch, to that of a sinner on the throne. If this be the case upon earth, how much more in heaven? O come that one glorious day, whose sun shall never go down, nor any cloud obscure the lustre of his beams; that day, when the temple of God shall be opened in heaven, and we shall be admitted to serve Him for ever therein! Bp. Horne.

[y] 12. For the Lord God is a light &c.] Jesus Christ is our "Lord," and our "God;" He is a "sun" to enlighten and direct us in the way, and a "shield" to protect us against the enemies of our salvation; He will give us "grace," to carry us on "from strength to strength," and "glory" to crown us when we "appear before him in Zion;" He will "withhold" nothing that is "good" and profitable for us in the course of our journey, and will Himself be our reward when we come to the end of it. Bp. Horne.

be, in whom should we trust to bring us to the holy city, new Jerusalem, of which the Lord God and the Lamb are the temple, but in thee, O Saviour and Redeemer, who art the head of every creature, the Captain of the armies of heaven and earth, the Lord of hosts, and the King of glory ? "Blessed," thrice "blessed, is the man that trusteth in thee." Bp. Horne.

[a] PSALM lxxxv.] It is probable that the subject of this Psalm is the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity : in celebrating which the Psalmist is carried by a prophetick impulse to foretel a much greater deliverance by the coming of Christ. Travell.

This Psalm, appointed by the Church to be used on Christmas-day, 1—3, celebrateth the redemption of the Israel of God from their spiritual captivity under sin and death ; 4—7, teacheth us to pray for the full accomplishment of that redemption in ourselves ; 8—11, describeth the incarnation of Christ, with the joyful meeting of merey and truth, righteousness and peace, at his birth, and, 12, 13, the blessed effects of his advent. Bp. Horne.

[b] 1. Lord, thou art become gracious &c.] These three verses speak of the deliverance from captivity, as already brought about ; whereas, in the subsequent part of the Psalm, it is prayed for and predicted, as a thing future. To account for this, some suppose that the Psalmist first returns thanks for a temporal redemption, and then prophesies of the spiritual salvation by Messiah. Others are of opinion, that the same eternal redemption is spoken of throughout, but represented, in the beginning of the Psalm, as already accomplished in the divine decree, though the eventual completion was yet to come. But, indeed, to us Christians, who now use the Psalm, the difference is not material ; since a part of our redemption is past, and a part of it is yet to come, for the hastening of which latter we daily pray. God hath already been exceedingly gracious and "favourable" to the whole "earth," in "bringing back," by the resurrection of Jesus, the spiritual "captivity of" his people ; He hath Himself, in Christ, "borne," and so taken away, "the iniquity of his people ;" He hath "covered all their sins," that they should no more appear in judgment against them ; propitiated by the Son of his love, He hath removed his "wrath," and "turned himself from the fierceness of his anger." So exactly and literally do these words describe the means and method of Gospel salvation, that a Christian can hardly affix any other ideas to them. Bp. Horne.

[c] 4—7. Turn us then, O God our Saviour : &c.] The ancient church is here introduced as petitioning for the continuation and completion of those blessings which had been mentioned in the foregoing verses, namely, that God would "turn" his people from their captivity, and "cause his anger towards them to cease ;" that He would "receive" them from sin and sorrow, and give them occasion to "rejoice in him," their mighty deliverer ; that He would "shew them" openly that "merey" of which they had so often heard, and "grant them that salvation," or that "Saviour," that Jesus, who had been so long promised to mankind. And although it be true that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, and hath virtually procured all these blessings for the church, yet do "we" still continue to pray, in the same words, for the actual application of them all to ourselves, by the conversion of our hearts, the justification of our persons, the sanctification of our souls, and the glorification of our bodies. For this last blessing of redemption, "the whole creation waiteth, groaning, and travailing in pain together, until now," Rom. viii. 22. Bp. Horne.

[d] 8. I will hearken what the Lord God will say &c.] The prophet having prayed, in the name of the church, that Jehovah would "shew them his merey, and grant them his salvation," declares himself resolved, concerning this "salvation, to inquire and search diligently, what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in him did signify, when it testified beforehand the coming of Christ, and the glory that should follow :" see 1 Pet. i. 10 : he would attend to "what God the Lord should say," and report it to the world. Now, what was the message which the prophets had commission to deliver from God, but that He would "speak peace," or reconciliation through a Saviour, "to his people, and to his saints ?" The Gospel is accordingly styled by St. Peter, "the word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ," Acts x. 36. And what was the end of this reconciliation between God and men, but that men should become and continue the servants of God ; that, being washed from their sins by the blood of Christ, and renewed in their minds by the grace of Christ, they should walk in the paths of wisdom and holiness, and "turn not again to the folly" they had renounced ? Bp. Horne.

[e] 9. For his salvation is nigh them &c.] God, who "calleth things that be not as though they were," teacheth his prophets to do likewise. The Psalmist therefore speaks with assurance of the "Saviour" as if he then saw Him before his eyes, healing, by the word of his power, the bodies and the souls of men upon earth, and manifesting forth his "glory," in human nature, to all such as, with a holy "fear," and filial reverence, believed on Him. St. John himself hardly useth plainer language when he saith, "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt, or tabernacled among us ; and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth," John i. 14. The body of Christ was the true "tabernacle," or temple ; his divinity was the glory which resided there, and filled that holy place. The church is his mystical "body;" by his Spirit He now and ever "dwelleth in our land; and his salvation is always nigh them that fear him:" as saith the holy Virgin in her song, "His mercy is on them that fear him, throughout all generations." Bp. Horne.

[f] 10, 11. Mercy and truth are met together: &c.] These four divine attributes parted at the fall of Adam, and met again at the birth of Christ. Mercy was ever inclined to save man, and peace could not be his enemy; but truth exacted the performance of God's threat, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die;" and righteousness could not but give to every one his due. Jehovah must be true in all his ways, and righteous in all his works. Now there is no religion upon earth, except the Christian, which can satisfy the demands of all these claimants, and restore an union between them; which can shew how God's word can be true, and his work just, and the sinner, notwithstanding, find mercy, and obtain peace. Mahomet's prayer, were it the prayer of a righteous man and a prophet, could not satisfy divine justice; the blood of bulls and goats was always insufficient for that purpose, being a figure only for the time then present, which ceased of course when the reality appeared. "Sacrifice and burnt-offering thou wouldest not; then said I, Lo, I come." A God incarnate reconciled all things in heaven and earth. When Christ appeared in our nature, the promise was fulfilled, and "truth sprang out of the earth." And now righteousness, "looking down from heaven," beheld in Him every thing that she required; an undefiled birth, a holy life, an innocent death; a spirit and a mouth without guile, a soul and a body without sin. She saw, and was satisfied, and returned to earth. Thus all the four parties met again in perfect harmony: truth ran to mercy, and embraced her; righteousness to peace, and kissed her. And this could happen only at the birth of Jesus, in whom "the tender mercy of our God visited us, and who is the truth; who is made unto us righteousness, and who is our peace." See Luke i. 78; John xiv. 6; 1 Cor. i. 30; Eph. ii. 14. Those that are thus joined, as attributes, in Christ, ought not, as virtues, to be separated in a Christian, who may learn how to resemble his blessed Lord and Master, by observing that short, but complete, rule of life, comprehended in the few following words: Shew mercy, and speak truth; do righteousness, and follow peace. Bp. Horne.

[g] 12. Yea, the Lord shall shew loving-kindness: &c.] Unless God vouchsafe a gracious rain from above, the earth cannot "yield her increase." The effects of the incarnation of Christ, the descent of the Spirit, and the publication of the Gospel among men, are frequently set forth in Scripture under images borrowed from that fruitfulness caused in the earth by the rain of heaven. See Isaiah xlv. 8; xliv. 3; lv. 10. Give us evermore, O Lord, "that which is good, that our land may yield her increase;" give us that good gift, the gift of thy Spirit, that we be "neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ," 2 Pet. i. 8. Bp. Horne.

[h] 13. Righteousness shall go before him: &c.] Upon the appearance of the Redeemer, "righteousness" is represented as "going before him," like his harbinger the Baptist, to prepare and make ready his way. In that way, the way of righteousness, "he set his steps," and walked therein, without the least deviation, until He had finished his appointed course. Draw us, blessed Jesu, and we will run after thee, in the path of life; let thy mercy pardon us, thy truth enlighten us, thy righteousness direct us, to follow thee, O Lamb of God, whithersoever thou goest, through poverty, affliction, persecution, and death itself; that our portion may be for ever in thy kingdom of peace and love. Bp. Horne.

[1] Psalm lxxxvi.] This Psalm is intitled, "A prayer of David," and supposed to have been written in some of his great distresses. Like others of the same kind, it is calculated for the use of the church during her sufferings here below, by which she is conformed to the image of the true David, that man of sorrows. It contains, 1, an earnest supplication, grounded on the poverty, 2, the holiness, faith, 3, importunity, and, 4, the devotion of the suppliant; and on, 5—7, the goodness, and, 8, power of God, 9, 10, to be one day acknowledged by all nations, at their conversion. After this follows, 11, a petition for wisdom, strength, and singleness of heart; 12, 13, a thanksgiving for redemption; 14, a complaint of persecution from the wicked; 15, an act of faith; 16, 17, a prayer for help and salvation. Bp. Horne.

[k] 2. Preserve thou my soul, for I am holy: &c.] The word here translated "holy," is the same which is used in the 16th Psalm: "Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." And indeed, if we understand "holiness" in its strict sense, no one but "he whom the Father sanctified, and sent into the world," to redeem lost man, could say to Him, "Preserve my soul, for I am holy." But the word properly signifies, "good, merciful, pious, devoted to the service of God," &c. The Christian, therefore, only pleads, in this expression, his relation to Christ, as being a member of Christ's body, the church, and a partaker of the gifts, which, by virtue of that membership, he has received through the Spirit of holiness. So that this first part of the verse, "Preserve my soul, for I am holy," when repeated by us, is equivalent to another passage in the Psalms, "I am thine, O save me," cxix. 94. Bp. Horne.

[l] 5. For thou, Lord, art good &c.] We are encouraged to "lift up our souls to God" in prayer, because his "goodness," and the "plenteousness of his mercy" in Christ Jesus, incline Him to give his holy Spirit of peace and comfort to "all that call upon him." His favour is no longer confined to Judea; there is now no distinction of age, condition, or country: but the sinner, whoever or wherever he be, if he call upon the saving name of Jesus, is heard, pardoned, and accepted, upon the terms of the evangelical covenant. Bp. Horne.

[m] 8. Among the gods there is none &c.] Another reason why application should be made to Jehovah, is his infinite superiority over all those, that, by infatuated men, were ever called "gods." From the ancient idolatry, which taught adoration to the sun, moon, and stars, to the light and the air, we have been delivered by the Gospel; nor do we any longer profess to worship Jupiter, and the other heathen gods and goddesses. But do not many still trust in idols, and have they not, in effect, other objects of worship, from whose hands they expect their reward? Are not the hearts of the covetous, the ambitious, the voluptuous, so many temples of Mammon or Plutus, of Jupiter or Mars, of Bacchus, Comus, and Venus? But what are these deities; what is their power; and what are their gifts? What is the whole world, and all that is therein, when compared with its Maker and Redeemer; what is it when applied to, for the ease and comfort of a wounded spirit? "Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord; neither are there any works like unto thy works!" Bp. Horne.

[n] 9. All nations whom thou hast made &c.] The Psalmist predicteth that this superiority of Jehovah should one day be acknowledged throughout all the earth, when "neither in Jerusalem only, nor in the mount of the Samaritans," but in every place, "should men worship the Father," John iv. 21; when He who "made all nations" by his Son, should by that Son redeem all nations, bringing them from the world to the church, there to "worship before" the true God, and "in songs of praise to glorify his holy name." If, in these our times, we behold the nations again falling away from God, departing from the purity of their faith, and leaving their first love, let us comfort ourselves with looking forward to that scene of things described by St. John, in which we hope to bear a part hereafter: "I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; and cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation unto our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb," Rev. vii. 9, 10 Bp. Horne.

[o] 10. For thou art great, &c.] "Great" is Jehovah in his power, in his wisdom, in his mercy; "wonderful" in the creation of the world, wonderful in the preservation and the government of it, wonderful in its redemption; wonderful in the incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, in the descent of the Spirit, the propagation of the Gospel, the sufferings of saints, and the conversion of sinners; most wonderful will He be when He shall raise the dead, judge the world, condemn the wicked, and glorify the righteous. And then shall every tongue confess, "Thou art God alone!" Bp. Horne.

[p] 11. Teach me thy way, O Lord, &c.] It is the continual subject of the Mediator's intercession above, and of our prayers below, that we may be "taught the way of Jehovah," the way to life eternal, prepared for us, through faith and love which is in Christ Jesus; that, being so taught, we may likewise be enabled "to walk in the truth," without error in doctrine, or deviation from duty; believing all things which God hath revealed, and doing whatsoever He hath commanded us; that the affections of the "heart" may be withdrawn from other objects, and, being no longer divided between God and the world, become "united" in the filial "fear of his name," as the grand principle of action. Bp. Horne.

[q] 12. I will thank thee, O Lord my God, &c.] Gratitude for mercies already received will obtain a continuance and increase of those mercies. The church is never in so afflicted a state, but she hath still reason to intermingle hallelujahs with her hosannas, and, in the midst of her most fervent prayers, to "praise the Lord her God with all her heart, and to glorify his name for evermore;" since, whatever she may suffer upon earth, (and even those sufferings will turn to her advantage,) "great," most undoubtedly, "hath his mercy been to-some sensible proof of thy merciful respect for me. Bp. Hall.

PSALM lxxxvii.[t] Fundamenta ejus.

His foundation is in the holy mountains. Bib. Trans.

5 And of Sion it shall be reported[a] ward her in delivering" her, by the resurrection of Jesus, from the bondage of sin, the dominion of death, and the bottomless pit of "hell." Bp. Horne.

[r] 16. O turn thee then unto me, &c.] On the consideration of the above-mentioned attributes, a petition is in this verse put up to God, that He would "turn" his face towards us; that He would of his "mercy" pardon us, by his grace "strengthen" us, and by his power "save" us from all our adversaries. Every Christian is the "servant" of God, and "the son of his handmaid," the Church; which may say, in the same spirit of humility and obedience with the blessed Virgin, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord." Bp. Horne.

[s] 17. Shew some token upon me for good, &c.] Many outward signs and "tokens" of the divine favour were in old time vouchsafed to patriarchs, prophets, and kings of Israel. The law itself was a collection of external and sacramental figures of grace and mercy. All these centred and had their accomplishment in that grand and everlasting sign and token of God's love to man, the incarnation of Christ, which all faithful people from the beginning wished and prayed for. On this sign the Christian looks with joy, as the great proof that God has "holpen him and comforted him;" while his faith in it doth not fail, he hath the witness in himself, and his actions declare as much to all around him; "that they which hate him may be ashamed" and converted, before that day come, when shame shall be fruitless, and conversion impossible. Bp. Horne.

[t] Psalm lxxxvii.] The prophet, 1, 2, celebrates the stability and felicity of Sion, 3—5, foretels the accession of the Gentiles to her, and, 6, their enrolment among her enemies; 7, extols her as the fountain of grace and salvation. The Psalm was probably penned on a survey of the city of David, just after the buildings of it were finished. Bp. Horne.

[u] 1. Her foundations are upon the holy hills: &c.] The Psalmist, after having meditated on the strength, the beauty, and the glory of Jerusalem, being smitten with the love of the holy city, and imagining the thoughts of his hearers, or readers, to have been employed on the same subject, breaks forth at once in this abrupt manner, "Her foundations are &c.," or "It is his," that is, God's "foundation on the holy mountains." By "the holy mountains" are meant those hills of Judea, which Jehovah had chosen, and separated to Himself from all others, whereon to construct the highly-favoured city and temple. As the dwellings of Jacob, in the promised land, were beloved by Him more than the dwellings of other nations, so He "loved the gates of Sion, more than all the dwellings of Jacob." Jerusalem was exalted and fortified by its situation; but much more so by the protection of the Almighty. What Jerusalem was, the Christian church is; "built" by God "on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief cornerstone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord," Eph. ii. 20. It is "his foundation in the holy mountains;" she is beloved of God above the kingdoms and empires of the earth, which rise and fall only to fulfil the divine counsels concerning her. When those counsels shall be fulfilled, in the salvation of all believers, the world, which subsists only for their sake, will be at an end. Bp. Horne.

[x] 2. Very excellent things are spoken of thee: &c.] As the prophet began, in a rapture, to speak of the holy city, so now, in fresh transport, he changes the person, and suddenly addresses himself to it. The old Jerusalem was "the city of God, and glorious things were therefore said of it" by the Spirit. Pleasant for situation, and magnificent in its buildings, it was the delight of nations, the joy of the whole earth; there was the royal residence of the kings of Judah; there was the temple, and the ark, and the glory, and the King of heaven dwelling in the midst of her; her streets were honoured with the footsteps of the Redeemer of men; there He preached, and wrought his miracles, lived, died, and rose again; thither He sent down the Spirit, and there He first laid the foundations of his Church. To know what "glorious things" are said of the new Jerusalem, the reader must peruse Isa. lx, and Rev. xxi, xxii. Bp. Horne.

[y] 3, 4. I will think upon Rahab &c.] The accession of the nations to the Church is generally supposed to be here predicted. God declares by his prophet, "I will make mention of," &c. Bp. Horne. As if it were said, I rejoice to see that the church of God shall not always be confined to these narrow bounds of Judea; but that it shall extend itself to all nations: insomuch as I make account of the most unlikely nations of Egypt and Babylon to be admitted into the bosom thereof; and even amongst the most spiteful Philistines, and the Tyrians, and Ethiopians, there shall be sons born to God. Bp. Hall.

[z] 4. — there was he born.] Or, as in the Bible translation, "This man was born there." The clause is connected with the first words, thus: "I will make mention of Rahab, &c.," saying, "This man," that is, these men or people now mentioned, (the singular number put collectively for the plural, and the Scripture often speaks of a nation as of one man, as Ps. xxv. 22; cxxx. 8,) "was born there," or "in her," as it is expressed ver. 5; namely, in Sion; born by adoption and regeneration. See John i. 12; iii. 3. 7; Gal. iii. 26; iv. 26; 1 Pet. i. 23. The Gentiles shall be ingrafted into the Jewish church, and into all the privileges. Poole.

[a] 5. And of Sion it shall be reported &c.] And Sion, the true spiritual Sion, shall be so enlarged, that it shall be said of every professed Christian, that "he was born in her;" and God shall so establish her, that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against her," Matt. xvi. 18. Bp. Hall. Alluding to the multitudes of converts, under the Gospel; the sons of that Jerusalem, "which is the mother of us all," Gal. iv. 26. Bp. Horne.

[b] 6. The Lord shall rehearse it &c.] In the book of life, that register of heaven, kept by God Himself, our names are entered, not as born of flesh and blood by the will of man, but as born of water and the Spirit by the will of God; of each person it is written, "that he was born there," in the church and city of God. Bp. Horne.

[c] 7. The singers also and trumpeters &c.] The words "shall he rehearse" are not in the original. The meaning is, there shall be great rejoicing and praising God, both with vocal and instrumental musick, for this glorious and stupendous work of the conversion of the Gentiles. The Psalmist describes evangelical worship by legal phrases and customs, as the prophets frequently do. Poole. And the burden of the song, thus joyfully sung in praise of Sion, was to be this, "All my fresh springs shall be in thee." Bp. Horne. All the living waters of true comfort, all graces, and all salvation, are to be found in thee only, namely, the church of God. Bp. Hall. And if such be indeed the incomparable excellence of the Church, and such the benefits of her communion, as they have been set forth in the foregoing verses, what anthem better deserves to be performed by all her choirs? In thee, O Sion, is the fountain of salvation, and from thee are derived all those springs of grace, which flow, by the divine appointment, while the world lasts, for the purification and refreshment of mankind upon earth. Bp. Horne.

[d] Psalm lxxxviii.] This Psalm, as Mr. Mudge observes, may well be said to be composed, according to its title in the Hebrew, to create dejection, to raise a pensive gloom or melancholy in the mind; the whole subject of it being quite throughout heavy, and full of the most dismal complaints. The nature and degree of the sufferings related in it; the strength of the expressions used to describe them; the consent of ancient expositors; the appointment of the Psalm by the Church to be read on Good Friday; all these circumstances concur in directing an application of the whole to our blessed Lord. His unexampled sorrows, both in body and soul; his desertion in the day of trouble; his bitter passion, and approaching death; with his frequent and fervent prayers for the accomplishment of the promises, for the salvation of the church through Him, and for the manifestation of God's glory: these are the particulars treated of in this instructive and most affecting composition. Bp. Horne.

It was originally addressed unto God in time of some heavy affliction, most probably in the time of the captivity. Dr. Hammond.

[e] 1. O Lord God of my salvation, &c.] We hear in these words the voice of our suffering Redeemer. As man, He addresseth Himself to his Father, "the Lord God of his salvation," from whom He expected, according to the promises, a joyful and triumphant resurrection: He pleadeth the fervency and importunity of his prayers, offered up continually, "day and night," during the time of his humiliation and sufferings; and He entreateth to be heard in these his supplications for his body mystical, as well as his body natural; for Himself, and for us all. Bp. Horne.

[f] 2. For my soul is full of trouble: &c.] Is not this exactly parallel to what He said in the garden, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death?" "Full," indeed, "of troubles" was thy "soul," O blessed Jesus, in that dreadful hour, when, under the united weight of our sins and sorrows, thou wert sinking into "the grave," in order to raise us out of it. Let us judge of thy love by thy sufferings, and of both by the impossibility of our fully comprehending either. Bp. Horne.

[g] 3. I am counted as one of them &c.] Next to the troubles of Christ's soul, are mentioned the disgrace and ignominy to which He submitted. He who was the fountain of immortality, He from whom no one could take his life, who could in a moment have commanded twelve legions of angels to his aid, or have caused heaven and earth, at a word speaking, to fly away before Him, He was "counted with them that go down into the pit;" He died, to all appearance, like the rest of mankind; nay, He was forcibly put to death, as a malefactor; and seemed, in the hands of his executioners, "as a man that had no strength," no power or might, to help and to save Himself. "His strength went from him; he became weak, and like another man." The people shook their heads at Him, saying, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." Bp. Horne.

[h] 4. Free among the dead, &c.] That is, set at liberty, or dismissed from the world, and separated from all communication with its affairs, as dead bodies are, "like" other "corpses that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more," that is, as living objects of providence upon earth: in this sense, "they are cut off from God's hand," which held and supported them in life. And in no other sense can these expressions be understood; since to imagine that the Psalmist, who so often speaks in plain terms of the resurrection, should here, when personating Messiah, deny that doctrine, would be a conceit equally absurd, and impious. Bp. Horne.

[i] 5. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit: &c.] The sufferings of Jesus are represented by his being plunged into a dark and horrible abyss, with the indignation of God, due to our sins, resting upon Him, and all the 7 Thou hast put away mine acquaintance[k] far from me: and made me to be abhorred of them.

9 My sight faileth[l] for very trouble: Lord, I have called daily upon thee, I have stretched forth my hands unto thee.

10 Dost thou shew wonders among the dead[m]: or shall the dead rise up again, and praise thee?

11 Shall thy loving-kindness be shewed in the grave: or thy faithfulness in destruction?

12 Shall thy wondrous works be known in the dark: and thy righteousness in the land where all things are forgotten?

13 Unto thee have I cried, O Lord[n]: and early shall my prayer come before thee.

14 Lord, why abhorrest thou my soul: and hidest thou thy face from me?

15 I am in misery[o], and like unto him that is at the point to die: even from my youth up thy terrors have I suffered with a troubled mind.

16 Thy wrathful displeasure goeth over me: and the fear of thee hath undone me.

17 They came round about me daily like water: and compassed me together on every side.

18 My lovers and friends hast thou put away from me[p]: and hid mine acquaintance out of my sight.

EVENING PRAYER.

PSALM lxxxix.[q] Misericordias Domini.

Christmas-day, first Psalm Even. Serv. the mercies. Bib. Trans.

MY song shall be alway of the loving-kindness of the Lord[r]: with my mouth will I ever be shewing thy truth from one generation to another.

2 For I have said, Mercy shall be waves of affliction rolling over Him. The same image is used in Ps. lxix, and many other places. Bp. Horne.

[k] 7. Thou hast put away mine acquaintance &c.] At the apprehension of Christ, "all his disciples forsook him and fled," Matt. xxvi. 56. Peter denied and abjured his Master, as if his acquaintance had been a disgrace and "an abomination:" at the crucifixion, it is observed by St. Luke, that "all his acquaintance stood afar off, beholding these things," xxiii. 49; beholding the innocent victim environed by his enemies, and at length "shut up" in the sepulchre. Bp. Horne.

[l] 9. My sight faileth &c.] This verse contains a reiteration of the complaint and prayer made at the beginning of the Psalm. These are some of the "strong cryings with tears," which, during the course of his intercessions for us upon earth, the Son of God poured forth "in the days of his flesh," Heb. v. 7. Bp. Horne.

[m] 10—12. Dost thou show wonders among the dead: &c.] It hath been sometimes thought, that these verses imply a denial, or at least a doubt, of the resurrection from the dead; whereas they contain, in reality, the most powerful plea that Christ Himself, in his prayers to the Father, could urge for it; namely, that otherwise man would be deprived of his salvation, and God of the glory thence accruing. "Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead," while they continue in that state; or if thou shouldest, will they be sensible of those wonders, and make thee due returns of thankfulness? "Shall the dead rise up" in the congregation, "and praise thee?" Must they not live again to do that? "Shall thy loving-kindness" to the sons of Adam, in me their Redeemer, "be declared?" shall the Gospel be preached, "in the grave?" "or thy faithfulness," in accomplishing the promises concerning this loving-kindness, shall it be manifested "in that destruction" wrought by death upon the bodies of men? "Shalt thy wonders," the wonders of light and life and salvation, "be known in the dark" tomb? "and thy righteousness," which characterizes all thy dispensations, shall it be remembered and proclaimed "in the land" of silence and "forgetfulness?" A Christian, upon the bed of sickness, may undoubtedly plead with God, in this manner, for a longer continuance of life, to glorify Him here upon earth. But every respite of that kind can be only temporary. All men, sooner or later, must die; and then they can never more experience the mercies, or sing the praises of God, unless they rise again. So that if the argument hold in one case, it certainly holdeth still stronger in the other. Bp. Horne.

[n] 13, 14. Unto thee have I cried, O Lord: &c.] Since therefore the wonders, the loving-kindness, the faithfulness, and the righteousness of God, cannot be manifested by man's redemption, if Messiah be left under the dominion of death, he redoubles his prayers for the promised deliverance; and speaks of his redemption in the hour of sorrow, as in Ps. xxii. 1, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" &c. Bp. Horne.

[o] 15—17. I am in misery, &c.] We are not to imagine that the holy Jesus suffered for us only at Gethsemane, and on mount Calvary. His whole life was one continued passion; a scene of labour and sorrow, of contradiction and persecution; "he was afflicted," as never man was, "from his youth up," from the hour of his birth, when, thrust out from the society of men, he made his bed in the stable at Bethlehem: He was "ready to die," a victim destined and prepared for that death, which, by anticipation, He tasted of through life; He saw the flaming sword of God's "fierce wrath" waiting to "cut him off" from the land of the living; the "terrors" of the Almighty set themselves in array against Him, threatening, like the mountainous waves of a tempestuous sea, to overwhelm his amazed soul. Let not the church be offended or despond, but rather let her rejoice in her sufferings, by which, through every period of her existence, from youth to age, she "filleth up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ," who suffers and will be glorified in his people, as He hath already suffered and been glorified for them. See Col. i. 24. Bp. Horne.

[p] 18. My lovers and friends hast thou put away from me: &c.] It is mentioned again, as a most affecting circumstance of Christ's passion, that He was entirely forsaken, and left all alone, in that dreadful day. The bitter cup was presented, filled to the brim, and He drank it off to the dregs. No man could share in those sufferings by which all other men were to be redeemed. His "lovers and friends," his disciples and acquaintance, "were put far from him;" they all "forsook him, and fled," to hide themselves from the fury of the Jews, "in darkness," in dark, that is, secret places. Thus it is written in the Psalms, and thus in the Gospels it is recorded to have happened. Oftentimes, O blessed Jesu, do we forsake thee: but do not thou forsake us, or take thy Holy Spirit from us. Bp. Horne.

[q] Psalm lxxxix.] Learned men are divided in their opinion concerning the author, as well as the immediate occasion, of this Psalm. The greater part of it is an enumeration of God's goodness to his people, and of his promises and threatenings towards them. In the latter part there is a reference to some great calamity, which had befallen them, so that the government was subverted, and the royal family in danger of being extirpated. The glorious things here spoken of David and of his posterity, are prophetical of the Messiah; and can with strict propriety be applied only to Him. Travell. Many of the Jewish expositors refer this Psalm to the Messiah. Bp. Horsley.

This Psalm is appointed by the Church to be read on Christmas-day. It celebrates, ver. 1—4, the mercies of God in Christ, promised to David; 5—14, the almighty power of Jehovah, manifested in his works and dispensations; 15, his justice, mercy, and truth; 16—19, the happiness and security of his people; 20—36, his covenant made with David, as the representative of Messiah, who should come of his seed; 37—44, the church lamenteth her distressful state, at the time when this Psalm was penned; 45—50, she prayeth for the accomplishment of the promise; and, in the mean time, 50, blesseth Jehovah. Bp. Horne.

[r] 1. My song shall be alway of the loving-kindness of the Lord: &c.] "The loving-kindness" or "mercies of the Lord" have ever employed the voices of believers to celebrate them. These mercies were promises to the human race, in their great representative and surety, before the world began; 2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2: they were prefigured by ancient dispensations; and, in part, fulfilled, at the incarnation of Christ. The "faithfulness" of God, in so fulfilling them, is now "made known," by the holy services of the Christian church, "to all generations." Bp. Horne.

[s] 3. I have made a covenant with my chosen: &c.] The two former verses set forth a profession of faith in God's mercy: these two assign the ground of such faith; namely, the covenant which God is here introduced as declaring that He had made with David, and which He did make with him by the prophet Nathan: 2 Sam. vii. 12, &c. The covenant relates to David's "seed," and to the "establishment of his throne" in that seed; literally, in Solomon for a time; spiritually, in Christ for ever: "When thy days shall be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son." These last words are cited by the apostle, Heb. i. 5, as spoken of Christ, to evince his superiority over the angels. Yet, that the whole passage does, in the letter, relate to Solomon, can admit of no doubt, he being the "seed" and immediate successor of David, and the person appointed to "build an house for God's name." Here then we have an incontestable proof, that the covenant with David had Messiah for its object; that Solomon was a figure of Him; and that the Scripture hath sometimes a double sense. It is moreover to be observed, that the covenants made with Abraham, David, &c., all had their original and foundation in the covenant made with Messiah, who was the true Father of the faithful, the beloved and chosen of God; the great Prophet, Priest, and King; the only person qualified to be a sponsor, and to engage in a covenant with the Father for mankind. His sufferings were the price of our redemption: and because He suffered in the flesh, as "the Son of David," therefore is He "established for ever, and his throne built up to all generations." Remarkable are the words of the angel to Mary: "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Luke i. 32. Bp. Horne.

[t] 5. O Lord, the very heavens &c.] Did not "the heavens praise the wonders of Jehovah," when a choir of angels descended from above, to sing an anthem, at the birth of Christ? And how must the celestial courts have resounded with the hallelujahs of those blessed spirits, when they again received their King, returning in triumph from the conquest of his enemies? Nor do "the saints" omit to celebrate God's "faithfulness in the congregation" upon earth, while "with angels and archangels, and all the company of heaven, they laud and magnify his glorious name, evermore praising Him, and saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Glory be to thee, O Lord most high." Bp. Horne.

[u] 6—9. For who is he among the clouds: &c.] These verses proclaim that right and title which Jehovah hath to the praises of all his creatures in "heaven and earth." No one of them, however excellent and glorious, however deified and adored by fond and foolish man, can enter the lists, and contest the superiority with its Maker. High over all is the throne of God: before Him "angels" veil their faces, "saints" prostrate themselves with lowest reverence, and created nature trembles at his word: his "power" is almighty, and derived from none; and with "truth" He is on all sides invested as with a garment: the former enables Him, the latter (if we may so express it) binds Him, to perform those gracious promises, which mercy prompted Him to make, concerning our eternal redemption. Bp. Horne.

[x] 10. Thou rulest the raging of the sea: &c.] The extent of the ocean, the multitude of its waves, and their fury when excited by a storm, render it, in that state, the most tremendous object in nature; nor doth any thing, which man beholds, give Him so just an idea of human impotence, and of that divine power which can excite and calm so boisterous an element at pleasure. God Himself therefore frequently appeals to this instance of his omnipotence, see Job xxxviii. 11; Jer. v. 22: an attribute of which our Lord shewed Himself to have been possessed, when, being with his disciples in the ship, He arose and rebuked a tempestuous wind and a raging sea, and there was instantly a calm. Bp. Horne.

[y] 11. Thou hast subdued Egypt, &c.] The destruction of Pharaoh and the Egyptians is here mentioned as another instance of God's mighty power. And it is probable, that the foregoing verse was intended to allude more particularly to that miraculous exertion of God's sovereignty over the waters, the division of the Red Sea, which happened at the same time; as these two events are generally spoken of together. See Isa. li. 9, 10. The same power, which effected all this, hath since, in Christ Jesus, overcome the world, destroyed the works of the devil, and ransomed mankind from the depths of the grave. Bp. Horne.

[z] 12, 13. The heavens are thine, &c.] The "heavens," and all the glorious bodies there ranged in beautiful order; the "earth," with its rich furniture, and the unnumbered tribes of its inhabitants, through its whole extent, from "north to south," and from east to west; all these are so many evidences of that wisdom and power which at the beginning contrived and formed them; all, in their respective ways, declare the glory, and speak the praises, of their great Creator; but chiefly, the holy land, and the fruitful hills which adorned it. "Tabor" in one part, and "Hermon" in another, formerly seemed, as it were, to "rejoice" and sing, for the abundant favours showered down upon them by the God of Israel, who hath since caused all nations no less to exult and triumph in his saving name. Bp. Horne.

[a] 14. Thou hast a mighty arm: &c.] The Psalmist, having produced and meditated on some eminent instances of divine power, draws this general conclusion from the premises. Towards the Christian church "the arm of Jehovah" hath been revealed in a still more extraordinary manner. She reflecteth on the wonders wrought by Jesus; a conquest over more formidable enemies than Pharaoh and his Egyptians; a redemption from more cruel bondage; salvation from sin and death; a new creation, new heavens, and new earth, a new Jerusalem, and a spiritual Sion. With additional conviction may she therefore exclaim, "Thou hast a mighty arm; strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand!" Bp. Horne.

[b] 15. Righteousness and equity &c.] Although the power of God be infinite, yet it is never exerted, but under the direction of his other attributes. When He goeth, as a judge, to his tribunal, "mercy and truth go before his face;" they are represented as preceding Him, to give notice of his advent and to prepare his way. "All the ways," or dispensations, "of the Lord," as it is elsewhere observed, "are mercy and truth," Ps. xxv. 10; they are the substance of all his revelations, which either promise salvation, or relate the performance of such promises. By these is man warned and prepared for "judgment;" which is to be the last and finishing scene. And when the great Judge of all the earth shall from his throne pronounce the irreversible sentence, not a creature then present shall be able to accuse that sentence of injustice. Bp. Horne.

[c] 20. Thou spakest sometime in visions &c.] The covenant made with David was mentioned in general terms above, at verses 3, 4. But a more particular account is now given of God's dispensations relative to the son of Jesse, and his posterity. Bp. Horne.

pletion in the spiritual kingdom of the Messiah, the eternal Son of God, who should be born of the seed and lineage of David. Dr. Hammond.

[d] 21, 22. I have found David my servant: &c.] David was the servant of God; he was, by the Prophet Samuel, anointed with oil; he was strengthened and established in his kingdom, by the hand and arm of Jehovah. But never let Christians fail, in this eminently figurative character, to contemplate that true David, (for so He is called, Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 25,) the beloved Son of God; "the servant and elect of Jehovah, in whom his soul delighted, and on whom he put his Spirit," Isa. xlii. 1: whom He "anointed with his holy oil, with the oil of gladness, with the Holy Ghost and with power," Ps. xlv. 7; Acts x. 38; whom He strengthened, and established in his spiritual kingdom, with his hand and arm, and the might of his omnipotence. Bp. Horne.

[e] 23—25. The enemy shall not be able &c.] These promises were fulfilled to David, when God delivered him out of the hand of Saul, and of all his other adversaries. See 2 Sam. xxii. 1. And in what a full, perfect, and divine sense, were they verified to Christ! That subtle enemy, "which deceiveth the whole world," was not able to deceive Him; neither the sons nor the father of wickedness could overthrow and subdue Him: all opposition fell before Him, and they who hated Him suffered unparalleled desolation; the promised faithfulness and mercy of Jehovah were ever with Him, and his kingdom was exalted with glory and honour. Bp. Horne.

[f] 26. I will set his dominion &c.] The dominions of David and his son Solomon extended from the Mediterranean "sea" to the "rivers" Euphrates, &c.; the empire of Christ is universal over Jews and Gentiles, throughout all the earth. See Ps. lxxii. 8, &c. Bp. Horne.

[g] 27, 28. He shall call me, &c.] All this, if in some respects true of David, is much more emphatically so of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Son of God" is one of his distinguished titles; of "the Father" He continually spoke, and to the Father He addressed his prayers and cries, in the days of his flesh; as man He was raised and exalted by the power and glory of the Divinity; He was "the first-born of every creature, the first-begotten from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth," Col. i. 15; Rev. i. 5. Bp. Horne.

[h] 29, 30. My mercy will I keep for him &c.] God kept his mercy and covenant with David, by preserving the line of his posterity, until his great antitype, Messiah, the subject of all the promises, came, by whom the kingdom was established for ever, being changed into a spiritual one, which is to be transferred from earth to heaven, and rendered coeval with those eternal mansions of the blessed. Bp. Horne.

[i] 31—34. But if his children forsake my law: &c.] The posterity of David were to enjoy God's favour, or be deprived of it, as they proved obedient or disobedient to his "law;" as they executed or perverted its civil "judgments;" as they observed or neglected its ceremonial "statutes," or religious institutions; as they kept or broke its "commandments," or moral precepts. When they became rebellious, idolatrous, and profligate, the rod was lifted up, and due chastisement inflicted, sometimes by the immediate hand of heaven, sometimes by the instrumentality of their heathen adversaries; famine and pestilence, war and captivity, were at different times employed to reclaim backsliding Israel. But still, the "covenant" of God in Christ stood sure; the Jewish nation was preserved, through all changes and revolutions, "until the Seed came to whom the promise was made;" nor was Jerusalem destroyed, before the new and spiritual kingdom of Messiah was set up in the earth. Christian communities, and the individuals that compose them, are in like manner corrected and punished for their offences. "Nevertheless, God's loving-kindness will he not utterly take from us, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. His covenant will he not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of his lips." So, "I am with you always," says the Redeemer, "even to the end of the world; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against my church," Matt. xxviii. 20; xvi. 18. Nor shall the world be destroyed, until Christ come again, and his glorious kingdom be ready to appear. Bp. Horne.

[k] 34. — I have sworn once by my holiness, &c.] The promise, covenant, and oath of God, which He declareth shall never fail, are here repeated. They relate to Christ, that "Seed," or "Son of David," who "endureth for ever." His throne is as resplendent as the "sun," and shall continue, after that luminary is extinguished : his church is permanent as the "moon," though, like her, subject to vicissitudes, and liable, for a time, to be obscured by eclipses, during her present state upon earth. And while the rainbow shall be seen in the clouds, man has "a faithful witness in heaven" of the immutable truth of God's word, and the infallible accomplishment of what He promises. Bp. Horne.

[1] 37, 38. But thou hast abhorred &c.] In the former part of our Psalm, we have seen what the divine promises were, which had been made to the house of David. By the latter part, upon which we are entering, it appears, that the Psalm was written at a time, when the church of Israel was in such a manner oppressed and reduced by her enemies, that her members began almost to despair of those promises receiving their accomplishment. God seemed to have "cast off" and "abhorred" his "anointed" and "servant," that is, David, or rather the prince of his family, who was upon the throne when this captivity and desolation happened; the "covenant" seemed to be overturned and "made void," when the "crown" of Israel was defiled in the dust. Bp. Horne.

[m] 39—44. Thou hast overthrown all his hedges : &c.] The manifold calamities of Sion are in these verses enumerated : the demolition of fences and fortifications; the cruel ravages consequent thereupon; the shame of defeats ; the reproaches and insults of victorious adversaries ; the dishonours of violent and untimely death. In days like these here described, when the church and the king are permitted to fall into the hands of those who hate them, and to drink thus deeply of the cup of affliction, distrust and despondency are apt to seize upon the minds of men. Nay, when the faithful few beheld the true "Son of David," and "Anointed" of Jehovah, in the day of his sufferings ; when they saw Him, without help or defence, "spoiled and reproached by his neighbours ;" when they viewed "the right hand of his adversaries set up," and all his "enemies rejoicing" over Him ; his "glory made to cease," and his "crown profaned in the dust; the days of his youth shortened," and Himself delivered over to a "shameful" as well as painful death; they then began to think "the covenant made void," and the promises at an end. "We trusted," said they, "that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel!" Luke xxiv. 21. And although Christ be long since risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven, yet the prevalence of iniquity, and the oppression of the church, have been, and in the last days will be, such, as to put the faith and hope of his servants to a sore trial, while they wait for his second, as the ancient Jews did for his first advent. Bp. Horne.

[n] 45—48. Lord, how long wilt thou hide thyself, &c.] This is the humble and dutiful expostulation of the church with God in all her distresses upon the earth. By asking, "How long, Lord ? wilt thou be angry for ever ?" she tacitly pleadeth his promise not to be so : she urgeth the shortness of man's life here below, the universality of the fatal sentence, the impossibility of avoiding death, and, if nothing farther was to happen, the frustration of the divine counsels concerning man. From thence she entreateth God to remember the "loving-kindnesses" once promised by Him with an oath to David, as related in the former part of the Psalm. These "loving-kindnesses" are called, in Isaiah, lv. 3, "the sure mercies of David ;" which "sure mercies of David" are affirmed by St. Paul, Acts xiii. 34, to have been then confirmed on Israel, when, in the person of Jesus, God raised our nature from the grave. To a resurrection, therefore, believers have ever aspired ; thither have they directed their wishes, and on that event have they fixed their hopes, as the end of temporal sorrows, and the beginning of eternal joys. Bp. Horne.

[o] 49. Remember, Lord, the rebuke &c.] The last argument urged by the church, in her expostulation with God for a speedy redemption, is, the continual reproach to which she was subject, on account of the promise being delayed. The "mighty people," or heathen nations, who held her in captivity, and were witnesses of her wretched and forlorn estate, ridiculed her pretensions to perpetuity of empire in the house of David ; they blasphemed the God, who was said to have made such promises ; and "reproached the footsteps," or mocked at the tardy advent of his Messiah, who was to establish in Israel his everlasting throne. All these cruel taunts and insults she was obliged "to bear in her bosom," and there to suppress them in silence, having nothing to answer in the day of her calamity and seeming destitution. St. Peter gives us a like account of the state of the Christian church in the latter days; he exhorts us to be "mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandments of the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, because there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming?" 2 Pet. iii. 2—4. Bp. Horne.

[p] 50. — Praised be the Lord for evermore. &c.] But whatever be at any time our distress, either as a community or as individuals, still are we to believe, still to hope, still to bless and praise Jehovah, whose word is true, whose works are faithful, whose chastisements are mercies, and all whose promises are, in Christ Jesus, yea, and amen, for evermore. Bp. Horne.

[q] Psalm xc.] This Psalm is called, in its title, "A prayer of Moses, the man of God." By him it is imagined to have been composed, when God shortened the days of the murmuring Israelites in the wilderness. See Numb. xiv. It is, however, a Psalm of general use, and is made, by the Church, a part of her funeral service. It containeth, 1, 2, an address to the eternal and unchangeable God, the Saviour and Preserver of his people; 3—10, a most affecting description of man's mortal and transitory state on earth since the fall; 11, a complaint, that few meditate in such a manner upon death, as to prepare themselves for it; 12, a prayer for grace so to do; 13—17, and for the mercies of redemption. Bp. Horne.

[r] 1, 2. Lord, thou hast been our refuge: &c.] The Psalmist, about to describe man's fleeting and transitory state, first directeth us to contemplate the unchangeable nature and attributes of God, who hath always been a "dwelling-place," or place of defence and refuge, affording protection and comfort to his people in the world, as He promised to be before the world began, and will, in a more glorious manner, continue to be after its dissolution. See, for a parallel, Ps. cii. 25, &c., with St. Paul's application, Heb. i. 10. Bp. Horne.

[s] 3. Thou turnest man to destruction: &c.] Death was the penalty inflicted on man for sin. The latter part of the verse alludes to the fatal sentence, Gen. iii. 19, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Bp. Horne.

As if it were said, to some as thou speakest the word, their breath is extinguished, and thou takest back to thyself those souls, which thou didst before unite with human bodies. See Eccles. xii. 7. Dr. Nicholls.

[t] 4. For a thousand years &c.] The connexion between the verse preceding, and the verse now before us, seems to be this. God sentenced man to death. It is true the execution of the sentence was at first deferred, and the term of human life suffered to extend to near a thousand years. But what was even that, what is any period of time, or time itself, if compared with the duration of the Eternal? All time is equal, when it is past; a thousand years, when gone, are forgotten as yesterday; and the longest life of man, to a person who looks back upon it, may appear only as three hours, or one quarter of the night. Bp. Horne.

It seems to have been a very ancient custom to divide the night into four portions, of three hours each, called watches. See Luke xii. 38. Travell.

[u] 7. For we consume away in thy displeasure: &c.] The generations of men are troubled and consumed by divers diseases, and sundry kinds of death, through the displeasure of God; his displeasure is occasioned by their sins, all of which He seeth and punisheth. If Moses wrote this Psalm, the provocations and chastisements of Israel are here alluded to. But the case of the Israelites in the wilderness is the case of Christians in the world; and the same thing is true both in them and in us. Bp. Horne.

[x] 10. The days of our age are threescore years and ten; &c.] This again might be primarily spoken by Moses, concerning Israel. The generation of those who came out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upwards, fell within the space of forty years, in the wilderness; Numb. xiv. 29; and they who lived longest experienced only labour and sorrow, until they were cut off, like grass, and, by the breath of God's displeasure, blown away from the face of the earth. Like the Israelites, we have been brought out of Egypt, and sojourn in the wilderness; like them, we murmur, and offend God our Saviour; like them, we fall and perish. To the age of seventy years few of us can hope to attain; labour and sorrow are our portion in the world; we are mowed down, as this year's grass of the field; we fly away, and are no more seen in the land of the living. Bp. Horne.

[y] 11. But who regardeth the power of thy wrath: &c.] Yet notwithstanding thy awakening judgments, who is the man that makes a right use of them, and is instructed thereby to take warning against sin? And yet it is very certain, that God's vengeance will be severer against those who are incorrigible, and who do not learn to reverence and obey Him under his chastisements. Dr. Nicholls.

[z] 12. O teach us to number our days: &c.] He, who "numbereth his days," or taketh a right account of the shortness of this present life, compared with the unnumbered ages of that eternity which is future, will soon become a proficient in the school of true wisdom. He will learn to give the preference where it is due; to do good, and suffer evil, upon earth, expecting the reward of both in heaven. Make us wise, blessed Lord, but wise unto salvation. Bp. Horne.

[a] 16, 17. Shew thy servants thy work: &c.] The redemption of man is that "work" of God, whereby his "glory" is manifested to all generations, and which all generations do therefore long to behold accomplished. For this purpose the faithful beseech God to let his "beauty," his splendour, the light of his countenance, his grace and favour, be upon them; to "establish the work of their hands," to bless, prosper, and perfect them in their Christian course and warfare; until, through Him, they shall be enabled to subdue sin, and triumph over death. Bp. Horne.

[b] PSALM xci.] The prophet, 1—10, declareth the security of the righteous man under the care and protection of heaven, in times of danger, when, 11, 12, a guard of angels is set about him. 13, His final victory over the enemies of his salvation is foretold; and, 14—16, God Himself is introduced, promising him deliverance, exaltation, glory, and immortality. The Psalm is addressed, primarily, to Messiah. That it relateth to Him, Jews and Christians are agreed; and the devil, Matt. iv. 6, cited two verses from it, as universally known and allowed to have been spoken of Him. Bp. Horne.

The penman of this Psalm is uncertain. Poole. It should be understood as applicable to all other pious men, as well as the writer, according to the general aphorism, ver. 1: and in a most eminent manner to the Messiah. Dr. Hammond.

[c] 1. Whoso dwelleth under the defence &c.] He, that puts himself under the protection of the Almighty, shall be sure to be safely preserved under the shadow of his wings. Bp. Hall. The description is eminently applicable to the man Christ Jesus. He is represented as dwelling, like the ark in the holy of holies, under the immediate "shadow" and protection of the Almighty, who was his "refuge and fortress" against the open attacks of his enemies; his preserver from the "snares" of the devil, and from the universal contagion of sin, that spiritual "pestilence." In all dangers, whether spiritual or corporeal, the members of Christ's mystical body may reflect with comfort, that they are under the same Almighty Protector. Bp. Horne.

[d] 4. He shall defend thee under his wings: &c.] The security afforded by a superintending Providence to those who trust therein, is here, with the utmost beauty and elegance, compared to that shelter, which the young of birds are always sure to find under the "wings" of their dam, when fear causeth them to fly thither for refuge: see Deut. xxxii. 11; Matt. xxiii. 37. The "truth" of God's word, wherein He promiseth to be our defence, is, to a believer, his "shield and buckler," in the day of battle and war. Bp. Horne.

[e] 7. A thousand shall fall beside thee, &c.] This and such like promises are not to be understood absolutely and universally, as if no truly good man could be cut hand: but it shall not come nigh thee.

8 Yea, with thine eyes shalt thou behold[f]: and see the reward of the ungodly.

9 For thou, Lord, art my hope: thou hast set thine house of defence very high.

10 There shall no evil happen unto thee: neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.

off by the plague or other common calamities; but with due limitations and conditions; either on man's part, as, if there be a defect in his faith or obedience: or on God's part, when God sees that death is more for his good than life; as it apparently is, when righteous men are taken away from the evil to come, Isa. lvii. 1. In which case, though God doth not give the thing promised, yet He giveth a far greater mercy instead of it, and so fulfils his promise in the best sense and to the greatest advantage. Poole.

[f] 8. Yea, with thine eyes shalt thou behold: &c.] The meaning is, that the righteous person all along spoken of, himself secure from the judgments of God, should in safety behold the destruction wrought by them upon impenitent and incorrigible sinners. This will be the case with the church, as well as her glorious Head, at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[g] 11, 12. For he shall give his angels charge over thee: &c.] This passage was cited by the devil, who tempted our Lord to cast Himself from the pinnacle of the temple, upon presumption of the promise here made, that angels should guard and support Him in all dangers. But Christ, in his answer, at once detecteth and exposeth the sophistry of the grand deceiver, by shewing, that the promise belonged only to those who fell unavoidably into danger, in the course of duty; such might hope for the help and protection of heaven; but that he who should wantonly and absurdly throw himself into peril, merely to try whether Providence would bring him out of it, must expect to perish for his pains. "Jesus saith unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," Matt. iv. 7. Bp. Horne.

[h] 13. Thou shalt go upon the lion &c.] The fury and venom of our spiritual enemies are often in Scripture portrayed by the natural qualities of "lions and serpents." Messiah's complete victory over those enemies seemeth here to be predicted. Through grace He maketh us more than conquerors in our conflicts with the same adversaries. "The God of peace," saith St. Paul, "shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly," Rom. xvi. 20. Give us, O Lord, courage to resist the "lion's" rage, and wisdom to elude the wiles of the "serpent." Bp. Horne.

[i] 14. Because he hath set his love upon me, &c.] In the former part of our Psalm, the prophet had spoken in his own person; here God Himself is plainly introduced as the speaker. And, O how sweet, how delightful and comfortable, are his words, addressed eminently to his beloved Son Messiah; and in Him to all of us, his adopted children, and the heirs of eternal life; to all who love God, and have "known his name!" To such are promised an answer to their prayers; the presence of their heavenly Father with them; in the day of trouble, protection and deliverance; salvation, and honour, and glory, and immortality. Bp. Horne.

[k] Psalm xcii.] The title of this Psalm is, "A Psalm, or Song, for the Sabbath-day." It teacheth, 1—5, the duty, time, and manner, of giving thanks for the works and dispensations of God. Thoughtless men are admonished, 6, to reflect upon the final issue of all these works and dispensations; namely, 7, 8, the utter perdition of the ungodly, and, 9. 13, the exaltation of the church in Christ Jesus, 14, to the praise and glory of God most high. Bp. Horne.

The Psalm was intended, not so much to commemorate the creation, and sabbath following that; as to foretel that rest from persecutions, which God had promised to give his church under the Messiah. Dr. Hammond.

[l] 1. It is a good thing &c.] "Thanksgiving" is the duty, and ought to be the delight, of a Christian. It is his duty, as being the least return he can make to his great Benefactor: it ought to be his delight, for it is that of angels, and will be that of every grateful heart, whether in heaven or on earth. The "mercy" of God in promising salvation, and his "faithfulness" in accomplishing it, are inexhaustible subjects for "morning and evening" praises; every instrument should be strung, and every voice tuned, to celebrate them, until day and night come to an end. But more especially should this be done on the "sabbath-day;" which, when so employed, affords a lively resemblance of that eternal sabbath, to be hereafter kept by the redeemed, in the kingdom of God. Bp. Horne.

[m] 5. O Lord, how glorious are thy works: &c.] Glorious are the works, profound the counsels, marvellous the dispensations of God, in nature, in providence, in grace. But all are lost to the man void of spiritual discernment; who, like his fellow "brutes," is bowed down to earth, and knoweth no pleasures but those of sense. Bp. Horne.

[n] 8. For lo, thine enemies, O Lord, &c.] The "workers of iniquity" are the enemies of "Jehovah," and will be "scattered" by the breath of his displeasure, as grass, after it is cut down, dried up, and withered, is driven away by the whirlwinds of heaven. "But my horn," saith the Psalmist, (it is likely in the person of Messiah,) "my horn," that is, the strength and power of my kingdom, "shalt thou exalt like the horn of the unicorn," like the power of the strongest creatures, to which that of states and empires is often compared; "I shall be," or, "I am anointed with fresh oil;" I am appointed and consecrated king by the holy unction. Christians have "an unction from the Holy One," by which they are enabled to subdue their spiritual enemies; they reign over their passions and affections; they are exalted in the Redeemer: they are "made unto their God kings and priests," 1 John ii. 20; Rev. v. 10. Bp. Horne.

[o] 11. The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree: &c.] The momentary prosperity of the wicked was compared above to the transient verdure of "grass." The durable felicity of the righteous is here likened to the lasting strength and beauty of "palms" and "cedars." Bp. Horne.

[p] 12. Such as are planted in the house of the Lord: &c.] Believers are styled by Isaiah, "Trees of righteousness, the planting of Jehovah," chap. lxi. 3. They are planted by the living waters of comfort in the house of God; where, under the means of grace, they "flourish" in hope of glory. Bp. Horne.

[q] 13. They also shall bring forth more fruit &c.] Happy the man, whose goodness is always progressive, and whose virtues increase with his years; who loseth not, in multiplicity of worldly cares or pleasures, the holy fervours of his first love, but goeth on burning and shining more and more, to the end of his days. Bp. Horne.

[r] 14. That they may shew how true &c.] The fruit brought forth in the church redounds to the glory of God, by whom the trees, in this his new paradise, were planted; it shews to all the world, that He is just and "upright" in his dealings; that He is true to his promises; immoveable, as a "rock," in his counsels; determined to punish the wicked, and to reward the good; so that, when his proceedings shall come to be unfolded at the last day, it will appear to men and angels, that "there is no unrighteousness in him." Bp. Horne.

[s] PSALM xciii.] The Jews acknowledge, that the kingdom of Messiah is prophesied of in this Psalm, and in all those which follow, to the hundredth. 1—3, The church celebrates the majesty, power, and glory, of the eternal King; 4, describes the danger she is often in from persecutions, &c.; but, 5, strengtheneth herself in God her Saviour, whose house, 6, ought to be, like Himself, full of truth and holiness. Bp. Horne.

[t] 1. The Lord is King, &c.] From the beginning, God, as Creator, was sovereign Lord of the universe. He was also formerly, in a more especial manner, King of Israel. But since that time, a new and spiritual kingdom hath been erected by Jesus Christ, as Redeemer, whom the church now celebrates, and whose praises she sings continually. Risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven, the Lord Jesus reigneth, and shall reign, "till he hath put all enemies under his feet," 1 Cor. xv. 25. By the glorification of his human nature, He is "clothed with majesty: All power is given unto him in heaven and in earth," Matt. xxviii. 18; so that He is "girded with strength;" and through that strength, He hath "established" the new "world," that is to say, his church, that it "cannot be moved," or subverted, by all the powers of earth and hell. Bp. Horne.

[a] 4. The floods are risen, &c.] By "the floods" are meant the enemies of God's kingdom, who are often compared to floods for their numbers, force, rage, &c. See Isa. viii. 7, 8; xvii. 12, 13; Jer. xlvi. 7, 8. Poole. In particular are meant the devil and wicked men, who stood out against, rejected, and crucified the Messiah, whose spiritual kingdom is emblematically represented throughout the Psalm, as the Jews have resolved. Dr. Hammond.

[x] 6. Thy testimonies, O Lord, are very sure: &c.] God's "testimonies" are the promises made in Scripture to the church, that He will be with her, during the afflictions which befal her here below, and will, in time, deliver her out of all her troubles. These "testimonies are very sure;" these promises do not, they cannot, fail. "Holiness," therefore, which consisteth in obedience and patience, "becometh," is the proper ornament, grace, and beauty of "his house," and of Christians, those living stones that compose it. Sacred and inviolable is the word of our King; sacred and inviolable should be the loyalty of his subjects. Bp. Horne.

[y] Psalm xciv.] The Psalmist, complaining of corrupt and troublous times, in the person of the church, 1—4, prayeth for the downfal of prosperous wickedness; 5, 6, he describeth the cruelty, and, 7—11, reproveth the atheistical folly of those who persecute God's people; 12, 13, he extolleth the blessedness of the persecuted, if they are endued with faith and patience, inasmuch as, 14, 15, the divine promise and their future reward are certain; he, therefore, 16—19, throweth himself wholly upon God, whose mercies never fail, who, 20, 21, cannot be on the side of iniquity, but, 22, 23, will preserve his saints, and destroy their enemies. Bp. Horne.

[z] 1. O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth: &c.] The church, however unjustly oppressed and afflicted, remembereth that "vengeance belongeth" not to her, had she the power to inflict it, but "to God" only, who hath said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay," Rom. xii. 19. To Him, therefore, she maketh her supplication, that He would manifest his glory in her salvation; that He would ascend the tribunal, "as judge of the earth," try her cause, and avenge her of her insolent and cruel persecutors. Bp. Horne.

[a] 3, 4. Lord, how long shall the ungodly: &c.] The "triumphs" of wickedness, the "hard speeches," taunts, and scoffs of infidelity, against Christ, and all who belong to Him, are a continual grief of heart to the faithful in the world, who desire nothing so much as to see the empire of sin at an end, and the kingdom of righteousness established. But for this great event they must wait with patience, until the time appointed by the Father, when the iniquities of the world, and the sufferings of the church, shall be full. See Rev. vi. 9, &c. Bp. Horne.

[b] 5. They smite down thy people, &c.] Some instances of cruelty, exercised by the enemies against the "people and heritage" of God, are here specified. Bp. Horne.

[c] 7—10. And yet they say, Tush, &c.] The Psalmist informeth us, that men are encouraged in their injustice and villany, by a persuasion, that God doth not behold or regard what they do to his people. The absurdity of such a conceit is shewn from these considerations; that it is God who bestoweth on man the powers of seeing and hearing, and therefore that He Himself must needs be possessed of those powers in the highest perfection; that it is God who hath instructed the world, by his revelations, in religious knowledge, and consequently, without all doubt, He cannot be ignorant of the use and abuse which men make of that his unspeakable gift. Bp. Horne.

[d] 11. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man: &c.] So far is God from being a stranger to the actions, that He is privy to the first "thoughts" of men, from whence those actions flow: He is acquainted with all their counsels against his church, and knoweth them to be as vain as the imagination that He is ignorant of them. The wicked can no more escape the hand, than they can elude the eye, of Heaven. Bp. Horne.

MORNING PRAYER.

Morning Prayer, before the Psalms.

PSALM xcv.[l] Venite, exultemus.

O Come, let us sing unto the Lord[m] : let us heartily rejoice in the strength of our salvation.

2 Let us come before his presence[n]

Jehovah shall infallibly stand, happy is the man who, having learned, from the Scriptures of truth, the lessons of faith and patience, enjoys tranquillity of mind in time of trouble, while destruction is preparing for the impenitent. Then, when "the days of adversity" are over, shall pain and sorrow take a final leave of the righteous, to go and dwell with the wicked, to eternal ages. The former shall enter into the rest and joy of their Lord; the latter, into the fire prepared originally for the devil and his angels. Bp. Horne.

[f] 14, 15. For the Lord will not fail his people: &c.] The sense of these two verses is, Though God at present exercise his people with very sore calamities, yet they may be confident He will not utterly forsake them. But hereafter justice shall return, and take her place on the judgment-seat: and what at present seems irregular in providence, shall be made up by other future dispensations. This will afford such clear evidence of the righteousness of God's proceedings, that no good man shall ever doubt of them afterwards, but shall appeal to his tribunal, as the justest court of judicature. Dr. Nicholls.

[g] 16. Who will rise up with me against the wicked: &c.] But in the mean season, while "evil-doers" are permitted to prosper, and "the workers of iniquity" carry on their designs, the prophet asks in the person of the church, Who is there that will or can protect, defend, and deliver? The answer is, God only can do it: "Unless the Lord had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence," or, I had almost been in the state of death. Bp. Horne.

[h] 20. Wilt thou have any thing to do &c.] One consideration which affordeth comfort to the faithful under persecution and affliction, is this, that God can never be on the side of oppression and injustice, though, to answer wise and salutary purposes, He may, for a time, suffer them to have the dominion, and to establish iniquity by law. A distinction there certainly must be between right and wrong; and the former must as certainly triumph at the last day. Bp. Horne.

[i] 21. They gather them together &c.] Righteousness and innocence are most atrocious crimes, in the eyes of wickedness and guilt. For these crimes Cain slew his brother Abel, the Jews crucified Christ, the Pagans tortured and murdered his disciples, and bad men in all ages have persecuted the good. "Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you," 1 John iii. 13. Bp. Horne.

[k] 22, 23. But the Lord is my refuge: &c.] Jehovah is our "defence;" we fear not the fiery darts of the enemy; He is "the rock of our refuge;" we bid defiance to the rage and malice of earth and hell. Armed with the shield of faith, and the sword of the Spirit, we rise superior to every effort of diabolical malice and secular power; waiting, in patience and hope, for the coming of that day, when He who hateth unrighteousness, and with whom the throne of iniquity can have no fellowship, shall visit the wickedness of the wicked upon them; when the world of the ungodly shall share the fate of apostate Jerusalem, and the righteous shall be glorified with their Lord and Saviour. Bp. Horne.

[l] Psalm xcv.] This Psalm is an invitation to all to bless and praise the name of God, and to live obediently before Him. It is affirmed to have been written by David, Heb. iv. 7; and may probably have been fitted by him, among others here put together, for the solemnity of bringing the ark to the place of God's rest, ver. 11. It is by the Jews confessed to refer to the times of the Messiah, as we see it applied Heb. iii. and iv. Dr. Hammond.

This Psalm hath been long used in the Christian church, as a proper introduction to her holy services. It containeth, 1, 2, an exhortation to praise Jehovah, 3, for his greatness, 4, 5, and for his works of creation; 6, men are invited to worship Him as their Maker, and, 7, as their Preserver; 8—11, they are warned against tempting and provoking Him, by the example of the Israelites in the wilderness. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews hath taught us to consider the Psalm as an address to believers under the Gospel. Bp. Horne.

[m] 1. O come, let us sing unto the Lord: &c.] In this first verse, Christians now exhort and stir up each other, as the Jews did of old, to employ their voices in honour of Jehovah, to celebrate "the rock of their salvation." Jesus, by redeeming us from our enemies, hath opened our lips, and our mouths ought, therefore, to shew forth his praise. Bp. Horne.

[n] 2. Let us come before his presence &c.] The "presence" of Jehovah dwelt formerly between the cheru-

PSALM xcvi.[u] Cantate Domino.

O Sing unto the Lord a new song[x]: sing unto the Lord, all the whole earth.

2 Sing unto the Lord, and praise him, in a tabernacle, or temple, made with hands, whither the Israelites were to resort, until God became manifest in the flesh. After that time, the divine presence left the synagogue, and removed into the Christian church; by her we are now invited to "come before that presence with thanksgiving," and, while we "make a joyful noise," by chanting these divine "Psalms," to imitate, in some measure, the heavenly choirs, who "rest not," from their blessed employment of praising God, "day or night," Rev. iv. 8. Bp. Horne.

[o] 3. For the Lord is a great God: &c.] It is not without reason, that we are exhorted to give thanks and praise unto our God and King; for He is "worthy to receive glory and blessing," Rev. v. 12. He is a God above all that are called by that name; above those deities, which were once worshipped by the ancient heathen; above the world, which still continues to be an object of adoration, among infatuated mortals. His throne is over all, and power and dominion are his. Bp. Horne.

[p] 6. O come, let us worship and fall down: &c.] As in the beginning of the Psalm we were called upon to "praise" Jehovah, so here we are invited to humble ourselves before Him in "prayer." From Him we had our being; Him, therefore, we are to supplicate for every other blessing, both in this life, and that which is to come. And since He made our bodies, as well as our souls, it is meet and right that they should bear their part in his service, and that internal worship should be accompanied and signified by that which is external. Bp. Horne.

[q] 7. For he is the Lord our God: &c.] An additional reason why we should both praise Jehovah, and pray to Him, is the peculiar relation into which He hath been pleased to put Himself by the covenant of grace; "he is our God;" and we are the objects of his tender care and unspeakable love: we are his "people," and his "sheep;" his chosen flock which He hath purchased with his blood, which He feeds with his word, and refreshes with his Spirit, in fair and pleasant pastures. Bp. Horne.

[r] 8. To-day if ye will hear his voice, &c.] What follows to the end of the Psalm is spoken in the person of God Himself, who may be considered as addressing us, in these latter days, by the Gospel of his Son; for so the apostle teaches us to apply the whole passage, Heb. iii, iv. The Israelites, when they came out of Egypt, had a day of probation, and a promised rest to succeed it; but, by unbelief and disobedience, they to whom it was promised, that is, the generation of those who came out of Egypt, fell short of it, and died in the wilderness. The Gospel, in like manner, offers, both to Jew and Gentile, another day of probation in this world, and another promised rest to succeed it, which remaineth for the people of God, in heaven. All whom it concerns are, therefore, exhorted to beware lest they forfeit the second rest, as murmuring and rebellious Israel came short of the first. The verses now before us allude to what passed at the place called "Massah," and "Meribah," from the people there "tempting" and striving with their God, notwithstanding all the mighty works which He had wrought for them before their eyes. Exod. xvii. 7. Bp. Horne.

[s] 10. Forty years long was I grieved &c.] O the desperate presumption of man, that he should offend his Maker "forty years!" O the patience and long-suffering of his Maker, that He should allow him forty years to offend in! Sin begins in the "heart," by its desires "wandering" and going astray after forbidden objects: whence follows inattention to the "ways" of God; to his dispensations, and our own duty. Bp. Horne.

[t] 11. Unto whom I sware in my wrath: &c.] Exclusion from Canaan was the punishment of Israelitish contumacy; exclusion from heaven is to be the punishment of disobedience among Christians. To take vengeance on those who reject the Gospel terms, is no less a part of the covenant and oath of God, than it is to save and glorify those who accept them. Yet men continue deliberately to commit those sins, which the Almighty standeth thus engaged to punish with destruction! "Take heed," therefore, "brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. But exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end; while it is said, To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts as in the provocation. For some, when they had heard, did provoke; howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses. But with whom was He grieved forty years? Was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcases fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware He, that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief. Let us therefore fear, lest, a pro-

8 Ascribe unto the Lord the honour due unto his Name: bring presents, and come into his courts.

9 O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: let the whole earth stand in awe of him.

10 Tell it out among the heathen that the Lord is King[b]: and that it is he who hath made the round world so fast that it cannot be moved: and how that he shall judge the people righteously.

11 Let the heavens rejoice[c], and let the earth be glad: let the sea make a noise, and all that therein is.

12 Let the field be joyful, and all that is in it: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord.

mise being made us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the Gospel preached, as well as unto them; but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it," Heb. iii. 12, &c. Bp. Horne.

[u] PSALM xcvi.] By common consent of Jews and Christians, we apply this Psalm to the times of Messiah. 1—3, Men are exhorted to sing his praises; to declare his salvation; 4, 5, to acknowledge his supremacy over the gods of the nations, with, 6, the glory and beauty of his sanctuary; 7—9, to give Him the honour, the worship, and the obedience due unto Him, and, 10, to publish the glad tidings of his kingdom being established: 11—13, the whole creation is called upon to rejoice at this great event. We find, by 1 Chron. xvi, that David delivered out this Psalm, to be sung on occasion of temporal blessings prefigurative of future spiritual ones. Bp. Horne.

[x] 1. O sing unto the Lord a new song: &c.] Jehovah, our Redeemer, is the person whose praises are to be sung. They are to be sung in a "new" song; a song calculated to celebrate new mercies, prefigured by old ones wrought for Israel in former times; a song fit for the voices of renewed and regenerate men to sing in the new Jerusalem, in those new heavens and that new earth, which constitute the new creation, or kingdom of Jesus Christ. And as the mercies of God are universal, extending themselves not only to the Jews, but to all the nations of the earth, all the nations of the earth are therefore exhorted to bear a part in this new song: "Sing unto the Lord a new song; sing unto the Lord, all the earth." Bp. Horne.

The exhortation to "sing a new song" alludes to the intended institution of a new worship. Bp. Horsley.

[y] 3. Declare his honour unto the heathen: &c.] The "glory" and "honour" of Messiah in his incarnation, his life, his death, resurrection, ascension, and kingdom, the "wonders" or miracles by Him wrought upon the bodies and souls of men; these were the things "declared among the heathen," even "among all people," by the apostles and their successors; these things are still declared, by the Scriptures read, and sermons preached, in the church, which was gathered originally from among the Gentiles. Bp. Horne.

[z] 6. Glory and worship are before him: &c.] The sanctuary, or holy place, appointed for the assembly to whom God will powerfully present Himself, is the most glorious majestick place in the world: there our prayers are heard, our wants supplied, and sufficiency of strength supplied to those who need it and ask for it. And this is an image of what shall be at the coming of Christ, that spiritual kingdom of his among us, by the efficacy of his grace in the church. Dr. Hammond.

[a] 7—9. Ascribe unto the Lord, &c.] In these three verses, the tribes of the spiritual Israel are enjoined to ascribe to their Redeemer all "glory and strength," as essentially inherent in Him, and by Him communicated to his people; to give Him the entire "glory of his name," and of that "salvation" imported by it; to bring the "sacrifices" of the new law, and to assemble in the "courts" of his house; to worship Him in that beauty of "holiness" which is constituted by the regular and solemn services of the church; to "fear" and obey Him, as the subjects of a king invested with plenitude of power in heaven and earth. Bp. Horne.

[b] 10. Tell it out among the heathen that the Lord is King: &c.] That the Lord here is the Messiah, is the resolution generally of the ancients, both Jews and Christians. Dr. Hammond. In other words, Make proclamation, therefore, O ye apostles and preachers of the Gospel, that a new and eternal kingdom is erected; the usurped empire of Satan is overthrown, and the Lord Jesus, having redeemed mankind, reigneth in the hearts of his people by faith; a community is formed, not upon the plan of secular policy, but upon the divine principle of heavenly love; it is established on immoveable foundations, nor shall the gates of hell prevail against it: righteousness shall dwell in it, since He who is the King of righteousness, presides, directs, and determines all things by his word, and his Spirit. Bp. Horne.

[c] 11. Let the heavens rejoice, &c.] Transported with a view of these grand events, and beholding in spirit the advent of King Messiah, the Psalmist exults in most jubilant and triumphant strains, calling the whole creation to break forth into joy, and to celebrate the glories of redemption. Bp. Horne.

[d] 13. For he cometh, &c.] The coming of Christ is twofold: first, He came to sanctify the creature, and He will come again to glorify it. Either of his kingdoms, that of grace, or that of glory, may be signified by his

"judging the world in righteousness and truth." If creation be represented as rejoicing at the establishment of the former, how much greater will the joy be at the approach of the latter! seeing that, notwithstanding Christ be long since come in the flesh, though He be ascended into heaven, and have sent the Spirit from thence, yet "the whole creation," as the apostle speaks, Rom. viii. 22, "groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, expecting to be delivered, from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body;" when at the renovation of all things, man, new made, shall return to the days of his youth, to begin an immortal spring, and be for ever young. Bp. Horne.

[e] Psalm xcvii.] This Psalm is thought to have been composed by David, on occasion of his peaceable re-establishment in his kingdom, after the rebellion and destruction of Absalom. But it as literally contains a prediction of the Messiah's inauguration to his regal office, and the signal exercise thereof in the destruction of his crucifiers, and all other enemies of his kingdom. Dr. Hammond. That it belongs to Christ, appears by those words, which the apostle to the Hebrews alleges out of the 7th verse, and applies to his royal power and authority over angels: which the Hebrew doctors themselves take to be there intended. Bp. Patrick.

In this Psalm, 1, the reign of Christ is again celebrated, and the nations are again called to rejoice on that account: 2—7, He is described as taking vengeance on his enemies, overthrowing idolatry in the heathen world, commanding adoration from all creatures, and, 8, 9, inspiring gladness into the church, by subduing her enemies: 10—12, the duties of holiness, thankfulness, and religious joy, are inculcated. Bp. Horne.

[f] 1. The Lord is King, &c.] Triumphant over death and hell, the Lord Jesus is gone up on high, and "reigneth." What greater cause can the whole earth have to "rejoice;" yea, even the most distant isles of the Gentiles, to "be glad," and to sing for joy; since they are all become his subjects, and share the unspeakable blessings of so gracious a reign? We Britons, as inhabiting one of those heathen isles, and enjoying so fair a portion of evangelical blessings, have reason to repeat this verse, with a particular pleasure and energy. Bp. Horne.

[g] 2. Clouds and darkness are round about him: &c.] When the mercy and grace of our heavenly King are to be described, He is likened to the sun shining in a clear firmament, and gladdening universal nature with his beneficent rays. But when we are to conceive an idea of Him as going forth, in "justice and judgment," to discomfit and punish his adversaries, the imagery is then borrowed from a troubled sky; He is pictured as surrounded by "clouds and darkness;" from whence issue lightnings and thunders, storms and tempests, affrighting and confounding the wicked and impenitent. Bp. Horne.

[h] 3. There shall go a fire before him: &c.] The judgments of God, and their effects upon the world, are here set forth, under the usual similitude of lightning and fire from heaven, causing the earth to tremble and the mountains to melt and dissolve away. The exaltation of Christ to the throne of his kingdom, was followed by a dreadful display of that vengeance which broke in pieces the Jewish nation, and brought their civil and religious polity to an utter dissolution. In the history of their destruction, the world of the ungodly may view a striking picture of the great and terrible day, when the Lord Jesus shall render a recompense to all his enemies. He is then to descend in flaming fire; lightnings shall be his harbingers; the earth shall tremble; and the hills shall, literally, "melt like wax at the presence of Jehovah." Bp. Horne.

[i] 7. Confounded be all they &c.] When Jesus was exalted, his Gospel published, and his power and glory made known in the heathen world, men grew "ashamed" of their "images, and boasted themselves in their idols" no more. The last clause of our verse, "Worship him, all ye gods," declares the supremacy of Christ over all that are called gods, in heaven and in earth, who are enjoined to pay adoration unto Him, instead of claiming it for themselves. Bp. Horne.

[k] 8. Sion heard of it, and rejoiced: &c.] The inhabitants of the new "Sion," or the people of God, "heard" the tidings, that idols and idolatry were fallen, and the Lord Jesus reigned triumphant; they heard, and "were glad; the daughters of Judah," or Christian churches, "rejoiced" in the Holy Ghost, with joy unspeakable, "because of these judgments" of their God upon his enemies, whereby he evinced Himself superior to the powers of the earth, and the gods of the nations. Bp. Horne.

[l] 10. O ye that love the Lord, &c.] Having sung the glory of the Redeemer, the Psalmist delineates the duty of the redeemed. They are characterized by their "love of God;" they are enjoined to "hate evil;" this that ye hate the thing which is evil: the Lord preserveth the souls of his saints; he shall deliver them from the hand of the ungodly.

hatred is, indeed, a consequence, and a sure proof, of that love, when it is genuine and sincere. Religion must be rooted in the heart, and spring from thence. A Christian must not only serve God outwardly, but must inwardly "love" Him; he must not content himself with abstaining from overt acts of sin, but must truly "hate" it. They who do so, are "the saints" of God, whose souls He "preserveth" from evil, and will finally "deliver" from the evil one, and his associates, by a happy death, and a glorious resurrection. Bp. Horne.

[m] 12. Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous: &c.] Tribulation itself should not prevent our "rejoicing in Jehovah our righteousness," who justifieth us from our sins; no adversity ought to make us negligent in celebrating, with thanksgiving, the "commemorations of his holiness," which the Church hath appointed to be observed; to the end that we may always remember, with gratitude, how great things He hath done for us already, and reflect, with comfort, on those much greater things which He hath promised to do for us hereafter. Bp. Horne.

[n] PSALM xcviii.] This Psalm was probably composed by David, or by some holy man in imitation of what David saith in Psalm xcvi; upon occasion of some remarkable deliverance, which God had newly granted to Israel, as an earnest of future blessings, especially of the coming of that great blessing, the Lord Christ, to give complete salvation to his people. Bp. Patrick.

In this evangelical hymn, the prophet, 1—4, extols the miracles, the victory, the salvation, the righteousness, the mercy, and truth, of the Redeemer; on account of which, 5—10, he calls upon man, and the whole creation, to rejoice and praise Jehovah. Bp. Horne.

[o] 1. O sing unto the Lord a new song: &c.] New mercies and wonders demand new songs. And what mercies, what wonders, can be compared with those wrought by the holy Jesus? Bp. Horne.

[p] 3. The Lord declared his salvation: &c.] The "salvation" of Jehovah was "declared" or "made known," by the preaching of Christ Himself in Judea, for the space of three years; his "righteousness" whereby sinners are justified, was "openly shewed," by the sermons of his apostles, "in the sight of the heathen." Bp. Horne.

[q] 4. He hath remembered his mercy &c.] In sending the Messiah, God shewed Himself mindful of the promises, which "mercy" prompted Him to make, and "truth" required Him to perform. These promises were made to "the house of Israel;" to the lost sheep of that house, Christ declared Himself sent; and the apostles offered salvation first to the Jews: but to them it was never intended that evangelical blessings should be confined. The prophets spake in plain terms of the call of the Gentiles, who were to be adopted into the holy family, and made the children of Abraham. The Gospel was accordingly preached to the nations, the apostles made their progress through the world, and "all the ends of the earth saw the salvation of God." Bp. Horne.

[r] 5. Shew yourselves joyful &c.] The Psalmist, beholding in spirit the accomplishment of the promises, the advent of Christ, and the glory of his kingdom, thinks it criminal in any creature to be silent; he bids the whole earth break forth into joy, and exult in God our Saviour, with every token of gratitude and thankfulness; with voices, and instruments of all kinds, in perfect harmony, with tempers and affections according, in like manner men are enjoined to sound aloud the praises of their great Redeemer. Bp. Horne.

[s] 8. Let the sea make a noise, &c.] The inanimate parts of creation are called upon to bear their parts in the new song, and to fill up the universal chorus of praise and thanksgiving, in honour of Him that sitteth upon the throne. Bp. Horne.

[t] 10. With righteousness shall he judge &c.] The subject of this general joy is, as before, in Psalm xcvi. 13, the advent of Messiah to reform the world, to execute judgment upon the wicked, and to establish a kingdom of righteousness upon the earth. We expect his second advent to restore all things, to judge the world, to condemn his enemies, and to begin his "glorious" reign. Then shall heaven and earth rejoice, and the joy of the redeemed shall be full. Bp. Horne.

[a] Psalm xcix.] This Psalm, anciently attributed to David, seems first to refer to his quiet establishment in that throne to which God had chosen him, but prophetically also, as the former, to the kingdom of Messiah. Dr. Hammond.

Under images borrowed from the old dispensation, the prophet celebrates, 1, the reign of Messiah, and the submission of his enemies; 2—4, his exaltation, holiness, power, and justice: which, 5, men are exhorted to acknowledge and adore. 6—9, The examples of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, are introduced, to encourage us in worshipping and serving our God and Saviour. Bp. Horne.

[x] 1. The Lord is King, &c.] Jehovah reigneth in the Christian church, as He did of old in the Jewish temple; when He appeared between the cherubims in the holy of holies, in the form and likeness of a man, encompassed with "glory:" Ezek. i. 26; Numb. vii. 89; He subdued the enemies of Israel, when they raged most furiously against his people; He will also bring into subjection the adversaries of the Gospel, and finally render us victorious over the powers of darkness. Bp. Horne.

[y] 4. The King's power loveth judgement ; &c.] Although the "power" or "strength" of our King be infinite, yet it is never exerted, but in "righteousness" and just "judgment," which are his delight; they compose the firm basis of his throne, and direct his whole administration. Impenitent rebels must feel the weight of his arm, and none can accuse the justice of their punishment: but in all other cases, He is "mighty only to save," Isa. lxiii. 1. Bp. Horne.

[z] 6. Moses and Aaron among his priests, &c.] To encourage the faithful in the worship of God, the examples of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, are adduced, men of like infirmities with ourselves, whose prayers were heard, both for themselves and others, and answers were returned to them from the mystick "cloud," that symbol of the divine presence, which, for a while, was itinerant with the camp in the wilderness, and then became fixed in the tabernacle at Shiloh, till its last removal to mount Sion. These men were heard through the intercession of the great Mediator, whom they represented. Through that same intercession, our prayers also are heard, if we "keep his testimonies, and the ordinances that he hath given us." Bp. Horne.

[a] 8. Thou heardest them, O Lord our God: &c.] The meaning is, that when the people had provoked God, and God's wrath was already gone out against them for their crying sins, these men's prayers were so effectual with Him as to avert the plagues, and obtain remission for them. Dr. Hammond.

This was the case when Moses interceded for the idolaters, Exod. xxxii. 32; Aaron for the schismatics, Numb. xvi. 47; and Samuel for the whole nation, 1 Sam. vii. 9. Bp. Horne.

[b] 9. O magnify the Lord our God, &c.] The Psalmist repeats his exhortation, enforced by the preceding examples of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, and again invites all people to worship a "holy" God in a "holy" place, and to adore the consummate rectitude of all his proceedings, singing, with the spirits above, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints," Rev. xv. 3. Bp. Horne.

[c] Psalm c.] The Psalmist invites all the world to join with the Israelites in the service of Him, who was kind and gracious to them beyond expression. Accordingly, we Christians now properly use this Psalm in acknowledgment of God's wonderful love to us in Christ; by whom we offer up continually spiritual sacrifices, for redeeming us by the sacrifice which He made of Himself; for making the world anew, and creating us again unto good works, according to his faithful promises, which we may depend upon for ever. Bp. Patrick, Bp. Horne.

[d] 1. O be joyful in the Lord, &c.] The prophet addresseth himself to "all lands," or to "all the earth;" to Gentiles as well as Jews. He exhorteth them to "make a joyful noise," a noise like that of the trumpets at the time of jubilee, a sound of universal triumph and exultation, in honour of "Jehovah," now become their Lord and Saviour. The service of this our Master is perfect freedom; it is a service of love, a freedom from Pharaoh and the task-masters, from Satan and our own imperious lusts; it is a redemption from the most cruel bondage, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. Let us therefore do as we are commanded; let us "serve the Lord with gladness;" and when we come "before his presence" in the temple, let it be "with singing" to the praise and glory of our Redeemer. Thus He is served in heaven, and thus He delighteth to be served on earth. Bp. Horne.

2 Be ye sure that the Lord he is God[e]: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

3 O go your way into his gates[f] with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and speak good of his Name.

[e] 2. Be ye sure that the Lord he is God: &c.] The motives here urged for serving and praising Jehovah, are the same with those above, in Psalm xcv. 6, 7, namely, that He is our "God," engaged by covenant on our behalf; that his hands created us, and have since new created us; that we stand in the peculiar relation of his "people," whom He hath chosen to Himself, and over whom He presideth as King; that we are "the sheep of his pasture," for whom the good Shepherd laid down his life, and whom He nourisheth, by the word and sacraments, unto eternal life. These are points which every Christian ought to "know" and believe, unto his soul's health. And whoever doth know them aright, will ever be ready with heart and voice to obey the injunction which followeth in the next verse. Bp. Horne.

[f] 3. O go your way into his gates &c.] The Christian church is a temple, whose "gates" stand continually open, for the admission of the nations from all the four quarters of the world, Rev. xxi. 13. 25. Into the "courts" of this temple, which are now truly "courts of the Gentiles," all men are invited to come, and offer their evangelical sacrifices of "confession and praise;" to express their gratitude to their Saviour, and "bless" his gracious and hallowed "name." Bp. Horne.

[g] 4. For the Lord is gracious, &c.] "Jehovah is good" and "gracious:" He is the source of all beauty and perfection in the creature; how altogether lovely must He needs be in Himself! "His mercy is everlasting," extending through time into eternity; and "his truth," or fidelity in accomplishing his promises, "endureth to all generations," evidenced to the whole race of mankind, from Adam to his last-born son. The Psalms which celebrate these attributes, will never, therefore, be out of date, but each successive generation will chant them with fresh propriety, and fresh delight, until by saints and angels they are sung new in the kingdom of God. Bp. Horne.

[h] Psalm ci.] This Psalm contains a pious resolution of David to govern first himself, and then his court and his kingdom, with so much care, that the good might expect all favour from him, but no wicked man of any sort have the least countenance or encouragement. Bp. Patrick.

[i] 1. My song shall be of mercy and judgement: &c.] David, having determined to sing unto Jehovah, chooseth for his theme "mercy and judgment:" either that mercy which God hath shewn to him, and that judgment which hath been inflicted on his enemies; or else, that upright administration of mercy and judgment, with which he himself intended to bless his people. Bp. Horne.

[k] 2. O let me have understanding: &c.] In return for the favours of heaven, we hear the Israelitish monarch declaring his resolution, to set his court and kingdom an example of true wisdom, and unshaken integrity; at the same time, sighing for that visitation of divine grace, which alone could enable him to put his resolution in practice. "O when wilt thou come unto me?" And this must ever be the wish of a Christian, who knoweth that though in himself he be nothing, yet he can do all things through Christ, who strengthenceth him by his Spirit in the inner man. Messiah was the only King of Israel, whose life held forth to his subjects a pattern of wisdom and righteousness, and whose death procured them grace, in their different measures and degrees, to follow it. Bp. Horne.

[l] 5. A froward heart shall depart from me: &c.] As is the king, so will be the court; as is the master of the house, such will be those of his household. David, having resolved to "walk within his house with a perfect," a sincere and upright, "heart," determines at the same time to expel from thence all whose hearts were perverted and depraved: as he would "set no wicked thing before his eyes," so neither would he form any connexions with "wicked persons;" they should not be of his acquaintance, much less should they be his favourites. Bp. Horne.

[m] 11. I shall soon destroy all the ungodly &c.] Every earthly prince should consider himself as raised to a throne, and invested with power, "for the punishment of wickedness and vice, and the maintenance of God's true religion and virtue." "Early," therefore, in the

I am wholly emaciated. Dr. Hammond.

9 For I have eaten ashes[r] as it were bread: and mingled my drink with weeping;

10 And that because of thine indignation and wrath: for thou hast taken me up, and cast me down.

"morning" of his reign, he should set about the work of reformation, that so the blessings of heaven may descend upon himself and his people, according to the infallible promises of the Most High. And let each individual, in like manner, and for the same reason, be zealous and diligent to reform his own heart and ways, ever mindful of that future most awful morning, when the King of righteousness shall "cut off," with the sword of eternal judgment, "all wicked doers from that city of Jehovah," the new and heavenly Jerusalem. Bp. Horne.

[n] PSALM cii.] This Psalm is entitled, "A prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord." It seems to have been written during the captivity, by one of the prophets, who, like Daniel in parallel circumstances, 1, 2, maketh supplication before his God, 3—11, setteth forth, in the most affecting strains, his wretched and sorrowful estate, or rather, perhaps, that of Jerusalem, which he personates; 12, he comforteth himself by reflecting on the eternity and immutability of Jehovah; 13—22, he predicteth and describeth the restoration of Sion, with her enlargement by the accession of the Gentiles, when Messiah shall have visited and redeemed her; 23, 24, he returneth again to his lamentations; but, 25—28, again reposeth his confidence on Him who created all things, and who would not fail to make good his word and promise, if not to the generation then present, yet to their posterity. This is the fifth of those styled "penitential Psalms;" and St. Paul, Heb. i. 10, hath asserted, that it is addressed to the eternal Son of God, and Saviour of the world. Bp. Horne.

Penitential sorrow being a principal subject of this Psalm, it is suitable to the service of Ash-Wednesday. Travell.

[o] 3. For my days are consumed away like smoke: &c.] The effects of extreme grief on the human frame are compared to those which fire produceth upon fuel. It exhausts the radical moisture, and, by so doing, soon consumes the substance. A man's time and his strength evaporate in melancholy, and his "bones," those pillars and supports of his body, become like wood, on which the fire hath done its work, and left it without sap, and without cohesion. Bp. Horne.

[p] 4. My heart is smitten down, &c.] The metaphor is continued, and the "heart" itself, out of which flow the streams of life, is represented as suffering that from grief, which the "grass" of the field suffers from the burning heat of the sun: it is "smitten, and withered." And when grief hath thus dejected the spirits, the man has no appetite for that food which is to recruit and elevate them. Ahab, smitten with one kind of grief, David with another, and Daniel with a third, all "forgot," or "refused, to eat their bread," 1 Kings xxi. 4; 2 Sam. xii. 16; Dan. x. 3. Such natural companions are "mourning and fasting." Bp. Horne.

[q] 6. I am become like a pelican in the wilderness: &c.] The sorrowful man is naturally desirous of retiring from the world, to vent his complaints in solitude, and to pass the nights in watchfulness and prayer. In such a situation the true penitent placeth himself, worthily to bewail his sins, and deprecate the judgments of his God. And in such a situation did captivity place the daughter of Sion, that she might do likewise. The use, which Daniel made of it for this purpose, may be seen in his ninth chapter. Bp. Horne.

[r] 9. For I have eaten ashes &c.] By "eating ashes," and "drinking tears," we may understand the same as if it had been said, "I have eaten the bread of humiliation, and drunk the water of affliction;" ashes being the emblem of one, and tears the consequence of the other; while the actions of "eating and drinking" intimate to us the fulness and satiety which the sufferer had experienced of both, from the "wrath and indignation of God." Prosperity and adversity are from Him; "he lifteth up, and he casteth down;" He lifted up Jerusalem above all the earth; and He cast her down, to be trodden under foot by the Gentiles. Bp. Horne.

[s] 13. Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Sion: &c.] From this passage, and what follows, it appears that the supplant, in this Psalm, bewails not only his own miseries, but those of the church. Israel was in captivity, and Sion a desolation. A "time" notwithstanding, a "set time," there was at hand, when God thou have mercy upon her, yea, the time is come.

14 And why? thy servants think upon her stones : and it pitieth them to see her in the dust.

15 The heathen shall fear thy Name, O Lord[t] : and all the kings of the earth thy Majesty;

16 When the Lord shall build up Sion : and when his glory shall appear;

17 When he turneth him unto the prayer of the poor destitute : and despiseth not their desire.

18 This shall be written for those that come after[u] : and the people which shall be born shall praise the Lord.

20 That he might hear the mournings of such as are in captivity : and deliver the children appointed unto death;

21 That they may declare the Name of the Lord in Sion : and his worship at Jerusalem;

24 But I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of mine age : as for thy years, they endure throughout all generations.

25 Thou, Lord, in the beginning[z] hast laid the foundation of the earth : and the heavens are the work of thy hands.

26 They shall perish, but thou shalt endure : they all shall wax old as doth a garment;

27 And as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed : but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

28 The children of thy servants shall continue[a] : and their seed shall stand fast in thy sight.

had promised to "arise, and to have mercy upon her." The bowels of her children yearned over her ruins; they longed to see her rebuilt, and were ready, whenever the word of command should be given, to set heart and hand to the blessed work. Such ought to be our affection towards our Sion, however afflicted and destitute she may, at any time, appear to be; such should be our faith in the promises of God concerning the future glorification of his church, at the time appointed. Bp. Horne.

[t] 15. The heathen shall fear thy Name, O Lord : &c.] The object to which the prophets of old had chiefly respect, was not only the deliverance of Israel from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the material temple, but the salvation of sinners, and the erection of the Christian church, in the days of Messiah's kingdom. "When the Lord" Jesus thus "built up Sion, he appeared in his glory: the heathen feared his name, and all the kings of the earth" adored his majesty, because He had "regarded the prayer of the destitute" sons of Adam, in their worse than Babylonish captivity, and had arisen Himself to be their Saviour and mighty Deliverer. We, in these latter days, look and pray for the second appearance of the same Redeemer, with power and great glory, to raise the dead, and to build up from the dust a Jerusalem which shall experience no more vicissitudes, but continue for ever in unchangeable beauty and brightness. Bp. Horne.

[u] 18. This shall be written for those that come after : &c.] The history of "this" redemption and restoration by Messiah, thus foretold, hath been "written" in the Gospel for the benefit of "after generations," to the end that "the people who are created" anew in Christ Jesus may from age to age praise Jehovah, in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; as it is done at this day in the Church, and ever will continue to be done, till the choirs of heaven and earth shall be united before the throne of the Lamb. Bp. Horne.

[x] 19—22. For he hath looked down &c.] Redemption is the subject of praise in the Christian church; and the process of that great work is here described by images borrowed from the temporal deliverance and restoration of Israel. Bp. Horne.

[y] 23. He brought down my strength in my journey : &c.] The prophet, in the person of captive Sion, having, from verse 13 to verse 22, expressed his faith and hope in the promised redemption, now returns to his mournful complaints, as at verse 11. Israel doubteth not of God's veracity, but feareth lest his heavy hand should crush the generation then in being, before they should behold the expiration of their troubles. They were in "the way," but their "strength" was so "weakened," and their "days shortened," that they almost despaired of holding out to their journey's end. Bp. Horne.

[z] 25. Thou, Lord, in the beginning &c.] Amidst the changes and chances of this mortal life, one topick of consolation will ever remain, namely, the eternity and immutability of God our Saviour, of Him who was, and is, and is to come. Kingdoms and empires may rise and fall: nay, the heavens and the earth, as they were originally produced and formed by the Word of God, the Son or second Person in the Trinity, to whom the Psalmist here addresseth himself, see Heb. i. 10; so will they, at the day appointed, be folded up and laid aside, as an old and worn-out garment; or, if the substance remain, the present form and fashion of them will perish, and they will be utterly changed and altered from the state in which they now are. But Jehovah is ever the same; his years have no end, nor can his promise fail, any more than Himself. "Heaven and earth," saith He, "shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away," Matt. xxiv. 35. Bp. Horne.

The application of these verses to Jesus Christ in the Epistle to the Hebrews, is at once a proof of his divinity, and of the divine inspiration of the Psalms. Travell.

Whatever be the fate of the present generation, whether they may live to see the accomplishment of all that has been foretold, or not, yet the word of God standeth sure; there shall be always a church, and a holy seed, to whom the promises shall be made good. They have already been fulfilled with regard to the advent of Messiah, and the vocation of the Gentiles. The events which are behind will be brought forward and come to pass in their seasons, until the counsel of God shall be finished, and every prediction receive its full accomplishment in the glorification of the redeemed. Bp. Horne.

[b] Psalm ciii.] This Psalm is supposed to have been written by David on a recovery from sickness; and is also a prophetick description of the state of Christians under the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

In this evangelical and most comfortable hymn, David, after, 1, 2, exciting himself to the work, 3—5, praiseth Jehovah for the mercies of redemption; 6, 7, celebrateth his goodness to Moses and Israel; 8—13, setteth forth the divine philanthropy, under various beautiful expressions and images; 14—16, describeth, in a manner wonderfully affecting, man's frail and perishable state; but, 17, 18, leadeth him, for consolation, to the everlasting mercy of God in Christ, the stability of whose throne and kingdom, 19, he declareth, and, 20—22, calleth upon heaven and earth to join with him in blessing and praising his holy name. Bp. Horne.

[c] 1, 2. Praise the Lord, O my soul: &c.] Thanksgiving cannot be sincere and hearty, unless a man bear impressed upon his mind, at the time, a quick sense of "benefits" received; and "benefits" we are most of us apt to "forget;" those, especially, which are conferred upon us by God. Therefore David repeateth his self-awakening call, and summoneth all his powers of recollection, that none of the divine favours might continue unnoticed and unacknowledged. A catalogue of such particular mercies, temporal and spiritual, as each individual hath experienced through life, might be of service to refresh the memory, upon this important head. Bp. Horne.

[d] 3. Who forgiveth all thy sin: &c.] At the head of God's mercies must for ever stand "remission of sin," or that full and free pardon purchased for us by Jesus Christ, whereby, if we truly repent and believe in Him, our transgressions, though ever so many, and ever so great, are done away, and become as if they had never been; from a state of guilt we pass into one of justification, from a state of enmity into one of reconciliation, from a state of servitude into one of liberty and sonship. Next to the pardon of sin, considered as a crime, we are to commemorate the cure of it, considered as a disease, or indeed as a complication of diseases—"Who healeth all thine infirmities." The body experienceth the melancholy consequences of Adam's offence, and is subject to many "infirmities;" but the soul is subject to as many. Bp. Horne.

[e] 4. Who saveth thy life from destruction: &c.] Man hath two "lives;" he is, therefore, subject to a double "destruction:" and, consequently, capable of a twofold "redemption." He who is recovered from sickness, and thereby redeemed from that destruction which natural death bringeth upon the body, will undoubtedly sing this strain in transports of gratitude; and he ought so to do. But what will be the sensations of him, who celebrates, in the same words, the spiritual redemption of his soul from death, and destruction everlasting? Bp. Horne.

[f] 5. Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things: &c.] It is God who giveth us the "good things" of this world, and who giveth us likewise an appetite and a taste to enjoy them. It is God who restoreth a body, emaciated by sickness, to bloom, vigour, and agility. And He doeth greater things than these. He "satisfieth" all the desires of the soul with a banquet of spiritual dainties, and bestoweth on her a relish for the same. By the renovating power of his Spirit, He restoreth her from decrepitude, to the health and strength of a young "eagle," so that she can ascend up on high, and contemplate the splendour of the Sun of righteousness. Bp. Horne.

[g] 6. The Lord executeth righteousness &c.] From a consideration of his own particular case, the Psalmist maketh a general reflection on that attribute of God, which inclineth Him to deliver his people, and to punish their oppressors, of what kind soever they be. And here that grand display of the "ways" and "works" of Jehovah, the redemption of "Israel" by the hand of "Moses," immediately occurs, and is celebrated. Thus each private mercy, whether of a temporal or spiritual nature, should remind us of that public and universal blessing of redemption by Jesus Christ, from which every other blessing floweth, as a stream from its fountain, and for which God ought, therefore, upon all occasions, to be praised and glorified. Bp. Horne.

[h] 11—13. For look how high the heaven is &c.] We are here presented with three of the most beautiful, apposite, and comforting similitudes in the world. When we lift up our eyes, and behold around us the lofty and stupendous vault of heaven, encircling, pro-great is his mercy also toward them that fear him.

12 Look how wide also the east is from the west : so far hath he set our sins from us.

13 Yea, like as a father pitieth his own children : even so is the Lord merciful unto them that fear him.

14 For he knoweth whereof we are made : he remembereth that we are but dust.

15 The days of man are but as grass : for he flourisheth as a flower of the field.

16 For as soon as the wind goeth over it, it is gone : and the place thereof shall know it no more.

17 But the merciful goodness of the Lord[i] endureth for ever and ever upon them that fear him : and his righteousness upon children's children;

18 Even upon such as keep his covenant : and think upon his commandments to do them.

19 The Lord hath prepared his seat in heaven[k] : and his kingdom ruleth over all. throne. Bib. Trans.

20 O praise the Lord, ye angels[l] of his, ye that excel in strength : ye that fulfil his commandment, and hearken unto the voice of his words.

21 O praise the Lord, all ye his hosts : ye servants of his that do his pleasure.

22 O speak good of the Lord, all ye works of his, in all places of his dominion : praise thou the Lord, O my soul.

tecting, enlightening, refreshing, and cherishing the earth, and all things that are therein, we are bidden to contemplate in this glass the immeasurable height, the boundless extent, and the salutary influences of that mercy, which, as it were, embraceth the creation, and is over all the works of God. Often as we view the sun, arising in the east, and darkness flying away from before his face towards the opposite quarter of the heavens, we may see an image of that goodness of Jehovah, whereby we are placed in the regions of illumination, and our sins are removed and put far away out of his sight. And that our hearts may, at all times, have confidence towards God, He is represented as bearing towards us the fond and tender affection of "a father," ever ready to defend, to nourish, and to provide for us, to bear with us, to forgive us, and to receive us in the parental arms of everlasting love. Bp. Horne.

[i] 17. But the merciful goodness of the Lord &c.] Let not man presume, who withereth like the green herb; but then, let not man despair, whose nature, with all its infirmities, the Son of God hath taken upon Him. The flower which faded in Adam, blooms anew in Christ, never to fade again. "The mercy of Jehovah," in his Messiah, "is everlasting;" and of that everlasting mercy poor frail man is the object. A passage in the first Epistle of St. Peter doth most admirably illustrate this part of our Psalm: see 1 Pet. i. 23, &c. Bp. Horne.

[k] 19. The Lord hath prepared his seat in heaven: &c.] The glorious Person who worketh all these wonders of mercy for his people, the Word of God, and Saviour of the world, is triumphantly seated upon his "throne in heaven," and is possessed of all power to accomplish his will, even until all things shall be subdued unto Him. The glories of his throne, the brightness of his excellent majesty, and the might of his irresistible power, are described at large by St. John, Rev. iv, v. xix. Bp. Horne.

[l] 20—22. O praise the Lord, ye angels &c.] Joy is observed to be of a diffusive and communicative nature. The heart of the Psalmist is full, and overfloweth with it. Unable worthily to praise Jehovah for his mercies vouchsafed to the church, he inviteth heaven and earth to join with him, and to celebrate, in full chorus, the redemption of man. St. John saw the throne of Messiah prepared; he beheld the universal band assembled; and he heard when "all the angels round about the throne, ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, with every creature in heaven, earth, and sea," lifted up their voices, and sang together, blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever." Bp. Horne.

[m] Psalm civ.] This is an eucharistick hymn, full of majesty and sweetness, addressed to Jehovah, as Creator of the world. It setteth forth his glory, wisdom, goodness, and power, displayed, 1—9, in the formation of the heavens and earth; 10—18, in the various provision made for beasts, and birds, and for man, the Lord of all; 19—24, in the revolutions of the celestial bodies, and the consequent interchanges of day and night, of labour and rest; 25, 26, in the sea, and every thing that moveth in or upon the waters. 27—30, The dependence of the whole creation upon God for its being and well-being, is beautifully represented, with, 31, 32, the glory which the Creator receiveth from his works, the pleasure which He taketh in them, and the power which He hath over them. 33, The Psalmist declareth his resolution ever to praise Jehovah, and, 34, predicteth the destruction of those who refuse or neglect so to do. As there is a similitude between the natural and the spiritual creation, this may, perhaps, be the reason why the Church hath appointed this Psalm to be used on Whit-Sunday. Bp. Horne.

This Psalm has no title in the Hebrew; but the Greek, and some other ancient versions, ascribe it to David. Whoever be the author of it, it is one of the most exalted pieces of poetry extant in antiquity. Dr. Nicholls. For regularity of composition, richness of imagery, sublimity of sentiment, and elegance and perspicuity of diction, it is perhaps the principal poem in the whole collection of these inspired songs. As there is no allusion in it to the Mosaick ritual, nor any mention of the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, it should seem that it was of an earlier age than the Exodus. Bp. Horsley.

[n] 1, 2. Praise the Lord, O my soul: &c.] The Scriptures inform us, that the same Person, who redeemed the world, did also create it. In the 102nd Psalm, as we are assured by St. Paul, "to the Son it is said, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands." To Him, therefore, as Creator, is the 104th Psalm likewise addressed. He is described as invested with "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was;" a glimpse of which He vouchsafed to the three disciples, who were present at his transfiguration, when "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light." The first instance of his creating power is afforded us by the "heavens," which form a magnificent "canopy, or pavilion," comprehending within it the earth, and all the inhabitants thereof. Bp. Horne.

[o] 3. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: &c.] The generality of expositors interpret this passage of those "dark waters, compacted into thick clouds of the skies," which the Almighty is elsewhere said to make the "secret place or chamber" of his residence, and a kind of "footstool" to his throne. Ps. xviii. 9. 11. And thus, indeed, the former part of our verse is plainly and immediately connected with what follows; "who maketh the clouds his chariot, and walketh upon the wings of the wind." How astonishingly magnificent and tremendous is the idea, which these words convey to us, of the great King riding upon the heavens, encompassed with clouds and darkness, attended by the lightnings, those ready executioners of his vengeance, and causing the world to resound and tremble at the thunder of his power, and the noise of his chariot-wheels! By these ensigns of royalty, these emblems of omnipotence, and instruments of his displeasure, doth Jehovah manifest his presence, when He visiteth rebellious man, to make him own and adore his neglected and insulted Lord. See and compare Ps. xviii. 10, and the context. Bp. Horne.

[p] 4. He maketh his angels spirits: &c.] From the manner in which these words are introduced, and the place where they stand, one should conceive the meaning of them to be, that God employeth the elements of air and fire, the winds, and the lightnings, as his messengers, and ministers, to execute his commands upon the earth. But the apostle, Heb. i. 7, informeth us, that they have a further reference to immaterial angels; either because those angels often appeared in the likeness, or because they were endued with the properties, of "wind and flame." Intellectual beings of the highest order in the realms above are as ready to fulfil the word of Jehovah, as are the elements of this lower world. Bp. Horne.

[q] 5. He laid the foundations of the earth: &c.] The formation of this globe on which we tread, is a wonderful instance of divine wisdom and power, whether we consider the manner in which the parts of it are put and kept together, or its suspension in the circumambient fluid. The words, "that it should not be removed for ever," do by no means imply, that the earth is stationary, or that it is eternal; but only thus much, that it is so constructed, as to answer the end, and to last the time, for which it was created and intended. It shall continue the same in itself, and with relation to other bodies, neither altering its shape, nor changing its course, till the day appointed for its dissolution. Bp. Horne.

[r] 6. Thou coveredst it with the deep &c.] Most interpreters suppose this to be a description of the situation of things, and of what was effected by the power of God, on the third day of the creation, when He said, "Let the waters be gathered together into one place, and let the dry land appear; and it was so." Indeed, the process at the creation was so exactly similar to that at the deluge, with regard to the circumstances here mentioned, that it matters not to which we apply the beautiful and truly poetical passage before us. In both cases the earth was covered with the waters, as with a garment, in every part; in both cases, they fled at the Almighty word, like the scattered remains of a routed army; from the heights of mountains, whither they had ascended, they sunk down into the valleys; from the valleys they retired to the bed of the ocean, and a part of them descended from thence into the great deep that lieth beneath. Bounds were set them, beyond which they should never pass, to overwhelm us any more for ever. And the experience of 4000 years hath taught us, that where the Creator hath laid his commands, plain sand is a sufficient barrier. Bp. Horne.

[s] 10, 11. He sendeth the springs into the rivers: &c.] The waters of the sea are not only prevented from destroying the earth, but, by a wonderful machinery, are rendered the means of preserving every living thing which moveth thereon. Partly ascending from the great deep through the strata of the earth, partly exhaled in vapour from the surface of the ocean into the air, and from thence falling in rain, especially on the tops and by the sides of mountains, they break forth in fresh springs, having left their salts behind them; they trickle through the valleys, between the hills, receiving new supplies as they go; they become large rivers, and after watering, by their innumerable turnings and windings, immense tracts of country, they return to the place from whence they came. Thus every animal hath an opportunity of quenching that thirst, which must otherwise soon put a period to its existence. The "wild asses" are particularly mentioned, because they live in remote and sandy deserts: yet even thereof : and the wild asses quench their thirst.

12 Beside them shall the fowls of the air[t] have their habitation : and sing among the branches.

14 He bringeth forth grass for the cattle : and green herb for the service of men ; such creatures, in such places, are by the God of nature taught the way to the waters; insomuch that the parched traveller, when in search of a fountain, findeth them to be the best guides in the world, and needeth only to observe and follow the herds of them descending to the streams. Bp. Horne.

[t] 12. Beside them shall the fowls of the air &c.] That is, "beside springs of water," in the "valleys," the birds delight to have their habitations, and to sing amidst the verdant branches which conceal them from our sight. "The musick of birds," as one hath well observed, "was the first song of thanksgiving which was offered on earth before man was formed. And their sounds are different, but all harmonious, and all together compose a choir which we cannot imitate." Bp. Horne.

[u] 13—15. He watereth the hills from above :] Or "from his chambers." See the margin. The fertility of the earth is owing to God, who for that purpose "watereth" it "from his chambers," whether the word hath a reference to the clouds above, or the depths below; for both are concerned in the operation. Hence all the glory and beauty of the vegetable world; hence the grass, which nourisheth the cattle, that they may nourish the human race; hence the green herb, for food and for medicine; hence fields covered with corn, for the support of life; hence vines and olive-trees laden with fruits, whose juices exhilarate the heart, and brighten the countenance. Bp. Horne.

[x] 16. The trees of the Lord also are full of sap : &c.] The whole earth is a garden, planted by the hand, and watered by the care, of Jehovah. But in a more especial manner is his glory set forth by the lofty and magnificent cedars, which, growing wild on the mountains and in the forest, owe nothing to the skill and industry of man. The moisture of the earth, rarefied by the heat of the sun, enters their roots, ascends in their tubes, and by due degrees expands and increases them, till they arrive at their growth. Bp. Horne.

[y] 17. Wherein the birds make their nests : &c.] Most admirable is that wisdom and understanding, which the Creator hath imparted to the birds of the air, whereby they distinguish times and seasons, choose the properest places, construct their nests with an art and exactness unattainable by man, and secure and provide for their young. Bp. Horne.

[z] 18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats : &c.] The same force of what we call 'instinct' prevails in terrestrial animals, and directs them to places of refuge, where they may be safe from their enemies. Thus the wild goats climb with ease to the tops and crags of mountains, where they deposit their young. And thus animals of another kind, which are more defenceless than the goats, and not able to climb like them, have yet a way of intrenching themselves, in a situation perfectly impregnable, among the rocks; we find them, on that account, numbered by Solomon among the "four" kinds of animals, which, though "little upon the earth, are exceeding wise." See Prov. xxx. 26. Bp. Horne.

It is not certain what creature was intended by the word rendered "conies" in our translation. The observations of a late ingenious traveller make it probable, that it means the Saphan or Ashkoko, which is a timid feeble animal, abounding in the neighbourhood of Horeb and Sinai, as well as on mount Libanus, and sheltering itself in the clefts of the rocks. Travell.

[a] 19. He appointed the moon &c.] From a survey of the works of God upon earth, the Psalmist proceedeth to extol that divine wisdom, which is manifested in the motions and revolutions of the heavenly bodies, and in the grateful vicissitude of day and night, occasioned thereby. Bp. Horne.

[b] 20. Thou makest darkness &c.] Night and darkness invite the wild beasts of the forest and desert from their dens and recesses, to "seek" the "prey" allotted them by the providence of that God who feedeth the young lions, as well as the young ravens, when hunger enforceth them, as it were, to call upon Him. Bp. Horne.

[c] 22. The sun ariseth, &c.] At the return of day, the sons of ravage retire, and sculk away to their several hiding-places, that man, the lord of the creation, may arise, and perform, unmolested, the task which his Maker hath appointed him. Bp. Horne.

[d] 24. O Lord, how manifold are thy works : &c.] Transported with a survey of the wonders which present themselves in heaven above, and on earth below, the Psalmist breaks forth into an exclamation (and what heart hath not already anticipated him?) on the variety and magnificence, the harmony and proportion, of the works of God, in this outward, and visible, and perishable world. What then are the miracles of grace and glory? What are those invisible and eternal things, which God hath prepared for them that love Him, in another and a better world, and of which the things visible and temporary are no more than shadows? Admitted to that place, where we shall at once be indulged with a view of all the divine dispensations, and of that beatitude in which they terminate, shall we not, with angels and archangels, cry out, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all; heaven and earth are full of thy riches and of thy glory!" Bp. Horne.

[e] 25. So is the great and wide sea also: &c.] There is not in all nature a more august and striking object than the ocean. Its inhabitants are as numerous as those upon the land, nor is the wisdom and the power of the Creator less displayed, perhaps, in their formation and preservation, from the smallest fish that swims, to the enormous tyrant of the deep, the leviathan himself. By means of navigation, Providence hath opened a communication between the most distant parts of the globe; the largest solid bodies are wafted, with incredible swiftness, upon one fluid, by the impulse of another, and seas join the countries which they appear to divide. Bp. Horne.

The word leviathan in Scripture is a general name for any great monster which inhabiteth the waters. In Job it is applicable to the crocodile, chap. xli: but here probably must be understood of the whale. Travell.

[f] 27, 28. These wait all upon thee: &c.] In various ways hath God provided food for the support of all living creatures, and directed them to seek, and to find it. How pleasing a speculation is it, to consider the whole family of air, earth, and sea, as "waiting upon" the Father and Lord of all things, expecting when He should "open his hand," and distribute to each member his "portion of meat in due season!" The case is the same with regard to beings intellectual and spiritual, of which is composed the church and family of Christ, in heaven and earth; these wait all upon Him, by whom Jehovah hath opened the hand of mercy, and abundantly supplied all our needs, through the riches of his grace. Bp. Horne.

[g] 29. When thou hidest thy face they are troubled: &c.] When God, in the season of winter, seemeth to hide his face, and to have withdrawn his beneficent influences, we hear the cries of the creation in distress; if He recal the breath of life from any creature, to which He had communicated it, that creature presently ceaseth to be what it was; sense and motion are at an end; the form and figure of it perish; and it is resolved into its original dust. But again He exerteth his quickening power, and, lo, fresh generations of animals are produced; fresh crops of vegetables shoot forth to nourish them; and there is a renovation of universal nature. The presence of God, in like manner, is the life, his absence is the death, of the soul. If He withdraw his grace, we perish everlastingly; but when He "sendeth forth his Spirit," as He did on the day of Pentecost, "old things pass away, and all things become new;" the winter is over, and spring succeeds in its place. Nay, the hour is coming, when, through the same Spirit, He shall also quicken our mortal bodies, and thus, in a more evident and wonderful manner, "renew the face of the earth." Bp. Horne.

[h] 31. The glorious Majesty of the Lord shall endure for ever: &c.] Such being the works of God, so manifold and so marvellous, the prophet foretelleth, that his "glory," displayed and declared by the same, should "endure for ever;" that creatures would never be wanting to give Him the praise and honour due unto Him; insomuch that, graciously accepting this their tribute, and pleased to find a proper return made Him, Jehovah should, as at the first creation, acquiesce and rejoice in all his works and dispensations. In the mean time, let the unruly and disobedient reflect upon the greatness of his power, and the terrors of his vengeance, who with a look can shake the earth, and with a touch can fire the mountains, as when He once descended on Sinai. Bp. Horne.

[i] 35. As for sinners, they shall be consumed &c.] The "sinners" and the "ungodly" are they of whom it is elsewhere said, that they "consider not the works of Jehovah, nor regard the operations of his hands," to give Him praise and glory for them. These shall one day experience the power of that God, whose wisdom and goodness they would never acknowledge. They shall be "consumed," and "perish from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth." The Psalmist, therefore, endeth as he began; "Bless thou the Lord, O my soul;" adding, by way of exhortation to us, and to all the world, "Praise ye the Lord." Let us, then, with the "four and twenty elders, fall down before him that sitteth upon the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created," Rev. iv. 10, 11. Bp. Horne.

[k] PSALM cv.] This Psalm, the first part of it at least, to verse 15, we know, from 1 Chron. xvi, to have been composed by David, and given out on occasion of his placing the ark of God in Sion. It containeth, 1—8, an exhortation to praise Jehovah for his works of mercy and power, wrought in favour of Israel. 9—43, These are traced from their source, namely, the covenant made with Abraham, through the patriarchal history, to the deliverance of the nation from the Egyptians, and its settlement in Canaan; the end of all which, 44, is declared to have been, that God might have a people to serve Him. The same is true of our redemption by Jesus Christ, which was the grand subject of the promise made to Abraham, and of which the temporal mercies, vouchsafed to the patriarchs, and their posterity, were so many pledges and figures. Bp. Horne.

[l] 1. O give thanks unto the Lord, &c.] God, who formerly resided in mount Sion, vouchsafing his presence in a tabernacle made with hands, hath since blessed the church with his appearance in the flesh; and we Christians are bound to "make known his deeds," and the mercies which He hath wrought for us, "among the people;" that so all the world may know Him, and love Him, and partake of his salvation. Bp. Horne.

[m] 5. Remember the marvellous works &c.] As an encouragement to "seek Jehovah evermore," "the seed of Abraham and the children of Jacob" are exhorted to bear in mind the marvellous works "which he had done" for them from the beginning, to protect and deliver them, as also "the judgments of his mouth," whether by this phrase we understand the righteous laws given to his people, or the denunciations and executions of vengeance against their enemies. But, alas! "the seed of Abraham" kept not the faith of their great progenitor; "the children of Jacob" have forfeited the blessing which their father obtained. We Gentiles have been, for a long season, the adopted "seed of Abraham," and have inherited the benediction of "Jacob." Let us not forget the "marvellous works" of God in Christ, and the "judgments of his mouth." Bp. Horne.

[n] 7. He is the Lord our God: &c.] If Jehovah were the "God" of Israel, on account of what in covenant He promised and performed for them, He is now the God of us all, on account of what He promised and hath performed in Christ Jesus for them and for us. If, when He settled Israel in Canaan, "his judgments" were manifested to "all the earth," were they not manifested also when the Christian church was established, and the idolatrous powers of the world were overthrown by the Gospel? Bp. Horne.

[o] 8—11. He hath been alway mindful of his covenant &c.] Upon bringing the ark to mount Sion, David teacheth Israel to bless and praise God for his having "remembered his covenant," made with an "oath" to their forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that He would, in due time, settle his people in the land of Canaan. Now, it is very observable, that in the hymn uttered by Zacharias, the father of St. John the Baptist, on the subject of our redemption by Christ, thanks are given to the Lord God of Israel, because He had "remembered his holy covenant, and performed the oath which he sware to our forefather Abraham." And what was that? Why, "that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, should serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness." But when, or where, did God promise any such thing to Abraham, except when He told him "that his seed should be in bondage four hundred years," but that "the nation," which detained them in bondage, should afterwards be "judged," and that they should be "brought out," and come to "Canaan," Gen. xv. 13, where they were to "serve" Him? The case seems to be this: Zacharias, under the immediate influence and direction of the Holy Spirit, transfers the language of the old dispensation to the affairs of the new one; he celebrates the redemption of the world, by Christ, from sin and death, in words which literally describe the redemption of Israel from Egypt by Moses; to teach us, that we should regard one as a sacramental pledge and figure of the other; that there is another bondage, in which the people of God are held; another Moses, who is to deliver them; another land of promise and of rest, where they are to be settled. (See the note from Archbishop Secker, page 26, note e.) This the Hebrews might have known, as St. Paul tells them, Heb. iv. from a passage in the 95th Psalm, where, long after they had been in possession of Canaan, David speaks of another "day" of probation, and another "rest." The Jews have since had a melancholy proof of the same thing, by being dispossessed of that earthly inheritance, which they falsely deemed to have been perpetual and vainly regarded as the end of all the promises made to a "thousand generations," that is, (a definite number being put for an indefinite,) to them, and to us, and to "as many as the Lord our God shall call," while the world shall last. Bp. Horne.

[p] 14, 15. He suffered no man to do them wrong: &c.] The patriarchs, during their peregrinations, were often in imminent danger; as Abraham on account of Sarah, Gen. xx; Isaac, in a similar case, Gen. xxvi; Jacob from Laban, Gen. xxxi; and from his brother Esau, Gen. xxxiii. Yet destitute as they were of earthly help, the mightiest kings could not hurt them. Their "ways pleased the Lord, and he made even their enemies to be at peace with them," Prov. xvi. 7. They were the typical "prophets and Messiahs, or Christs," of Jehovah; and kings were forbidden to lift up a hand against them. Bp. Horne.

[q] 16. Moreover, he called for a dearth upon the land: &c.] When Jacob had escaped other perils, we find him and his family likely to perish with hunger. Gen. xlii. "Famine" is here finely represented as a servant, ready to come and go, at the "call" and command of God; for calamities, whether publick or private, are the messengers of divine justice. "Bread" is the "staff" which supports life; when that staff is "broken," the body fails and sinks to the earth. The word of God is the staff of spiritual life, the food and support of the soul; and the sorest of heaven's judgments is that mentioned by the prophet Amos, chap. viii. 11, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst of water, but of hearing the words of the Lord." Such a famine was sore in all lands, when Christ made his appearance in the flesh; whose advent, with the blessed effects of it, is wonderfully shadowed forth in the prophetical history of the patriarch Joseph. Bp. Horne.

[r] 17. But he had sent a man before them: &c.] Joseph and Jesus were both envied, hated, and sold by their brethren; both suffered by a false accusation; the former was laid in irons, the latter crucified, and confined in the prison of the grave, fast bound with the bands of death. The wickedness of man, in working its own will, did unwittingly accomplish the counsels of God. See Gen. l. 20; Acts ii. 23, and iii. 17, 18. Bp. Horne.

[s] 20. The king sent and delivered him: &c.] The circumstances of Joseph's advancement, here alluded to, are related, Gen. xli, &c. Those of our Lord's resurrection and glorification afford a marvellous parallel. At the determined hour, "The king" of heaven "sent" his angel, "and loosed him" from the bands of death; "the Ruler of the world let him go free" from the penalty which He had undertaken to pay, and had now fully paid. "He made him Lord of his house, the church, and Ruler of all his substance" in heaven and in earth, that He might, by his holy discipline, "bind princes at his pleasure," and by his Gospel "teach" true "wisdom" to the "senators" and politicians of the world; He was clothed with the robes of majesty, He was adorned with all the ensigns of royalty, and to Him it was ordained that "every knee should bow." The storehouses of grace and salvation were opened; the nations came to be supplied by Him with the bread of life; and we look for that happy day when the Jews shall do the same, and "Joseph shall be made known to his brethren." Bp. Horne.

[t] 23. Israel also came into Egypt: &c.] The Psalmist now exhibiteth to our view a fresh scene of tribulation and affliction, which occasioned repeated mercies, and a new deliverance. Bp. Horne.

[u] 26. Then sent he Moses &c.] When the tyranny and oppression of Pharaoh were at the highest, and Israel cried unto Jehovah because of the bondage, He remembered his promise to Abraham, and sent Moses, with Aaron, to effect that mighty deliverance, which was to be the grand pledge and figure of our salvation by Jesus Christ. Of Him Moses prophesied, when he said, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me," Deut. xviii. 15, cited and applied Acts iii. 22. He came to rescue mankind from a spiritual bondage, and to deliver all who were "oppressed by the devil," Acts x. 38: He came at a time when that oppression was most grievous among Jews and Gentiles: his birth was signalized by an order from another Pharaoh, to slay the infants; and Egypt afforded him a refuge from the tyrant's fury: He wrought innumerable "signs and wonders;" but they were all signs of mercy, and wonders of love.

28 He sent darkness[x], and it was dark : and they were not obedient unto his word.

29 He turned their waters into blood : and slew their fish.

30 Their land brought forth frogs : yea, even in their kings' chambers.

31 He spake the word, and there came all manner of flies : and lice in all their quarters.

32 He gave them hail-stones for rain : and flames of fire in their land.

33 He smote their vines also and fig-trees : and destroyed the trees that were in their coasts.

34 He spake the word and the grasshoppers came, and caterpillars innumerable : and did eat up all the grass in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground.

35 He smote all the first-born in their land : even the chief of all their strength.

36 He brought them forth also[y] with silver and gold : there was not one feeble person among their tribes.

37 Egypt was glad at their departing : for they were afraid of them.

38 He spread out a cloud[z] to be a covering : and fire to give light in the night-season.

39 At their desire he brought quails : and he filled them with the bread of heaven.

40 He opened the rock of stone, and the waters flowed out : so that rivers ran in the dry places.

41 For why? he remembered his holy promise[a] : and Abraham his servant.

42 And he brought forth his people with joy : and his chosen with gladness;

43 And gave them the lands of the heathen[b] : and they took the labours of the people in possession;

O Give thanks unto the Lord[d], for he is gracious : and his merey endureth for ever.

2 Who can express the noble acts

Those of terror and vengeance were reserved for a future advent, foreshewed in the destruction of Jerusalem. Bp. Horne.

[x] 28—35. He sent darkness, &c.] Who can behold this army of divine judgments thus passing in dreadful array before Him, without trembling very exceedingly at that power, which is able to send them, singly, or in conjunction, upon a sinful land? Who can reflect upon their number and variety, without adoring that goodness, patience, and long-suffering, which tried so many different methods, and waited so long, to lead the offenders to repentance? For more particulars, see the comment on Ps. lxxviii. 43—51. Bp. Horne.

[y] 36. He brought them forth also &c.] That is, the people of Israel: who not only came forth from Egypt, but came forth laden with the spoils of their enemies, which they were commanded to take, by Him who is the absolute Lord of all property, and who, as a righteous Judge, did thus award to his people the wages due to their incredible labours, the Egyptians being now willing and ready to furnish them with any thing required, in order to dismiss them. "The Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste: for they said, We be all dead men," Exod. xii. 33. And what was very extraordinary, among such a number of men, women, children, and cattle, nothing was weak and "feeble," nothing unable to perform the journey. The order was, that "not a hoof should be left behind," Exod. x. 26; and He who commanded gave strength to obey. Bp. Horne.

[z] 38—40. He spread out a cloud &c.] "Brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant how that all our fathers were under the cloud; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ," 1 Cor. x. 1—4. In our passage through this wilderness of life, over barren sands, and amidst fiery serpents, be thou, blessed Lord, our guide and our guard; protected by thy providence, supported by thy word, and refreshed by thy Spirit, lead us even where, and in what manner, it shall seem good to thee; only do not thou forsake us, and we ask no more. Bp. Horne.

[a] 41. For why? he remembered his holy promise: &c.] The same God hath since "remembered again his promise to Abraham;" He hath visited his people, and redeemed them from the bondage of sin, under the tyranny of Satan; which redemption they daily celebrate in the church, with "joy and gladness," waiting for their final deliverance from death and the grave, when they are to sing in heaven "the song of Moses and of the Lamb," Rev. xv. 3. Bp. Horne.

[b] 43. And gave them the lands of the heathen: &c.] It was not, therefore, intended that the Israelites should regard Canaan as their paradise, and look no farther; but that, being rescued from their enemies, and settled in peace and plenty, they should improve the opportunity, thereby afforded them, of serving the Lord their God, and of securing to themselves, through the obedience of faith, an inheritance in "a better country, that is to say, an heavenly." And let all the children of faithful Abraham, whose lot hath fallen in a "land flowing with milk and honey," upon earth, reflect, that God hath given them riches, and the leisure which riches procure, not for the purpose of indulging and corrupting themselves and others, but that they may glorify

11 As for those that troubled them, the waters overwhelmed them: there was not one of them left.

Him, benefit their neighbours, and save their own souls; "that they may observe his statutes, and keep his laws." Israel was delivered by Moses, and the church redeemed by Christ, that God might "purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works," Tit. ii. 14. Bp. Horne.

[e] Psalm cvi.] The Psalmist here again commemorates the divine benefits, upbraiding withal the ingratitude of those who received them. 1, 2, He exhorteth men to the praise of Jehovah; 3—5, proclaimeth the blessedness, and longeth for the felicity of the saints; 6, confesseth the sins of Israel, and giveth a detail of their rebellions; 7—12, at the Red Sea; 13—15, when they lusted for flesh in the wilderness; 16—18, in the matter of Korah; 19—23, in that of the golden calf; 24—27, at the report of the spies; 28—31, in the affair of Baal-peor; 32, 33, at the waters of Meribah; 34—38, in not destroying idolatry, but being seduced by it; 39—44, God's frequent judgments, and as frequent mercies, are related; 45, a prayer is made, that Jehovah would gather Israel from among the heathen, which shews the Psalm to have been written during some captivity or dispersion. The last verse contains an act of blessing and praise. Bp. Horne.

The Psalm was unquestionably composed in the time of the Israelites' captivity and dispersion: but whether it was that of Babylon, or some other of a later date, is neither easy nor necessary to determine. Poole.

[d] 1. O give thanks unto the Lord, &c.] In the person of a penitent nation, the prophet invites mankind to "give thanks unto Jehovah," for that "goodness" which preventeth us with blessings, and for that "mercy" which forgiveth our transgressions; that mercy, which was shewn to our forefathers upon their repentance, and will "ever" be shewn, upon the same condition, to us and our posterity; that mercy, which will bring sin and misery to an end, itself continuing eternal and unchangeable. Bp. Horne.

[e] 4, 5. Remember me, O Lord, &c.] The Psalmist offereth a prayer for himself, or rather for the church of Israel, that she, with himself, might partake of the blessedness, mentioned in the preceding verse: namely, the blessedness of those who love and obey God. The words might have a reference to a temporal restoration and felicity; but they certainly extend much farther, and form the most spiritual and heavenly petition that the devoutest Christian can prefer to the throne of grace. Bp. Horne.

[f] 6. We have sinned with our fathers: &c.] Those, who have joined with the prophet in his affectionate aspiration after the divine favour, may here learn the surest way to attain it; namely, by confessing their own sins, and those of their ancestors. "We have sinned with our fathers," that is, after their example of unbelief and disobedience, of which an account immediately followeth. Bp. Horne.

[g] 7. Our fathers regarded not thy wonders in Egypt, &c.] The Israelites did not profit, as they should have done, by the miracles wrought for them in Egypt; they increased not in the wisdom and knowledge of God their Saviour; but, when they saw themselves pursued by Pharaoh, their faith failed, they murmured against Moses, and wished themselves again in the bondage from which they were just delivered: Exod. xiv. 10, &c. Thus, when the penitent findeth himself beset with difficulties and dangers; when he seeth before him that death unto sin, through which he must pass to a life of righteousness, while the devil and the world follow hard after him, to destroy or bring him back to a more cruel bondage, how apt is he to forget all that Christ hath done for him! Fear puts out the light of faith, and hides the prospect of the promised land; imagination recalls the former gratifications of sense; he is tempted to regret the desertion of Egypt, and to wish for a return to it again. Bp. Horne.

[h] 8—12. Nevertheless, he helped them for his Name's sake: &c.] As the people of God were conducted in perfect security through the Red Sea, when the waters, re-assuming their ancient habitation, overwhelmed the infidel host: so through all the difficulties and dangers of the Christian course, faith will ever find a way opened, by the power of Jesus, from sin to righteousness, and from death to life: the enemies of our salvation, how formidable soever, shall disappear, and be no more; and we shall sing, like Israel, a song of triumph to the Lord our God. *Bp. the Israelites is in Exod. xv. 24, and Numb. xi. 4. 33. Let us learn thence to wait God's time and counsel, for the supply of necessaries, much more of conveniences; remembering that He hath given us his Son, and therefore will not deny us such inferior corporeal blessings, as He foreseeth will really prove blessings to us. Let us be duly thankful for that "bread which cometh down from heaven," cautious how we request the good things of this world, and strictly temperate in the use of them when given. Bp. Horne.

[k] 16—18. They angered Moses also &c.] Moses and Aaron were the divinely appointed governors of Israel, in church and state. Envy and ambition led Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, to accuse the former of tyranny, and the latter of priestcraft. Jehovah was appealed to, a day appointed, and a decision made. One body of the malcontents went down alive into the pit, another was consumed by fire from heaven: Numb. xvi. Let schismaticks and rebels beware of that "pit," which is bottomless, and of that "fire," which shall never be quenched. Bp. Horne.

[l] 19—22. They made a calf in Horeb: &c.] How the people apostatized to the old favourite sin of idolatry, alluded to in these verses, we find recorded in Exod. xxxii. It is to be hoped, we shall never live to see a time, when the miracles of our redemption shall be forgotten; when the return of Jesus Christ from heaven shall be despaired of; and when the people shall solicit their teachers to fabricate a new philosophical deity, for them to worship, instead of the God of their ancestors, to whom glory hath been ascribed, from generation to generation. Bp. Horne.

[m] 23. So he said, he would have destroyed them, &c.] In the language of Moses, interceding for his countrymen with the offended Majesty of heaven, how are we astonished at an instance of such invincible fortitude, fervent piety, unadulterated patriotism, triumphant faith, and unbounded charity! Once, and but once, was this instance exceeded, by Him, in whose name the intercession of Moses was made and accepted; who, really taking upon Himself the sins of his people, suffered the vengeance due to them: and who is now at the right hand of God interceding for us all. See Exod. xxxii. 10—14, and 32. Bp. Horne.

[n] 24—27. Yea, they thought scorn of that pleasant land: &c.] The history, here alluded to, of the infidelity of the Israelites, of their disobedience, and of their destruction thereupon in the wilderness, without setting foot in the promised land, is contained in Numb. xiii, and xiv. Discomfiture and dispersion were also threatened to their posterity, that is, if they should go on in the same spirit of rebellion, and fill up the measure of their fathers' iniquities: which they have since done, and are accordingly "overthrown among the nations, and scattered among the lands" to this day. But do not thou suffer us, O Lord, to despise that "pleasant land," which thou designest to be the inheritance of thy saints; whatever obstructions may be thrown in our way, suffer us not, through sloth and cowardice, to "disbelieve thy word," to doubt the accomplishment of thy promises, or to "murmur" against thy dispensations. Bp. Horne.

[o] 28—31. They joined themselves unto Baal-peor: and ate the offerings of the dead, &c.] That is, sacrifices which were offered either to dead idols, or to men deified after death. The part of sacred history, to which these verses allude, is contained in Numb. xxv, and xxxi. 16. And in general we learn from it, how acceptable to God is, not the forwardness of uncommissioned zealots, but a well-timed and duly autho-

37 And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters: whom they offered unto the idols of Canaan; and the land was defiled with blood.

defiled. Bib. Trans. carried away into spiritual fornication. Bp. Hall.

39 Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people: insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance.

40 And he gave them over into the hand of the heathen: and they that hated them were lords over them.

41 Their enemies oppressed them: and had them in subjection.

42 Many a time did he deliver them: but they rebelled against him with their own inventions, and were brought down in their wickedness.

43 Nevertheless, when he saw their adversity: he heard their complaint.

44 He thought upon his covenant, and pitied them, according unto the multitude of his mercies: yea, he made all those that led them away captive to pity them.

45 Deliver us, O Lord our God[t], and gather us from among the heathen: that we may give thanks unto thy holy Name, and make our boast of thy praise.

46 Blessed be the Lord God of Israel[u] from everlasting, and world without end: and let all the people say, Amen.

rized zeal for his service; as also, how dangerous it is to converse too freely with those of the other sex, especially when they have been educated in a false religion, or in no religion at all. Bp. Horne.

[p] 32, 33. They angered him also at the waters of strife: &c.] This instance of disobedience was, in point of time, prior to that mentioned in the preceding verses. It is related, Numb. xx. 2—13. Where it appears that Moses, though he was the meekest man upon earth, was so exasperated and embittered by continual murmurings and rebellions, that he shewed not that affiance in God, that disposition to glorify Him before his people, which became him in the execution of his office. "The wrath of man" found admission, and that "worketh not the righteousness of God." Thou, blessed Jesus, art the only perfect pattern of patience and love; O grant to all, but above all, to the pastors of thy flock, a "spirit" not easy to be "provoked," and lips not hasty to "speak unadvisedly." Bp. Horne.

[q] 34, 35. Neither destroyed they the heathen: &c.] When the iniquity of the Canaanites was full, it pleased God to extirpate the race, and Israel was commissioned to execute upon them the vengeance determined. But the conquerors suffered themselves frequently to be seduced into all the abominations of the conquered, and spared their idolatrous altars, till themselves came to bow down before them, Judges ii. 2, 3. The Canaanites, against whom we Christians militate, are our lusts, which if they are spared and treated with, will prove "a snare" to us, and in time become our masters. Mercy shewn to them is cruelty to ourselves, and will always be found so in the end. Bp. Horne.

[r] 36, 37. Insomuch that they worshipped their idols, &c.] It is plain, that the "devils," mentioned in the former of these two verses, are "the idols of Canaan," mentioned in the latter. And idolatry being a work of the devil, it is true, that what is offered to an idol, is offered to the devil. We stand astonished, doubtless, at this horrid, barbarous, and unnatural impiety, of offering children by fire to a Moloch: but how little is it considered, that children brought up in the ways of ignorance, error, vanity, folly, and vice, are more effectually sacrificed to the great adversary of mankind! Bp. Horne.

[s] 38—44. Thus were they stained &c.] This is an epitome of the history of the Israelites, from the time when they took possession of Canaan, downwards. Transgressions brought on chastisements; chastisements produced repentance; and repentance obtained mercy. For their last and grand rebellion against the Son of God and their King Messiah, whom they murdered, the sore burden of heaven's displeasure hath now rested upon the nation these seventeen hundred years; but their eyes are not yet opened; their hearts have not, hitherto, relented. How hath the "wrath of Jehovah been kindled against his people, insomuch that he hath abhorred his own inheritance!" How hath He "given them into the hand of the heathen, and caused them that hated them to rule over them!" How have "their enemies oppressed them:" how have they been "brought into subjection under their hand! Nevertheless, O Lord, regard their affliction, when thou hearest their cry;" grant them repentance first, and then pardon; "remember for them thy covenant;" let them change their mind, and do thou "change thy purpose, according to the multitude of thy mercies; make them also to be pitied of all those that have carried them captives;" cause them, upon their conversion, to find favour in the eyes of the nations; and do thou, who hast so long been "a light to lighten the Gentiles," become once more "the glory of thy people Israel." Bp. Horne.

[t] 45. Deliver us, O Lord our God, &c.] It appears from this verse that the Psalm was written at a time when Israel was in captivity "among the heathen." Such will be the petition of the Jews hereafter to Him whom they crucified; and such is now the petition of the Christian church, that the elect may be finally gathered together, and united in one congregation, "to give thanks unto the name, and triumph for ever in the praises, of Jesus." Bp. Horne.

O Give thanks unto the Lord, for he is gracious[y] : and his mercy endureth for ever.

Let the redeemed of the Lord say so. Bib. Trans.

2 Let them give thanks whom the Lord hath redeemed : and delivered from the hand of the enemy;

3 And gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west : from the north, and from the south.

4 They went astray in the wilderness[z] out of the way : and found no city to dwell in ;

5 Hungry and thirsty : their soul fainted in them.

6 So they cried unto the Lord in their trouble : and he delivered them from their distress.

7 He led them forth by the right way : that they might go to the city where they dwelt.

8 O that men would therefore praise the Lord [a] for his goodness : and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men !

9 For he satisfieth the empty soul : and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

times, in all places, and by all persons, on earth and in heaven, in prosperity and adversity, peace or persecution, "the Lord God of Israel," the Saviour and Redeemer of his church, is to be "blessed;" nor can any situation exempt a believer from saying, "Amen, Hallelujah," that is, from blessing God himself, and exciting others to do the same. Bp. Horne.

[x] PSALM cvii.] The redeemed of the Lord are exhorted in this Psalm, 1—3, to praise Him for his goodness in redeeming, and gathering them from the four quarters of the world. Their danger and their deliverance are represented under the four striking images, 4—9, of travellers lost in a wilderness, but directed and conducted home; 10—16, of prisoners rescued from captivity; 17—22, of sick and dying men restored to health; 23—32, of mariners preserved in a storm at sea, and brought safe into port. 33—41, Some other instances of God's providence in the government of the world, and of the church, are adduced and insisted on, for, 42, the consolation of the righteous, and, 43, the instruction of all. Bp. Horne.

[y] 1. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is gracious: &c.] Eternal mercy is the theme here proposed; and they, who have tasted its sweets, are invited to join in setting forth its praises. The members of the Christian church are now, in the most proper and emphatical sense of the words, "the redeemed of Jehovah, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy, and gathered them," by the Gospel, out of all lands, and from all the four quarters of the world, to form a church, and to supply the place of the apostate Jews; whose forefathers experienced, in type and shadow, the good things prepared for them and for us, in truth and substance. "Many," saith our Lord to the Jews, "shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God; and ye yourselves shall be thrust out:" Matt. viii. 11; Luke xiii. 29. We, converted Gentiles, are the happy people; and we are taught in this Psalm to celebrate that mercy which made us so. Bp. Horne.

[z] 4—7. They went astray in the wilderness &c.] The spiritual blessings of redemption are represented by the Psalmist under four exquisitely beautiful and expressive images; which images are themselves four special acts of God's providential care and love, shewn towards the bodies of men in the world; corresponding with as many works of grace, wrought on the souls of believers, in the church. The first of these pictures exhibiteth to our view a set of travellers lost in a pathless desert, and well-nigh famished through want of necessary provisions. They make their distresses known by prayer to Jehovah, and, lo, He appears as their guard, and their guide; He supplies all their necessities upon the journey, and conducts them in safety to their place of abode. Thus He dealt with Israel of old, in their passage, through the waste and howling wilderness, from Egypt to Canaan. And thus He is ready to deal with us all. Fervent and importunate prayer to the God of our salvation, will procure, from above, knowledge to dispel our ignorance, and grace to help our infirmities; the former will discover to us our road, the latter will enable us to walk in it, and both together will carry us, in due time, to "the city of our eternal habitation." Bp. Horne.

[a] 8, 9. O that men would therefore praise the Lord &c.] The former of these two verses is a chorus, repeated after the celebration of each of the four mercies here related. Literally it is, "Let them acknowledge to Jehovah his mercy, and his wonders for the children of Adam." And what can better deserve our acknowledgment, than the provision made for the bodies and souls of Christian travellers, in their way to that heavenly country and city, "where they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes?" Rev. vii. 16. Bp. Horne.

[b] 10—16. Such as sit in darkness, &c.] In this second piece of divine scenery, we behold a people groaning under all the miseries of captivity, deprived of light and liberty, chained down in horrid dungeons, and there expecting the day of execution. These calamities they are represented as having brought upon themselves by their rebellion against God, who takes this method of humbling them. It succeeds, and brings them upon their knees to Him who alone is able to deliver them. Moved by their cries, He exerts his power on their behalf, and frees them from the house of bondage. To a state of corporal servitude the Israelites, for their transgressions, were frequently reduced, and many times experienced, upon their repentance, the goodness of Jehovah in rescuing them from it. But the grand and universal captivity is that regarded the counsel of the most Highest;

Therefore he brought down. Bib. Trans.

12 He also brought down their heart through heaviness : they fell down, and there was none to help them.

13 So when they cried unto the Lord in their trouble : he delivered them out of their distress.

14 For he brought them out of darkness, and out of the shadow of death : and brake their bonds in sunder.

15 O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness : and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men !

16 For he hath broken the gates of brass : and smitten the bars of iron in sunder.

17 Foolish men are plagued for their offence[c] : and because of their wickedness.

18 Their soul abhorred all manner of meat : and they were even hard at death's door.

19 So when they cried unto the Lord in their trouble : he delivered them out of their distress.

20 He sent his word, and healed them : and they were saved from their destruction.

21 O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness : and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men !

22 That they would offer unto him the sacrifice of thanksgiving : and tell out his works with gladness !

23 They that go down to the sea in ships[d] : and occupy their business in great waters;

24 These men see the works of the Lord : and his wonders in the deep.

25 For at his word the stormy wind ariseth : which lifteth up the waves thereof.

26 They are carried up to the heaven, and down again to the deep : their soul melteth away because of the trouble.

of sin and death : the grand and universal deliverance, for which all the redeemed of the Lord ought to praise his mercy, is that by Jesus Christ. Bp. Horne.

[c] 17—22. Foolish men are plagued for their offence : &c.] The recovery of men from sickness affords a third image of the benefits conferred on our nature, by the Redeemer. Sickness, as we are here informed, is the punishment of human folly and iniquity. When it is extreme, it deprives man of all relish and appetite for his food; nay, it makes him loath and detest the very sight and smell of that which should nourish and support him; in which case he must waste away, and soon "draw near to the gates of death." But from those dreadful gates the power of God can snatch us when we are just about to enter them. To an infirm and emaciated body He can restore health, strength, and beauty; for diseases are his ministers and messengers; they visit us at his command, and at his command they retire, and we recover again. The Israelites in the wilderness, "because of their transgressions, and because of their iniquities, were often afflicted" with a plague. But when they repented, and atonement was made, the plague ceased. They were stung by fiery serpents; but when they "cried unto Jehovah, he sent his word and healed them." Now the mind, by reason of sin, is not less subject to infirmities than the body. But the case is not desperate, while there is breath enough left to call in, by prayer, the great Physician of spirits. The most inveterate malady gives place to his efficacious medicines; appetite revives, health returns, and the believer is reinstated in the vigour and beauty of holiness. Bp. Horne.

[d] 23—32. They that go down into the sea in ships : &c.] The fourth similitude chosen to portray the dangers of our present state, and the goodness of God displayed in our salvation, is taken from that signal instance of the divine power and providence, the preservation of mariners in a storm at sea. The description which the Psalmist hath given us of such an event admitteth of no comment. Experience alone can illustrate its beauty, evince its truth, and point out the propriety of the circumstances which are selected to furnish us with a full and complete idea of the whole. Few of us, indeed, are ever likely to be in that terrible situation. But then we cannot help reflecting, that there is a ship, in which we are all embarked; there is a troubled sea, on which we all sail; there are storms, by which we are all frequently overtaken; and there is a haven, which we all desire to behold and to enter. For the church is a ship; the world is a sea; temptations, persecutions, and afflictions, are the waves of it; the prince of the power of the air is the stormy wind which raises them; and heaven is the only port of rest and security. In both cases, prayer is the proper effect, and the only remedy left. With the earnestness of affrighted mariners, who will then be devout, though they never were so before, we should "cry unto the Lord Jesus in our trouble;" we should, as it were, "awake" Him, like the disciples, with repetitions of "Lord, save us, we perish!" Then will He arise, and rebuke the authors of our tribulation, saying unto them, "Peace, be still;" and they shall hear and obey his voice. "He will make the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof shall be still;" and at length He will "bring us" in peace, joy, and gladness, "to our desired haven," there to "exalt him in the congregation" of his chosen, and "praise him in the" great "assembly" of saints and angels. This is the consummation so devoutly wished and requested by the Church for all her children, at the time of their baptism, that they, "being delivered from God's wrath, may be received into the ark of Christ's church; and, being stedfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity, may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally they may come to the land of everlasting life." Bp. Horne.

27 They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man : and are at their wit's end.

28 So when they cry unto the Lord in their trouble : he delivereth them out of their distress.

29 For he maketh the storm to cease : so that the waves thereof are still.

30 Then are they glad, because they are at rest : and so he bringeth them unto the haven where they would be.

31 O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness : and declare the wonders that he doeth for the children of men!

32 That they would exalt him also in the congregation of the people : and praise him in the seat of the elders!

The people are opposed to the elders; and both together form the whole assembly. Dr. Hammond.

[e] 33—38. Who turneth the floods into a wilderness: &c.] In this latter part of the Psalm, the prophet farther exemplifieth the power, the justice, and the goodness of God: his power, in being able to change the very nature of things; his justice and his goodness, in so doing, either to punish the rebellious, or to reward the obedient. A well-watered and fertile country shall, for the sins of its inhabitants, be converted into a dry and barren one. The plain of Jordan, which, before the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, was "well watered every where, like the garden of Jehovah," Gen. xiii. 10, hath, since that overthrow, been a land of salt and sulphur, and perpetual sterility. Nay, even the once fruitful Palestine itself, that flowed with milk and honey, is at this day a region of such utter desolation, that the very possibility of its ever having sufficed to maintain the people, who formerly possessed it, is now called in question. On the other hand, when the ways of a people please Him, He can rid them of these dreadful guests: the rain shall descend from above, the springs shall arise from beneath, the earth shall yield her increase, the cattle shall feed in large pastures, the seasons shall be kindly, the air salutary, and the smiling face of nature shall attest the loving-kindness of the Lord. Thus, in the dispensations of grace, hath He dealt with Jews and Gentiles. The synagogue of the former, once rich in faith, watered with the benedictions of heaven, fruitful in prophets and saints, adorned with the services of religion, and the presence of Jehovah, hath been, since the murder of the Son of God, cursed with infidelity, parched like the withered tops of the mountains of Gilboa, barren and desolate as the land of their ancient residence. When the "fruitful field" thus became a "forest," the "wilderness," at the same time, "became a fruitful field." A church was planted in the Gentile world, and the "Spirit was poured out upon it from on high." In that "wilderness did waters break out, and streams in that desert." There was faith sown, and holiness was the universal product. "The wilderness and the solitary place was glad, and the desert rejoiced, and blossomed as the rose. It blossomed abundantly, and rejoiced even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon was given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon;" the privileges and honours of the synagogue were conferred upon the church; and the nations now "saw the glory of Jehovah, and the excellency of God," Isa. xxxii. 15; xxxv. 1, 2. Bp. Horne.

[f] 39—41. And again, when they are minished &c.] But let not those who have received the largest share of heaven's favours therefore boast and presume. The continuance of those favours dependeth upon the continuance of their fidelity and obedience. Mighty empires, with their "princes," have, for their wickedness, been "brought low" by the arm of Jehovah, and laid in the dust, while nations "poor" and feeble, and never thought of, have "been taken from thence, and exalted over them." Yet, even in the worst of times, there is a promise, that "the poor" in spirit, the faithful and humble disciples of the holy Jesus, shall be preserved from the evil, and "set on high from affliction;" yea, that they shall be multiplied "like a flock," under the care of the good Shepherd, to preserve his name, and to continue a church upon the earth, until He shall return again. Bp. Horne.

[g] 42. The righteous will consider this, and rejoice: &c.] Two consequences will follow from this alternate display of the mercy and the judgment of God. The righteous, finding themselves still the objects of the former, will have cause to rejoice and give thanks; and the wicked, when visited with the latter, will be forced, by their silence at least, to own that their punishment is just. This will certainly be the case at the last day, when the dispensations of God, and the perfect rule of equity observed in them, shall be manifested to all the world. Bp. Horne.

EVENING PRAYER.

Ascension-day, third Psalm Even. Serv.

PSALM cviii.[1] Paratum cor meum.

O God, my heart is ready, my heart is ready : I will sing and give praise with the best member that I have.

2 Awake, thou lute, and harp : I myself will awake right early.

3 I will give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the people : I will sing praises unto thee among the nations.

4 For thy merey is greater than the heavens : and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds.

5 Set up thyself, O God, above the heaven : and thy glory above all the earth.

6 That thy beloved may be delivered : let thy right hand save them, and hear thou me.

7 God hath spoken in his holiness : I will rejoice therefore, and divide Sichem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.

8 Gilead is mine, and Manasses is mine : Ephraim also is the strength of my head.

9 Judah is my law-giver, Moab is my wash-pot : over Edom will I cast out my shoe; upon Philistia will I triumph.

10 Who will lead me into the strong city : and who will bring me into Edom?

11 Hast not thou forsaken us, O God : and wilt not thou, O God, go forth with our hosts?

12 O help us against the enemy : for vain is the help of man.

13 Through God we shall do great acts : and it is he that shall tread down our enemies.

PSALM cix.[k] Deus laudum.

HOLD not thy tongue[l], O God of my praise : for the mouth of the ungodly, yea, the mouth of the deceitful is opened upon me. To whom all my praise is due. Dr. Hammond.

2 And they have spoken against me with false tongues : they compassed me about also with words of hatred, and fought against me without a cause.

[h] 43. Whoso is wise will ponder these things : &c.] A truly "wise" person will treasure up in his heart the contents of this most instructive and delightful Psalm. By so doing, he will fully "understand" and comprehend the weakness and wretchedness of man, and the power and "loving-kindness" of God, who, not for our merit, but for his mercy's sake, dispelleth our ignorance, breaketh off our sins, healeth our infirmities, preserveth us in temptations, placeth us in his church, enricheth us with his grace, sheltereth us from persecution, blesseth us in time, and will crown us in eternity. Bp. Horne.

[1] Psalm cviii.] This Psalm is composed of parts taken, without any material alteration, from two others. The first five verses occur in Psalm lvii. 8—12; the last eight are found in Psalm lx. 5—12. The reader is therefore referred to the exposition already given of those Psalms. Bp. Horne.

The strain of gratitude and triumph, which runs through the Psalm, makes it suitable to the service of the church on Ascension-day. Travell.

[k] Psalm cix.] This Psalm was composed by David; and is a direful prediction of God's judgments that should fall upon his enemies. But by Acts i. 20, where the seventh verse of the Psalm is said to have been fulfilled in Judas, it appears to have had a more eminent completion in those, that opposed and consulted against and crucified Christ, the Pharisees and the rulers of the Jews, who, with Judas that betrayed Him into their hands, and was their counsellor and guide at the apprehension of Him, Acts i. 16, met with sad and direful ends. Dr. Hammond.

St. Peter, Acts i. 20, hath taught us to apply the predictions in this Psalm to the betrayers and murderers of Messiah, who is, consequently, the person here speaking, and, 1—4, complaining of the injuries which He suffered from them; after which, 5—19, He forewarneth them of all the judgments and sore calamities that should come upon them and their posterity; 20—24, He returneth to the subject of his passion; 25—28, repeateth his supplications for Himself and his church; and, 29, 30, concludeth with an act of praise. In this light was the Psalm considered and interpreted in the ancient church, by Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Theodoret, and others. Bp. Horne.

The first four verses of this Psalm clearly describe the treatment which our Lord met with from the Jews. The curses, that follow, as clearly describe the judgments which have fallen upon that miserable people. So that the whole is a prediction of his sufferings, and of their punishment, delivered in the form of complaint and imprecation. Nor is there any thing in it, rightly understood, more offensive, than in the prophetick curses of the patriarchs. Bp. Horsley.

[l] 1—4. Hold not thy tongue, &c.] The holy Jesus, in these words, maketh supplication to the Father for redress and deliverance. He complaineth of the manner in which He was treated, when "he came unto his own, and his own received him not," John i. 11. Sometimes "the mouth of the wicked was opened upon him," roaring against Him, like the roaring of lions, while they cried out, "He is a Samaritan, and hath a devil, and is mad; away with him, away with him, crucify him, crucify him." Sometimes, "deceitful and lying tongues" were employed, either to entangle and entrap Him in his talk, or to bear false witness against him. And all this was done, not only "without a cause," but men were his bitter and implacable "adversaries," in return for that "love" which brought Him from heaven, to save them with an everlasting salvation. Let the afflicted and traduced disciple rejoice, in that he is conformed to the image of his Master. And from the example of that Master let him learn what course to take, when in such circumstances : "But I give myself unto prayer." Bp. Horne.

[m] 5. Set thou &c.] Or "Thou wilt set." As most of the following verbs are in the future tense, and the rest have evidently a predictive and future import, the same liberty might here be taken, as in Ps. lxix, of rendering them throughout uniformly in that tense; by which means the curses pronounced in this Psalm will at once appear to be of the same import with those in the xxviiith chapter of Deuteronomy. The reader is entreated, when he shall have perused the Psalm, to turn to that chapter and judge for himself. Bp. Horne.

[n] 5. Set thou an ungodly man &c.] A transition is here made to the adversaries of Messiah : primarily, to Judas, "who was guide to them that took Jesus," Acts i. 16; secondarily, to the synagogue, of whom Judas may be considered as an epitome and representative. It is foretold, that, by betraying and murdering the best of masters, they should subject themselves to the tyranny of the worst; that they should become slaves to the "wicked one," who should justly be "set over them," when they had delivered themselves into his hands : that "Satan," who had stood by them to tempt them, should "stand at their right hand" to accuse them at the tribunal of God; that when tried, they would be convicted and "condemned," and even their "prayer" would be abomination in the sight of the Lord, as being offered without true contrition and repentance, without faith, hope, or charity. Such is the wretched state of the Jews, estranged from God, and in bondage to the devil; such the prayers, which, from hardened and malignant hearts, they continually utter, for the excision of all Christians, and for the extirpation of that blessed Name, on which Christians call. These prayers, instead of lightening the burden of their sins, certainly add to its weight. Bp. Horne.

The Jewish worship is now become sin, as it contains a standing denial of our Lord. Bp. Horsley.

[o] 7. Let his days be few : &c.] This is the verse which St. Peter hath cited and applied in his discourse to the disciples, at the election of Matthias into the place of Judas. "Men and brethren, this Scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake before concerning Judas, who was guide to them that took Jesus. For he was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry. Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity, and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out : for it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein : and his bishoprick let another take." The former of these two citations is made from Psalm lxix. 26; the latter is a part of the verse now before us. If Judas, therefore, be the person whose destruction the sufferer foretelleth, the person speaking in this prophetical Psalm must of necessity be our Lord Himself, who suffered by the treachery of Judas. In Psalm lxix. 26, the prediction is in the plural number, "Their habitation shall be void," yet St. Peter applies it, in the singular number, to Judas. The passage in our Psalm is singular, yet applicable not to Judas only, but to the whole nations of the Jews; whose "days," after they had crucified the Lord of glory, "were few;" who were dispossessed of the place and "office" which they held as the church of God, and to which, with all its honours and privileges, the Gentile Christian church succeeded in their stead, when the Aaronical priesthood was abolished, and that of the true Melchizedek established for ever. Bp. Horne.

[p] 8, 9. Let his children be fatherless : &c.] If, by the wretched death of Judas, his wife became a widow, and his children orphans, vagabonds, and beggars, their fate was but a prelude to that of thousands and ten thousands of the same nation, whose husbands and fathers came afterwards to a miserable end, at the destruction of Jerusalem. Their children, and children's children, have since been "continually vagabonds" upon the earth, in the state of Cain, when he had murdered his righteous brother, not cut off, but marvellously preserved for punishment and woe. Having nothing of their own, they roam through all parts of the world, civilized or barbarous, the scorn and contempt of mankind. And even if they are able to amass wealth, their unparalleled avarice still keeps them poor and beggarly in the midst of it. Thus Dr. Hammond, in his Annotation on these verses : "By this is described, in a very lively manner, the condition of the Jewish posterity, ever since their ancestors fell under that signal vengeance, for the crucifying of Christ. First, their desolations and vastations in their own country, and being ejected thence; secondly, their continual wanderings from place to place, scattered over the face of the earth; and, thirdly, their remarkable covetousness, keeping them always poor and beggarly, be they ever so rich, and continually labouring and moiling for gain, as the poorest are wont to do; and this is continually the constant curse attending this people wheresoever they are scattered." Bp. Horne.

[q] 10, 11. Let the extortioner consume all that he hath : &c.] Since the destruction of Jerusalem, how often hath this race been seized, pillaged, stripped, and impoverished, by prince and people, in all the nations of the known world; none appearing, as in other cases, to "favour and extend mercy" to them! "They have had no nation, none to avenge their grievous wrong, which the Lord God of their forefathers had ordained they should suffer, at all times, and in all places, whereso-

15 And that, because his mind was not to do good[s]: but persecuted the poor helpless man, that he might slay him that was vexed at the heart.

16 His delight was in cursing[t], and it shall happen unto him: he loved not blessing, therefore shall it be far from him.

17 He clothed himself with cursing, like as with a raiment: and it shall come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones.

18 Let it be unto him as the cloke that he hath upon him: and as the girdle that he is always girded withal.

19 Let it thus happen from the Lord unto mine enemies: and to those that speak evil against my soul.

20 But deal thou with me, O Lord God[u], according unto thy Name: for sweet is thy mercy.

21 O deliver me, for I am helpless and poor: and my heart is wounded within me.

22 I go hence like the shadow that ever they have come, without redress. Nay, their general carriage hath been so odious and preposterous, that, albeit the Christian magistrates had conspired together for their good, they would themselves have certainly provoked their own misery." Thus, that excellent divine, the learned and pious Dr. Jackson, whose reflections upon the history of the Jews, at and since their dispersion, it were to be wished that every Christian could peruse. For, as he himself observes, "Christian parents, whether bodily or spiritual, should be as careful to instruct their children what the Lord hath done to these Jews, as the Israelites should have been to tell their sons what God hath done to Pharaoh." Bp. Horne.

[r] 12—14. Let his posterity be destroyed: &c.] The traitorous and rebellious "posterity" of traitorous and rebellious parents suffered an "excision" by the Roman sword; and "in the generation following, their name," as a church and civil polity, was "blotted out" of the list of states and kingdoms upon earth. "The iniquity of their fathers," which they had filled up, "was remembered with Jehovah, and the sin of their mother," that is, perhaps of the synagogue of Jerusalem, now in bondage with her children, was not blotted out; "that upon them might come all the righteous blood shed, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, whom they slew between the temple and the altar," Matt. xxiii. 35. The blood of the prophets cried for vengeance against those who crucified the Lord of the prophets. God hid not his face any longer from all these horrible transgressions, but "they were before him continually," and occasioned Him to "cut off the memory" of his people, once precious and fragrant, "from the earth;" so that while apostles and martyrs are annually commemorated with honour, and their good deeds, blossoming out of the dust, perfume the church, and delight the souls of the faithful, the names of "Judas," and "Jew," are never mentioned but with contempt and abhorrence. Bp. Horne.

[s] 15. And that, because his mind was not to do good: &c.] The crime which brought upon its perpetrators all the above-mentioned judgments and calamities, is here pointed out too plainly to be mistaken. They "remembered not to shew mercy" to Him, who shewed it to all the world; they "persecuted" Him who for our sakes became "poor," and who condescended to ask of his creatures water to drink; they betrayed and murdered the lowly and afflicted Jesus, whose "heart" was "broken" with sorrow for their sins, and with a sense of the punishment due to them. How long will it be, ere the brethren of this most innocent and most injured Joseph, "say one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear: therefore is this distress come upon us!" Gen. xlii. 21. Bp. Horne.

[t] 16—19. His delight was in cursing, &c.] They, who reject Christ, reject the fountain of "blessing," and choose a "curse" for their portion; and this portion, when they have finally made their choice, will certainly be given to them in full measure. The curse, that lighted on the Jewish nation, is resembled, for its universality and adhesion, to a "garment" which covereth the whole man, and is "girded" close about his loins: for its diffusive and penetrating nature, to "water," which, from the stomach, passeth into the "bowels," and is dispersed through all the vessels of the frame; and to "oil," which imperceptibly insinuates itself into the very "bones." When that unhappy multitude, assembled before Pontius Pilate, pronounced the words, "His blood be on us, and on our children," Matt. xxvii. 25; then did they put on the envenomed garment, which has stuck to and tormented the nation ever since; then did they eagerly swallow down that deadly draught, the effects whereof have been the infatuation and misery of seventeen hundred years! Bp. Horne.

[u] 20—24. But deal thou with me, O Lord God, &c.] In this last part of the Psalm, Messiah petitioneth for deliverance, urging to the Father his power as "Lord," the honour of his "name," and the greatness of his "mercy." He then pleadeth his own humiliation and affliction, his "poverty" and "heart"-felt agony of grief. Drawing towards the evening of his mortal life, He compareth Himself to a "shadow, declining," and about to vanish from the earth, where He hath no rest, being persecuted from place to place, as a "locust" is driven hither and thither by the stormy wind and tempest; while enfeebled and emaciated by frequent "fastings," and long want of food during his passion, He was ready to sink under his burden; and what aggravated all his sufferings was, that He met with no pity and compassion from those around Him; his enemies "reproached" and "reviled him, shaking departeth : and am driven away as the grasshopper.

23 My knees are weak through fasting : my flesh is dried up for want of fatness.

24 I became also a reproach unto them : they that looked upon me shaked their heads.

25 Help me, O Lord my God[x] : O save me according to thy mercy;

26 And they shall know, how that this is thy hand : and that thou, Lord, hast done it.

27 Though they curse, yet bless thou[y] : and let them be confounded that rise up against me; but let thy servant rejoice.

28 Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame : and let them cover themselves with their own confusion, as with a cloke.

29 As for me, I will give great thanks[z] unto the Lord with my mouth : and praise him among the multitude;

30 For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor : to save his soul from unrighteous judges.

MORNING PRAYER.

PSALM cx.[a] Dixit Dominus. Christmas-day, second Psalm Even. Serv.

THE Lord said unto my Lord[b] : Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

their heads, and saying, Ah! thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself," &c. Mark xv. 29. Bp. Horne.

[x] 25, 26. Help me, O Lord my God: &c.] The resurrection of Christ was to be the great demonstration of Jehovah's power; and it was published as such by the apostles to all the nations of the world, who thereupon believed, and were converted. The Jews alone hardened their hearts against that proof, and continued impenitent. Bp. Horne.

[y] 27, 28. Though they curse, yet bless thou: &c.] The apostate sons of Israel, though they have been so long "confounded" and blasted by the breath of heaven's displeasure, yet continue "cursing" and blaspheming, as it is here foretold that they should do. But God hath "blessed" his Son Jesus. and, through Him, all nations, who have been adopted into his family, and made his children by baptism; yea, and they shall be blessed, and enter, by thousands and millions, into the "joy" of their Lord, in that day when his crucifiers shall have no "covering" but their own "shame" and "confusion." Bp. Horne.

[z] 29, 30. As for me, I will give great thanks &c.] The former of these two verses is parallel to that which St. Paul citeth from Ps. xxii. 22; "He that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one : for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee," Heb. ii. 11, 12. Great is the joy of the redeemed upon earth; greater will it be after the resurrection of the dead, in the courts of heaven. Jesus, unjustly put to death, and now risen again, is a perpetual advocate and intercessor for his people, ever ready to appear on their behalf against the iniquitous sentence of a corrupt world, and the malice of the grand accuser. Bp. Horne.

[a] Psalm cx.] In this Psalm David prophesieth concerning, 1, the exaltation of Christ; 2, the sceptre of his kingdom; 3, the character of his subjects; 4, his everlasting priesthood; 5, 6, his tremendous victories and judgments; 7, the means of his obtaining both kingdom and priesthood, by his sufferings and resurrection. Parts of this prophecy are cited and applied in the New Testament, by our Lord Himself, Matt. xxii. 43; by St. Peter, Acts ii. 34; by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25; Heb. v. 6. The Church, likewise, hath appointed it as one of the proper Psalms to be read on Christmas-day. It appertaineth literally and solely to King Messiah. Bp. Horne.

[b] 1. The Lord said unto my Lord: &c.] We are here informed of Jehovah's eternal and unchangeable decree concerning the kingdom of Messiah, its extension, power, and duration. That Messiah should, after his sufferings, be thus exalted, was determined in the divine counsel and covenant, before the world began. Whether we suppose the Psalmist to be speaking of that determination, or of its actual accomplishment at the time of Christ's ascension into heaven, it maketh no great difference. The substance of the decree is the same. It was addressed by the Father to the Son, by Jehovah to Messiah, whom David in spirit styleth "my Lord;" one that should come after him, as his offspring according to the flesh; but one, in dignity of person, and greatness of power, far superior to him, and to every earthly potentate; King of kings, and Lord of lords; God and man united in one person. To this person it was said by the Father, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool;" in other words, Seeing, O my Son Messiah, thou hast glorified me on the earth, and finished the work which I gave thee to do, the great work of man's redemption; take now the throne prepared for thee from the foundation of the world : behold all power is given unto thee; enter upon thy mediatorial kingdom, and reign till every opposer shall have submitted himself to thee, and sin and death shall have felt thy all-conquering arm. Bp. Horne.

[c] 2. The Lord shall send the rod of thy power out of Sion: &c.] In the foregoing verse, David related the words spoken by the Father to the Son. In this, he himself, as a prophet, directeth his speech to King Messiah, predicting the glorious consequences of his enthronization, and the manner in which "his enemies" are to be "made his footstool." The "rod," or sceptre of Christ's "strength," is his word, accompanied by his Spirit. The law was given to Israel from Sinai, but the Gospel went forth from "Sion;" it was "preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47; there began the spiritual kingdom of Jesus; there were the first converts made; and from thence the faith was propagated by the apostles, to the ends of the earth. This David seeing beforehand cries out, "Rule thou in the midst ruler, even in the midst among thine enemies.

of thine enemies!" Go on, victorious Prince; plant the standard of thy cross among the thickest ranks of the adversary; and, in opposition to both Jew and Gentile tumultuously raging against thee, erect and establish thy church throughout the world! This was accordingly done with marvellous speed and success; and the church, thus erected and established among the nations, hath been as marvellously preserved, "in the midst of her enemies," unto this day; yea, and the world shall sooner be destroyed, than she shall cease to be preserved. Bp. Horne.
